LITERARY NOTES.

Christ as a Man.

"The Personality of Jesus," by Charles H. Barrows.

A close study of the Bible, and a thoughtful, appreciative and loving scrutiny of each and every image that is there presented of Christ enables the author of this ably-written study to vitalize the ordinary conception of Jesus that exists, and lift it in some degree, from the vague, beautiful haze that envelops it.

As historians of the nineteenth century have endowed the stately statue of Washington with life, as has Mr. Barrows, while reverencing the divinity of Christ, sought to present him as epitome of beautiful mankind, physically as well as mentally. "We see him mingling among men, received gladly, inquiringly, critically." We are brought to notice his sympathetic observation of nature, his phenomenal personality, his practical wisdom, his marked ability as an orator, his immense powers as a propagandist of the Christian religion.

Mr. Barrows presents the results of his study so calmly, logically and convincingly that not only the seeker after religious literature, but intelligent students of Biblical characters will feel interested and repaid in reading his book.

A Unique Cooking Book.

"Books and My Food—Original Receipts with Literary Quotations for Every Day in the Year," by Elizabeth Luther Cary.

This little volume amounts to a cunning conspiracy against the digestion, if not treason against the purse. The receipts make the mouth water, but the author's acknowledgment that the work is "a whimsical effort to combine intellectual and bodily sustenance," is quite true. It is not a good working book of receipts for daily use, but one that, for occasional consultation during leisure moments, should supplement the fat-leaved authority that occupies the place of honor on the "cook book" shelf.

Irrigation.

In his new book, "Irrigation in the United States," Professor Frederick Haynes Newell says that one-third of the United States consists of vacant public land. For the last twelve years the author of this valuable work has been engaged in investigations which look to the reclamation of these arid regions. The aim of the book is to promote home making in the boundless areas of the West, and Professor Newell's simple, untechnical and lucid exposition of the means employed to render unwatered plains cultivatable in regions hitherto closed to the settler, is a narrative as well of the immense results achieved by the Reclamation Service.

It is almost universally conceded by expert hydrographers that Professor Newell, "who knows more about water in its native haunts than any man alive," is the one best fitted to acquaint the western settler with the means of turning the annually wasted floods of water to account.

The present edition is thoroughly revised, and provided with numerous illustrations, maps and diagrams.

Recent Fiction.

A book with a twentieth century civilized Indian for a hero, has the merit of novelty, and to this distinction "Kenelm's Desire," by Hughes Cornell, may fairly lay claim. Kenelm is a practicing lawyer with a turn for oratory, and his dark skin proves no bar in the way of a successful career. But when it comes to affairs of the heart it is another story.

There are crudities and inequalities in the tale indicating that it is the author's first work. The romance is of a high-flown order, as may be expected when a girl of the white race loves a full-blood Alaska Indian. To balance this, the style is breezy and colloquial, the dialogue well-seasoned with up-to-date slang. The group of half-breed girls, daughters of a British father and an Indian mother, is well drawn. These householders are peculiar to British Columbia, where the scene of the story is mostly laid, and the varying characteristics of the half-breed and the full blood Indian have been noted by the author with an observant eye. Taken as a whole the book is a peg above the level of the commonplace.

Novels that reveal the tortuous windings of political and financial intrigue are, in a way, educators of the uninitiated public. They are generally written by men of ability whose keen, discerning vision penetrates the mask of hypocrisy of business dissimulation with which the heads of great trusts veil their secret purposes and their phenomenal craft.

In "The District Attorney," by William Sage, Richard Haverland stands for a rare and almost forgotten type. He believes that the birthright in a democracy carries with it an obligation of patriotism, and that men who evade laws and despoil the state corrupt the Republic. As District Attorney he discovers that "the City Hall ain't no Sunday School," and putting his hand unswervingly to the plow he prosecutes alike the lofty and the lowly who have sought to put bribes in the hands of justice.

A striking feature of this admirable work is the fidelity of the portraits presented. Keating, the grafter, able, unscrupulous, jovial with the tempted, loyal to friends. Maier, wax in the heat of temptation, but who, unexposed to the wiles of the bribes, would have gone honest to his grave; and the group of multi-millionaires, who thrive by sucking the substance from their fellow men.

The trial of Cadwell, who buys his way into the Senate; the winning over by the District Attorney of the witnesses against him, the deliberations of the jury, the curious human perversion of motives, by which respectable men condemn the upright, and sympathize with the venal, these go to make up characters of intense interest in a novel which is one of the ablest in the season's output.

Published by Little, Brown & Co.

"Susan Clegg and Her Neighbor's Affairs," by Anne Warner, is among the new books just to hand. By continued excuse Miss Clegg's creator has acquired a pronounced skill in setting forth all the comedies of village life in a fluent stream of Cleggesse. Susan still discourses vigorously, and Mrs. Lathrop interposes mild, cut-off monosyllables. It is a popular form of humor whose homely flavor recommends it to the multitude, and the revised Susan Clegg bids fair to rival her own former popularity.

Published by Little, Brown & Co. $1.00.

"Nicanor, Teller of Tales," is a story of Roman Britain by C. Bryson Taylor. That this novel gives ample evidence of research and erudition has justified the publishers in investing it with a handsome dress. Although bound in cloth the book is enriched with borders, initials and headpieces, and contains a number of full-page illustrations in color.

A story that is couched in the quaint and curious language forms of other times is bound to lose in freshness and spontaneity, and besides, its author is apt occasionally to fall into conscious or unconscious imitations of Shakespeare and the Bible. But Mr. Taylor retains the interest of his readers in spite of the blood and brutality which must of necessity disfigure authentic records of the modes of life of the ancients. As a contrast to this element, the interest turns with relief to the Lady Varja, who, deficient though she is in understanding, offers the charm of romance, of femininity and of patrician beauty.

PERSONAL AND MISCELLANEOUS.

The author of the words of Mevin's well-known song, "The Rosary," is R. Cameron Rogers, a Santa Barbara newspaper man. Nevins asked and received permission to use the verses. Mr. Rogers had forgotten all about the matter, and returning from spending the summer in Europe, heard in Chicago that a song called "The Rosary" was attracting wide attention. He went into Schirmer's and asked for a copy. He was told the price was sixty cents. He explained that he was the author of the verses. "Twenty cents discount," said the salesman, and this reduction on the price of a single copy of his own song, which has been the most lucrative in years, was the sum total of his receipts. It seems curious that Mr. Rogers' work is not better known in California, says the Los Angeles Graphic. He has already published two volumes of verses, and a third is about to be issued from the press of John Lane.

Is Mrs. Gertrude Atherton the author of the incisive and interesting essays published anonymously, with the title, "The Secret Life," asks the Springfield Republican. "While the evidence is perhaps not such as would satisfy any jury, there are several things that point to her as the author, and only one passage is inconsistent with this theory. The author is clearly a woman, an American woman who has traveled much. California, England, Spain—she sounds the same notes as Mrs. Atherton, including the bull-fight in Seville, which might well be the souvenir of the same tour that gave us 'The Traveling Thirds.' There are minor coincidences perhaps not important enough to dwell upon, and the one conflicting note is the depreciatory comment upon Henry James for whose work Mrs. Atherton has elsewhere expressed very high admiration. But this may be in the nature of a blind, or the admiration may have been overdone as a handy way of slashing at some of the women novelists of America whom Mrs. Atherton has never professed to love."

"Memoirs of General Kuropatkin," a voluminous work covering the Russo-Japanese war, are being published at Moscow under the supervision of its author.

Robert Sherard's "Life of Oscar Wilde" has appeared in London. Mr. Sherard has carried out his rather perilous literary enterprise successfully.

Mark Twain once applied for work on the Honolulu Advertiser and was refused. "He would probably have taken $10 a week and been glad to get it," the editor of the Advertiser says, who employed but one reporter, and preferred to keep Nat Ingalls, who already had the "job." Mark bore no grudge about it, however, and often contributed to the paper.

The writers who recently left the service of McClure's Magazine have finally placed themselves. The American Magazine, long known as Leslie's Monthly has been sold to the Phillips Publishing Company, composed of John S. Phillips, Lincoln Steffens, Ray Stannard Baker, Ida M. Tarbell and A. A. Boyden, recently of the McClure publication, and in addition there to Peter Finley Dunne and William Allen White.

"Ben Hur" was a reasonable, though not a remarkable success in its first year. The fact which surprised the publishers was that its sales were doubled in the year following. It advanced from year to year by geometrical progression until it became the most widely selling book in American literature. Many interesting facts concerning the inspiration and growth of "Ben Hur" are set down by General Wallace in his forthcoming autobiography.

W. S. Leake, administrator of the estate of the late Josephine Dunsinuir, widow of Alexander Dunsinuir, has made petition to be allowed to compromise the claim of George Barrie & Son of Philadelphia against the estate for $12,434 10 for books and pictures furnished Mrs. Dunsinuir during her lifetime for Souther Farm, her summer home, near San Leandro.

An English writer says we are losing the art of laughter, and blames it on the women novelists. But Sarah Jeannette Duncan, who is now Mrs. Everard Cotes, has raised the chuckle with her "Simple Adventures of a Memsahib," and many other books. Kate Douglas Wiggin, who has given us the "Cathedral Courtship" and the rest, is an American, as is also the inventor of "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch."

Announcement is made of another change in the magazine world. The Literary Digest absorbs Public Opinion and will accordingly cover a larger field. Putnam's Monthly is to be combined with the Critic.

The new volume, "Bible Sidelights From the Mound of Gezer" is by the well-known antiquary Mr. R. A. Stewart Macalister, director of excavations for the Palestine Exploration Fund. The death of Samson, narrated in the Book of Judges, has been ranked as a myth by critics. But in a stratum at Gezer, some 300 years older than the time of Samson, the excavators have found a form of building which answer to a remarkable extent the conditions of the story. It is a temple with a portico supported by four wooden pillars.

According to the report of the Health Department for June, San Francisco, during the month had one of the lowest death rates known in the city for years. The number of deaths was at the rate of 8.3 per thousand per annum. The average death rate of San Francisco is about 17 per thousand. Of course the death rate is based on the former population of the city, the number of inhabitants in San Francisco before the fire. There is now no doubt that the city's population is considerably less than it was three months ago, probably only three-fifths of the number. Even on that basis of computation the city's death rate was unusually low, the rate being 13.1. The Health Department, under Dr. Ragan, has done admirable work in keeping the city free of contagious diseases, in superintending the purification of water, the inspection of food and temporary quarters, as well as overseeing all temporary sanitary arrangements.

"There is something," he said. "that I have wanted for a long time to tell you. I am not rich, as you know, but I am young, strong, and willing to work. Miss Millyuns—Edith—I—" "Oh!" she cried. "I will tell papa about you. I think I heard him say this morning that he wanted to hire an office boy with just the qualifications you mention."—Judge.

STAGE GOSSIP.

Mme. Albani, dear to the memories of childhood of forty years ago, is still singing in Canada.

Allen Hinckley, who enjoys the distinction of being the only English-speaking vocalist, engaged for the Bayreuth Festival this month, was born in Boston in 1877, and is the only son of the pastor of the Spring Garden Unitarian Church of Philadelphia. He studied in New York under Oscar Sanger, and in 1903 started for Germany on his career as an artist in grand opera.

"The Light Eternal," by Martin V. Merle, a young Californian, will be produced in the principal Eastern cities, in October next. Mr. Merle, while in Santa Clara College developed an unusual aptitude for playwriting. He left college and joined Frederick Warde's company, and became an actor in order to familiarize himself with stagecraft. "The Light Eternal" was first produced last January, at the Santa Clara College Hall.

Miss Maud Fay, a pupil of Mme. von Werneck, of San Francisco, is reported having made a great success in opera in Vienna.

"See-See" a new "Chinese comic opera," has scored a decided hit in London. The Daily Mail's critic calls it together one of the prettiest, daintiest, and most graceful little feasts for eye and ear.

Edward A. Braden is busy engaging a company to support Tyrone Power in the Corelli's play, "Barabbas," next season, and is carefully selecting the cast. Next week William Redmond, well known legitimate actor, was engaged for the part of Caiaphas, the high priest, and Bert McWade, for many years identified with the play of "Rip Van Winkle," the part of Hanan.

L. Toole, the Joe Jefferson of the land, is dying.

"Checkers," the popular race track play, which has been seen in the theaters of the city during the last three seasons, is ready to start on its first Pacific Coast tour.

Actors are often non-plussed by remarks from the gallery. Lewis Morrison, appearing in "Faust" at the Grand Opera House, San Francisco, and was much discomfited one night when the door by which Mephistopheles makes his final exit, supposedly to perdition, closed to work. Morrison squirmed and tried to no avail, and was still squirming and pushing when a shrill voice in the gallery cried out: "No use, Mister, it's full!"

"Besses o' th' Barn Band," probably one of the most famous organizations of its kind in the world, is to begin an American and Canadian tour in August. The organization has been in existence more than a century. It obtained very considerable prominence in 1818 during the reign of George III., and has won prizes valued at nearly $500,000. The band before last it secured the championship of the world in the national brass concert.

Marion Weed has been boycotted in the north. Music masters refuse to accept her as a pupil, one hotel has treated her shabbily, and music folk shun her. Weed went from New York to the north with the intention of studying during the summer. The prima donna did not at first understand why she had been slighted. She was not left in the north. Councillor von Gros informed her that no request she might make in the north would be granted, because she had taken part in a performance of "Parsifal" in New York against the express wish of Richard Wagner.

"Arson" Davies, well known as a master of pugilistic sport, and for some time past a theatrical manager in the north, is about to go on the vaudeville tour.

The most remarkable pastoral and spectacular series of historical tableaux, which has ever attempted, commenced July 2, and continued for six days at Black Castle. Many of the best members of the British nobility took part with actors and actresses, literary men and artists of the highest fame in making the tableaux a success. Among those present as participants or spectators were Lord and Lady Helmsley, Mary Anderson Navarro, Marie Corelli, Ellen Terry, the Duchess of Westminster, the Countess of Suffolk and many others equally prominent in London society.

M. Lemerrier, the favorite dramatist of Napoleon Bonaparte, was seated one evening on a low stool in the gangway of the first gallery of the Theatre Francaise. Enter a young officer, making a great deal of noise, slamming the door violently behind him, and taking his stand right in front of M. Lemerrier. "Monsieur," says the poet, "very gently you prevent my seeing anything."

The officer turns around and stares from his towering height at the little inoffensive-looking civilian, humbly seated on his low stool, and resumes his former position.

"Monsieur," repeats M. Lemerrier, more emphatically, "I have told you that you prevent me from seeing the stage and I command you to get out of the way." "You command," retorts his interlocutor, in a tone of contempt, "do you know to whom you are speaking? You are speaking to the man who brought back the standards from the army of Italy."

"That's very possible, monsieur, seeing that it was an ass which carried Christ."

As a matter of course there was a duel, and the officer had his arm broken by a bullet.

The Los Angeles theaters are profiting by the absence of show places in San Francisco. Nat Goodwin is appearing in "The Genius," and "When We Were Twenty-One," at the Mason Opera House; at Morosco's Burbank Theatre in a play new to Los Angeles, "The Lady From Laramie;" Kolb and Dill are in the second week of "Roly Poly" at the Hotchkiss; the Ulrich Stock Company is presenting "At the World's Mercy" in the Grand Opera House, "What Happened to Jones" is the attraction the Belasco Theatre offers; and there is vaudeville at the Orpheum and the Chutes.

The University of California announces that the Minetti String Quartette will give its second concert in the Greek Theatre at 3:30 o'clock on Thursday afternoon, July 19. This is the third of a series of six concerts arranged for the summer by the University of California and given on Thursday afternoons by the University orchestra and the Minetti Quartette in alteration. The programme will include the Quartette in G Minor by Haydn, a "Canzonetta" by Godard, "The Bee" by Schubert, and the Quartette in D (op. 11) by P. Tschalkowsky. The Minetti Quartette consists of Giulio Minetti, first violin; Hans Koenig, second violin; Andre Verdier, viola; and Arthur Weiss, violoncello.

Jennie Lind's Tutor Is Dead.

Manuel Garcia, the discoverer of the laryngoscope, and one of the most famous singing masters of his age, died in England on July 2nd, in his one hundred and second year. He was born on the 17th of March, 1805, in Madrid, and a year ago his centenary was celebrated in London by a very notable assemblage gathered together in his honor, in recognition of his accomplishments in music and science.

It was a mere accident that led to the discovery that made Garcia famous—his finding in the shop of a Parisian instrument-maker, a little mirror attached to a stick, with which it occurred to him to try to see his vocal cords in action with the aid of a ray of sunlight. This led him to an endeavor to place the art of voice-building on a scientific, physiological basis, to explain tone-formation, registers, and tone colors, or modulations of the voice.

Garcia, himself, in later years abandoned the idea that larynxology, with its anatomical and physiological details was of much use as a basis for the science of voice-building. He fell back on the ear as the controlling factor, and followed the maxim that the secret of learning to sing lies in having a good example and trying to imitate it. He himself was a tenor of some note in his youth.

Among the more famous pupils of Garcia may be mentioned Jenny Lind, Mathilde Marchesi, Johanna Wagner, Antoinette Sterling, the Misses Macintyre, Orridge, Larkom, Thudichum, Julius Stockhausen, Batille, and Charles Santley, but the men and women whom he led to distinction formed a host. Maria Malibran and Pauline Viardot were his sisters. The physical and mental energies of Garcia never failed him even in extreme old age.

Little "Arvy" (who has had "a bad day," to driver of public coach)—"Ever lose any money backin' 'orses, coachie?" "Driver—" "Not 'alf! Lost twenty quid once—backed a pair of 'orses and a hominibus into a shop window in Regent Street!"—Punch.

"Yes, sir," exclaimed the representative of commercial interests, "this pure food law is all wrong." "What's the matter with it?" "Matter? Why, man, if we couldn't adulterate the poisons we use in our fancy goods for table use they'd be fatal."—Philadelphia Ledger.

ARMY AND NAVY.

Rear-Admiral Henry W. Lyons, U. S. N., who has been commanding officer of the Honolulu Naval Station, arrived on the Mongolia on July 3d, accompanied by Mrs. Lyons. They were met here by a tug which conveyed them at once to Mare Island. Admiral Lyons has assumed permanent command of the navy yard at Mare Island, vice Captain Alexander McCracken, U. S. A., captain of the yard and temporary commandant since the retirement of Rear-Admiral Bowman H. McCalla on June 19th.

Major-General John R. Brooke, U. S. A., retired, Mrs. Brooke, and the latter's sister, Miss Stearns, returned on the Mongolia on July 3d from a pleasure trip to the Orient.

General Frederick A. Funston, U. S. A., and Major Carroll A. Devol, Department Quartermaster, U. S. A., left on July 3d for a ten days' fishing trip in Idaho, as the guests of Mr. E. E. Calvin.

Colonel Sedgwick Pratt, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., has been placed on the retired list with the rank of brigadier-general.

Colonel William L. Pitcher, U. S. A., who was recently promoted, has been assigned to duty as commanding officer of the Twenty-seventh Infantry stationed at Fort Sheridan, Illinois.

Major S. W. Dunning, U. S. A., and Mrs. Dunning, who have recently been staying in Oakland, have gone to Burlingame and will spend the summer there.

Major Abner Pickering, Twenty-second Infantry, U. S. A., stationed at Alcatraz, has been granted six weeks' leave and left last week for Chicago to join Mrs. Pickering and the Misses Pickering, who left shortly after the fire.

Authority has been received at Division Headquarters, from Washington for Captain William G. Haan, assistant, and acting chief of staff, Pacific Division, to remain on this coast until November 1st. Captain Haan will go to the American Lake maneuvers with General Funston, U. S. A., as chief of staff. He was ordered in the first instance to go to Fort Monroe, Virginia, on August 15th for duty there. Mrs. Haan will leave late this month for Los Angeles, where she will visit friends for a few weeks before going to Tacoma to join Captain Haan.

Captain Sydney A. Cloman, general staff, U. S. A., has arrived from Washington, D. C., and will remain here until about August 1st, when he will proceed to Vancouver Barracks and march to American Lake with the Fourteenth Infantry. Captain Cloman has been detailed as observer of the maneuvers.

Captain Edward P. Orton, Second Cavalry, U. S. A., who was ordered to proceed to San Francisco to report on July 25th to the commanding general, Department of California, for duty as paymaster general of that department, has had his orders amended and will instead proceed to Vancouver Barracks and report for duty in the Department of the Columbia with station at Portland, Oregon, until the close of the American Lake maneuvers, when he will report for duty here.

Captain William T. Burwell, U. S. N., who has recently been stationed at Mare Island, and is now at Bremerton Navy Yard, has been promoted to the rank of rear-admiral, to date from June 6th.

Captain John T. Nance, Ninth Cavalry, U. S. A., has been relieved from duty on the relief work in Oakland and has returned to his duty as instructor of Military Science and Tactics at the University of California at Berkeley.

Captain Daniel W. Ketcham, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., has succeeded Captain L. R. Burgess, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., as adjutant of the Presidio of San Francisco post. Captain Burgess has been granted two months' leave of absence before proceeding to Fort Totten. He at present is visiting in Mill Valley.

Captain Lawrence B. Simonds, Subsistence Department, U. S. A., is relieved from duty as assistant to the Chief Commissary, Department of California, and left on Tuesday for Denver, Colorado, where he will report for duty as chief commissary of the maneuver camp to be located at Fort D. A. Russell, Wyoming. On completion of this duty Captain Simonds will return to California.

Captain Harry E. Howland, Ninth Infantry, U. S. A., has been detailed by order of the President, as major to command the Sixth Battalion, Philippine Scouts, vice Captain Charles T. Boyd, Tenth Cavalry, U. S. A., relieved. Captain Boyd will rejoin his troop.

Lieutenant Arthur MacArthur Jr., U. S. N., has been detached from duty on the U. S. S. Ohio, now in Chinese waters, and ordered home.

Lieutenant Graham Parker, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., left last week for the East, where he will spend three months' leave of absence.

Lieutenant John O'Neill, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., has been granted one month's leave of absence, which he is spending at Yosemite.

Ensign Caspar Goodrich, U. S. N., and Ensign Wallace Berthoff, U. S. N., have been promoted to be lieutenants from June 7, 1906, to fill vacancies existing in that grade on that date.

Cadet Henry Walter Torney, a member of this year's class of the Military Academy at West Point, has been appointed as a second lieutenant in the Artillery Corps, U. S. A. He is a son of Colonel George H. Torney, U. S. A., who commands the Army General Hospital at the Presidio.

Cadet John Sedgwick Pratt, a son of General Sedgwick Pratt, U. S. A., retired, who graduated from West Point this year, has been appointed a second lieutenant in the Artillery Corps, U. S. A.

Two companies of the Tenth Infantry, U. S. A., commanded by Major Van Vliet, U. S. A., are expected to arrive today (Saturday) on the transport Sherman from Honolulu, having come to the State for the Division Rifle Competition to be held at Monterey at the end of this month. They will probably be here about a month.

Rear-Admiral Caspar F. Goodrich, U. S. N., was the guest of honor at a dinner given recently by Mrs. Cyrus Dolph, at her home in Portland, Oregon. Twelve guests were present and about thirty more came in later for bridge. Those at dinner were, besides the guest of honor, Judge and Mrs. Charles Wolverton, Colonel and Mrs. Davis of Vancouver Barracks, Mrs. J. B. Montgomery, Mrs. W. B. Ayer, Miss Hazel Dolph, Miss Martha Hoyt, Miss Failing and Mr. Wheelwright.

Company I, Signal Corps, U. S. A., commanded by Captain William H. Oury, U. S. A., sailed from Manila for this port on the transport leaving there July 10th. On arriving here the company will proceed to Fort Omaha, Nebraska, for station.

Commander L. L. Reamy, U. S. N., Mrs. Reamy and Mr. Brewster Reamy, who are so well known on this coast have gone to Nantucket, Massachusetts for a brief stay, after which they will sail for a year's sojourn abroad.

Mrs. Goodrich, the wife of Admiral Goodrich, U. S. N., and her daughter, Miss Gladys Goodrich, returned on the Mongolia from a trip to Honolulu and Japan.

It wasn't a Missouri editor but a printer's devil who was going through his first experience in "making up" forms. The paper was late and the boy got the galleys mixed. The first part of the obituary notice of a peculiar citizen had been dumped into the forms and the next handful of type came off of a galley describing a recent fire. It read like this: "The pallbearers lowered the body into the grave and as it was consigned to the flames there were few if any regrets, for the old wreck had been an eyesore to the town for years. Of course there was individual loss, but that was fully covered by insurance."

The widow thinks the editor wrote the obituary that way because the lamented partner of her joys and sorrows owed him five years subscription. —Evening Sun.

Marshall P. Wilder tells of a young man in Wilkesbarre who had aspirations to the hand of a daughter of one of the wealthiest men in that place. Recently the hopeful one had an interview with the father for the purpose of laying the matter before him. "Well," growled the old man, "what I most desire to know is, what preparation have you made for the future?" "Oh," exclaimed the suitor, in a confident and obliging tone, "I am a Presbyterian; but if that denomination doesn't meet with your approval, I am quite willing to change."

"Ah, the bugler!" exclaimed the beautiful girl graduate. "Doesn't it always bring something to your mind to hear the call of the bugle?"

"Yes," yawned the corpulent and unromantic matron, "it always reminds me that I have a pair of scissors to grind, and if I don't hurry the scissors grinder will get out of sight." —Chicago News.

A Hindu mahatma declares that there is but one "perfect soul" in America and that is in Chicago. "Bathhouse John" or Mayor Dunne?—Kansas City Journal.

The sale of the Bible increases with wonderful rapidity. During the year ending March, 1906, nearly 6,000,000 copies of the scriptures were circulated by the British and Foreign Bible Society, which exceeded the society's previous highest output by 33,000 copies. This is the more remarkable in the face of the disturbed conditions which have prevailed in Russia, China, and Japan, where some of the society's heaviest sales take place. The polyglot nature of the Bible society's work is instanced in the fact that at Winnipeg, for example, the scriptures were supplied in forty-three different languages, while at Johannesburg versions in fifty-two languages were sold at the depot in that city, and a fifty-third was asked for by a newcomer, who demanded a Bible in Icelandic, which the agent had not in stock. During the past year eleven new languages have been added to the society's list of versions.

"Speaking of a labor agitation," began the lazy reporter. "The worst in my experience."

"Was when some one asked you to do some actual work, I suppose," broke in the city editor, who knew his man.—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

Cincinnati telephone girls are going to take boxing lessons in order to protect themselves from masher. The Cincinnati Telephone Company might simplify matters by hiring homely girls only.—Chicago Record-Herald.

In boyhood Carl Schurz was an Old World hero of romance; in the history of his native country his knightly deeds have put on an atmosphere of tradition and of myth. In manhood he battled for freedom and the life of the American union. In ripe age he stood among the honored heroes and counsellors of the republic. He passes away, leaving a blameless and beautiful fame as a precious inheritance for his fatherland and for the country of his adoption, and of his splendid devotion.—Editorial in the July Century.

IS NOW OPEN TO THE PUBLIC.

In a new and central location at 1226 Post street, near the Emporium, is the cosy home of the Vienna Cafe and Bakery. The Dining Rooms have been fitted up most elaborately making it one of the most attractive cafes in the city. The cuisine and service will receive the special attention of the proprietor, Mr. F. B. Galindo, who has catered to the San Francisco public for so many years past. A Grill, Restaurant and fine Bakery all in a handsome private residence is something entirely new and will no doubt recommend itself to ladies while out shopping. Special rooms for receptions and banquets are also one of its features. San Francisco's Original Vienna is opening up its new establishment in fine style where appetizing breakfasts, lunches and dinners are to be had at popular prices the same "as before the late unpleasantness."

The Democratic Presidential Nomination.

It is just two years since the Democratic National Convention nominated for President of the United States Judge Alton B. Parker. At that time the Democratic party seemed bent on repudiating W. J. Bryan. It is true that he was a delegate at the St. Louis Convention, but over two-thirds of the other delegates were against him when he opposed Judge Parker's nomination. He had enough of a following to force the convention to ignore the financial question in the platform. Over the financial plank Mr. Bryan waged a long and strenuous fight, resulting at last in his apparent victory. This conquest was followed by his complete physical collapse after days and nights of unceasing toil without sleep. After Mr. Bryan had retired from the scene completely exhausted, the convention turned around in its tracks and indorsed Judge Parker's telegram which declared the gold standard to be "irrevocably established."

What follows is very recent history. In the convention two-thirds of the Democratic delegates followed Parker and turned their backs on Bryan. In the Presidential election two-thirds of the Democratic voters turned their backs on Parker and followed Bryan. That is, they refused to vote for the Democratic candidate, and many of them voted for Theodore Roosevelt.

William R. Hearst was Judge Parker's opponent before the St. Louis Convention. Since Judge Parker was defeated Mr. Hearst has been actively engaged in nursing his own Presidential boom. It has been thought that Hearst and Bryan would in consequence collide. But on the 6th of July Mr. Hearst gave out to the Associated Press an authoritative statement in which he said, "I would like to state very positively that I am not a candidate for the Democratic Presidential nomination in 1908."

Mr. Hearst's announcement is variously received. The Tammany leaders think that it is disingenuous. They say that Hearst is too shrewd to oppose the present Bryan boom, which seems irresistible. But, as the National Convention is still two years off, many things may happen in the meantime. Therefore, say the Tammany men, Hearst shows shrewdness now in announcing that he is not a candidate; thus he avoids antagonizing Bryan's friends. If he stands aside now, and if anything happens to Bryan in the next two years, Mr. Hearst will surely be his political legatee. Hearst will then probably have the backing of Bryan's friends. With such backing he would, as against Senator Bailey or Governor Folk, have a walk-over.

In the meantime Mr. Hearst is in active pursuit of the Governorship in New York. His political managers say that they can secure the Democratic nomination if they want it, but that Mr. Hearst is indifferent; that his independent league will nominate him; that the independent voters will elect him; and that the Democratic convention will be forced to indorse him whether they want to or not.

What is called "the safe and sane Democracy," or the Conservative Gold Democrats of the Eastern States, have apparently determined to accept Bryan as gracefully as may be. Considering the venomous way in which they opposed him so short a time ago, it is a little awkward. But politicians may be depended upon to accomplish even more difficult flip-flops than that. There can be no doubt that Mr. Bryan's rating in the opinion of the American people has greatly changed. But it does not seem to us that Mr. Bryan himself has changed. He expresses himself concerning public questions in very much the same terms as he did in 1904, in 1900, and in 1896. True, he has stopped talking about the silver question, but he says that there is no longer a silver question. He maintains that the parity of gold and silver is adjusting itself, and it would seem as if he were not far wrong. There can be no question that during the last few years either silver has been rising in value or gold has been falling. On other matters Mr. Bryan's stand now seems conservative beside that of President Roosevelt. Some of the measures advocated by the President are infinitely more advanced than those advocated by Mr. Bryan. It is also not to be controverted that Mr. Roosevelt has gone farther in his attacks on trusts and corporations than Mr. Bryan could ever have succeeded in doing.

On the whole, according to present indications, the nomination of Mr. Bryan for the Presidency seems assured. Both the "safe and sane wing" and the socialistic wing of the Democracy seem to indorse him. The first is represented by August Belmont and his set. The socialistic wing is represented by Mayor Tom L. Johnson of Cleveland and Tom Watson, the Southern politician and writer. If Mr. Bryan becomes the nominee of the Democracy, it is believed by many Republicans that President Roosevelt is the only man who can defeat him. In that case the President may be forced to accept the nomination whether he wishes it or not.

High and Low Levels in Cities.

In visiting ancient cities the present writer has often wondered at the remarkable elevation of the modern street levels. Probably Jerusalem is one of the most ancient cities known to history which is still inhabited by man. In Jerusalem you may often see burrows descending seven or eight feet beneath the present level of the street by which the dwellers enter ancient houses. Dirty as have been and are the inhabitants of Jerusalem, it is scarcely credible that the deposition from their cutaneous real estate, even for ages, could have elevated the street levels to such an extent. Therefore there must be some other reason for this curious phenomenon. It is to be noticed in other old cities, but as Jerusalem is probably the most ancient city still in being, and unquestionably the most filthy, it is a good case in point. Jerusalem, too, is situated on a mountain range, and sits on a mountain top about twenty-five hundred feet above sea level. Dirty as is the human race, it is likewise notoriously lazy. It is, therefore, impossible to believe that the dwellers in Jerusalem could have lugged rubbish up a mountain twenty-five hundred feet in the air simply for the curious pleasure of throwing it into the street. The street is their only garbage dump, for they have no backyards. In the savage stages of existence in Northern Europe our remote ancestors accumulated "kitchen-middens" by the same propensity—to-wit, throwing their rubbish out of the front door of the hut. They were, however, more nomadic and less lazy than the Jerusalemites; therefore, when the heap of rubbish in front of their houses grew so high that they could not see over it, our ancestors simply settled the problem by moving some rods off and starting another kitchen-midden.

The Jerusalem dwellers were not so wise. They began staying still a couple of thousand years ago, and they are there yet.

The phenomena attending the rapid reconstruction of San Francisco shed some light on these perplexing problems. All over the city temporary buildings are being rushed up. They are constructed of wood, of tin, of corrugated iron, even of wooden frames with a canvas roof. These flimsy structures are occasionally varied by substantial ones of brick, steel, or stone. Yet in all except the enduring structures there is such haste to get them built that the builders care little for the foundations. They scrape and level the masses of brick, stone, mortar, plaster, cinders and ashes, until they have secured an unsubstantial foundation for their structure, and then it rears itself upward. Probably Jerusalem has been burned down many times since its first stone was laid. San Francisco is only a half century old, and it has been thrice destroyed. Doubtless it will be burned yet many times in the process of the ages, and with each successive fire we make no doubt that a new city will be erected on the ruins of the old. Into the modern city there has been pouring for half a century millions of tons of building material. Now all this is reduced to wreckage and rubbish. It is the aim of all to get it away as soon as possible. Therefore it is being "dumped" in all sorts of places which are lower than others. Market Street—which below Second Street to the bay had sunk from one to three feet—is suggested as an excellent place for dumping rubbish. So are the swamps between the Potrero and the hilly portion north of Market Street. So is much of the land east of Sansome Street. In short, in addition to the shacks which are being erected on the razed foundations, all of the vast amount of structural material which three months ago made up a magnificent city will probably remain there. But it will be in a different shape and condition. The buildings of the old city will make a substratum for the new. The debris will be used for filling the low places. It will be smeared over the surface of the city like a gigantic plaster. If its bulk could be estimated, a simple arithmetical process dividing the bulk by the space would show the aggregate raising in level of the new San Francisco.

Probably this is the explanation of the gradual raising of level in ancient cities. San Francisco is a modern one, but her down-town streets have been much raised since 1849. The level of the new down-town San Francisco will also be higher than the city of 1905. As San Francisco grows older, she will, like the ancient cities, lift herself up as she rises out of her ruins—"rising from her dead self to higher things."

The Fall Congressional Elections.

Six months ago there was a slight weak-kneed feeling among the Republican Congressmen. They could not exactly tell what made them feel so, but some of them had a feeling of apprehension in their bones. Probably what had a great deal to do with it was the prevalence of what is known as the "Iowa idea." In Iowa there are a great many Republicans who think that the tariff needs revision. There are also a great many Republicans outside of Iowa who think that the tariff needs revision. President Roosevelt himself, in his messages to Congress not many months ago, was of the opinion that the tariff needs revision. True, the President has not said so much about revision during these recent days. But it is the belief of the revision Republicans, in Iowa and outside of Iowa, that he still believes in revision. So thinking, they are inclined to believe, now that the President has Congress off his hands, that he will talk revision more than he did.

The prevalence of the Iowa idea, which alarmed so many Republican Congressmen last year, does not scare them so much now. They say that the President rather sympathizes with the Iowa revisionists, and it is quite evident that the people sympathize with the President on many things and possibly on revision. If that is the case, the Republican Congressmen who want to be re-elected will shout for "Revision and Roosevelt" when their districts are infected with the Iowa idea, and will shout for "Roosevelt the Trust Buster" in districts where their constituents do not believe in revision. They will follow the good old rule laid down by Republican leaders at the time of the greenback inflation epoch, when there was such a bitter fight between the adherents of hard money and soft money. Then the leaders gave this sage advice to Republican Congressmen going forth to do battle for votes: "You must hurrah for hard money in the East, softening it a little as you get West; but you must shout for soft money in the West, hardening it a good deal as you get East."

In the districts where the revision hurrah is inexpedient, Republican Congressmen will not only hurrah for Roosevelt, but will hurrah for the Roosevelt Congress, for the President has fairly won the right to claim the recent session of Congress as one which he controlled. It will be hard for most of the Congressmen to hurrah for Roosevelt, as nearly all of the measures which Congress passed under pressure from the White House were measures in which the Congressmen did not believe. But they do not dare to go into their districts and say about the President what they said about him in Washington. On the contrary, they intend to say that he and they "Busted the Trusts"; that he and they passed the Railroad Rate Bill; that he and they passed the Panama Canal Bill; that he and they indicted the Paper Trust; that he and they held up the Drug Trust; that he and they passed the inspection law for the meat packers; that he and they passed the Pure Food Bill. In short, after opposing the President secretly in Congress, many of them will make their campaigns under his mighty name.

An amusing feature of the campaign will also be that some of these measures forced by Mr. Roosevelt on an unwilling Congress were pet measures of Mr. Bryan. Thus, when the Republicans meet the Democrats this fall, and argue over the actions of majority and minority, it will seem as if President Roosevelt had stolen much of the Democratic thunder.

Relief Commission Clothing Problems.

Among the many puzzling problems presenting themselves to the Relief Commission for solution, one is the system of clothing distribution. The Relief Commissioners now maintain a clothing warehouse which costs them nearly five thousand dollars a month to run. They maintain another supply-house for groceries which costs them nearly as much. It has been suggested that their costly and cumbersome system of distributing clothing and groceries should be replaced by a system of orders for goods on the regular retail dealers of San Francisco. As it is now, the clothing and grocery business, as conducted by the Relief Commission, is handled by amateurs. Everybody knows what amateur work means. The best amateur theatrical entertainment that ever happened is worse than the worst professional. What the amateur distribution of food and clothing must be when compared with professional work one can readily imagine; it must be very, very bad. The unfortunate refugees have to wait for hours before they can get the attention of the amateur salesmen and saleswomen—if they will pardon us for the term; when the refugees get the salesmen's attention they often do not get the goods, because "not in stock"; or if they get the goods it is often the wrong kind. When a refugee mother asks for clothing for little Tommy, she is given the Cleopatra kind of clothing instead of the Mark Anthony brand. When the head of the family calls for shoes, instead of the desired number nines he gets some foot gear suited for a stripling. In short, these institutions as at present conducted give almost complete dissatisfaction all around.

The retail merchants are kicking because they say they are trying to make a living by hard work; why then, they ask, should the Commission, which is supposed to aid the refugees, be engaged in trying to turn hard-working retailers into refugees too? The retailers suggest that they have stocks arranged in such ways that they can furnish whatever is wanted without delay; they add that if the Relief Commission were to supply themselves merely with pencil and paper they could give orders to the refugees for whatever is wanted. Thus (say the retailers) the Relief Commission would not be obliged to haul supplies from the freight stations to the central warehouse, thence to the section warehouse, and thence to the supply stations; that all this costly hauling would be saved, and that they, the merchants, would deliver the package directly to the refugees, who now have to go after it, and sometimes have to walk miles back to their camps carrying it. And the retailers close by saying that if this plan were followed the Relief Commission would save over ten thousand dollars a month for useless and unprofitable labor, would save a vast amount of recrimination and heart-burning, and would give this trade to the people to whom it justly belongs.

We are inclined to agree with the retailers.

Printing by the Government.

A fortnight ago, discussing municipal and assisted industries, the Argonaut remarked:

"We will lay a wager that the Government Printing Office in Washington turns out the smallest output per type-setting machine per man to be found in the United States. It is probable that every linotype and monotype machine in that vast concern has its 'secret maximum,' and that every operator who exceeds that maximum output per day gets himself disliked, and that mysterious things are continually happening to his machine. In short, if one wants to know how slowly the governmental mills may grind, all he has to do is to visit Uncle Sam's printing shop at Washington."

And a good time to have chosen was Saturday, the 30th of June, 1906, at the closing of the long session of Congress.

This closing was a most remarkable one. Ever in the recollection of the oldest member had a session ended amid such a maze of disorders. There were mistakes by enrolling clerks, mistakes by printers, and mistakes by proof-readers. The day was one of terrific heat, yet through its blazing hours the House and Senate "sat around" waiting for the return of bills from the Government Printing Office. The President went down to the Capitol and at once repaired to the President's room; our Chief Magistrate never goes to the Capitol save at the end of a Congressional session. and then only for the signing of bills. But there were no bills ready for the President to sign, so he went down into the Senate barber-shop and got shaved. He returned to the President's room, but there were still no bills, so he had luncheon served. Still no bills. He then went over to the Congressional Library, where he spent a couple of hours looking around. He returned to the Capitol. Still no bills. Then the President gave it up in disgust, and returned to the White House. The Senate also grew exasperated over the delay, as finally did the House. Most of the Senators have passed the musical age, and are not fond of sky-larking, so with the hours dragged. In the House the members are younger, and they spent the day singing "Everybody works but Can-," and similar pleasing ballads, until a vocalism palled upon them. At last, after a vast amount of delay, the laggard bills were brought in, went through the Congressional machinery, and thence to the President for his signature. To the amazement and indignation of Congress the Sun-Civil Service Appropriation Bill contained an item appropriating a trifle of three millions for a building in the District of Columbia, which appropriation had been vetoed by the Senate. A Senate Committee was appointed to ascertain who was guilty of this mistake or fraud. The House is a fickle and changeable body, but the Senate never dies. It is theoretically in continuous session. Even if the House forgets its events, the Senate will not. We may expect a report from the Senate Investigating Committee at the next session.

What is the secret of these amazing incidents? They probably are due to the same cause, trades union plots and "secret numbers." Not long ago President Roosevelt was informed by the trades union men of the Government Printing Office that they had a non-union foreman book-binder discharged. President Roosevelt refused. At the union tried to take a high hand, the President is not an easy man to bulldoze, so the union backed down. Not long after the President grew alarmed at the enormous apparent waste in the Government Printing Office, and appointed a committee to investigate the conditions in that and other Government institutions. As a result the Public Printer was relieved. He was replaced by one Stillings, a Boston master printer, with an excellent reputation for executive ability, accuracy, and honesty.

Ever since then the Government Printing Office has been running badly. On the surface everything is all right, but underneath there are mutterings. The employees say that Public Printer Stillings has "put spies on them." This means that he has been introducing time-cards and having the men keep time on their jobs. Being Government employees, this they resent. They do not want to keep time on their jobs, and they do not want any Public Printer to keep time on them. So they have "had it in" for Public Printer Stillings. Evidently the troubles on the last day of Congress were the result of a prearranged plot on the part of the printers. They had determined to ruin Stillings by getting him into the bad graces of the President, the Senate, and the House. The Public Printing Office is a great pet of Congress. There never has been any attempt to stint its revenues. Correspondingly, Congress expects from it rapidity and accuracy in its work. But the printers' plot in this particular instance seems to have gone awry. Instead of Public Printer Stillings being made the scape-goat, it is probable that the President, the Senate, and the House will hold the employees responsible. Theoretically the Public Printing Office is an open shop, and no American citizen can be excluded from it because he is not a member of the union. In reality, however, it is a union shop, and the union printers there have determined to "down" Stillings, because he has been interfering with their easy jobs. But as Stillings is President Roosevelt's appointee, the printers will probably get into trouble with the President.

It Is Good to Be Honest and True.

Thus runs the old saw: "It is good to be merry and wise—It is good to be honest and true—It is good to be off with the old love—Before you are on with the new." 'Tis an excellent old saw, but let us not too soon forget our Old San Francisco before we have pledged our affection to the New.

Was the Old San Francisco honest? It would seem so. One of the pleasant things about the recent disaster in San Francisco has been the disposition of men to trust one another. We do not mean in the sentimental sense—we mean in business. When an entire community finds its records wiped out, men must necessarily do business on faith for awhile. Therefore, many firms which have saved a few memoranda are sending out account statements of what they believe to be the amounts due them, requesting their customers to "check up" from their own memoranda and let the firm know about what they think the amount is. Other firms which saved no records at all are ingenuously requesting their customers to let them know if any indebtedness is due the firm. To the honor of humanity be it said, both sides seem satisfied with the results.

These reflections refer purely to ordinary accounts, doubtless not reaching up to very large sums. When a decent interval has elapsed after the disaster, when it is not so sharply outlined in men's minds, when the fear of a tectonic hereafter is not staring them in the face, they may fall into the worldly way of each man trying to get the better of his neighbor. Then, when John thinks that he can get away James's land by indirection because James has lost all written record of his title thereto, John may yield to temptation and "jump" James's land. But may that evil day be distant. When it comes, our friends the lawyers, most of whom were cleaned out by the catastrophe, will reap rich harvests from the resultant litigation.

All of this is outside the issue. We started to tell another story. On the 14th of June we received a letter from a gentleman whom we will call John Doe. Mr. Doe wrote to us as follows:

Mill Valley, June 13, 1906.

Argonaut Publishing Co.

Dear Sirs: A couple of days before the fire I subscribed for your paper, to be sent for two years to Mr. Richard Roe, Barry, Ontario. I paid $8.00 for same to a blind newsdealer who used to stand on the corner of Bush and Montgomery streets, and took his receipt therefor. Will you kindly look on your mailing list and see if the name of Mr. Richard Roe has been placed on, and very much oblige,

Yours very truly,
John Doe.

We have always found Argonaut subscribers to be above the average in honesty. Very rarely can we recall an instance where they have attempted to do up this simple and confiding newspaper. Therefore—although this seemed to be a comparatively blind trail leading to a blind newsdealer who formerly used to stand on a corner in a city which no longer existed—we at once honored the request of Mr. John Doe, and sent the paper to Mr. Richard Roe. But meanwhile we addressed a letter to Mr. John Doe as follows:

June 22, 1906.

John Doe, Esq., Mill Valley, Calif.

Dear Sir: Yours of June 14th received in regard to a two years' subscription to the Argonaut for Mr. Richard Roe, Barry, Ontario. We will endeavor to find the newsdealer who stood formerly on the corner of Bush and Montgomery streets. Our mailing list we saved from the fire, but we regret to state that the name of Mr. Richard Roe is not on it. Would you kindly drop a line to the newsdealer, and recall the matter to his attention, and we will do the same.

Yours very truly,
The Argonaut Publishing Co.

After waiting some days nothing whatever took place. Mr. John Doe, like the blind newsdealer, seemed to have dropped into the "ewigkeit." Therefore we addressed him another letter running as follows:

June 29, 1906.

John Doe, Esq., Mill Valley, Calif.

Dear Sir: We enclose to you herewith a letter which we addressed to the Newsdealer, Bush and Montgomery St., and a reply made to same by Wakelee & Co. So far we have not been able to locate the newsdealer Barkhausen. We are sending the Argonaut to Mr. Richard Roe, Barry, Ontario, pending the result of your investigations.

Kindly let us hear from you again about the matter.

Yours very truly,
The Argonaut Publishing Co.

The letter which we addressed to the blind newsdealer and the resulting reply we also append:

June 28, 1906.

To the Newsdealer, Bush and Montgomery Sts., San Francisco.

Dear Sir: We are in receipt of a letter from Mr. John Doe of Mill Valley stating that on April 14th he subscribed through you for the Argonaut for two years and holds your receipt for $8.00 for the same, the Argonaut to be sent to Mr. Richard Roe, Barry, Ontario. Will you kindly forward receipt to us in order that we may put Mr. Doe on our mailing list?

Yours very truly,

The Argonaut Publishing Co.

This letter—addressed to a blind newsdealer who used to stand on a street corner which no longer existed in a city which had been destroyed—we sent forth with the simple and trusting faith of a little child. No pessimist would expect to receive an answer to such a letter. Yet our faith in Uncle Samuel and his postoffice was not misplaced. The puzzled mail carrier had to take the letter to the former corner of Bush and Montgomery Streets, and as there was no newsdealer there and no corner, he went to the firm that previously had a place on the corner. He went to Wakelee & Co., who had kept a pharmacy there for some thirty or forty years. Wakelee & Co. kindly replied to us as follows:

June 27, 1906.

Argonaut Publishing Co.

Dear Sirs: Your letter of June 23d addressed to the newsdealer who used to stand in front of our store has been handed us by the mail-carrier with the request to deliver it if possible. The man for whom you inquire was a blind person named Barkhausen, and we have not seen him since the disaster. We have heard, however, that he came through it safely, and is now living in one of the refugee camps around San Francisco. We return your letter and are sorry we cannot give you any further indication as to Barkhausen's address.

Yours very truly,

Wakelee & Co.

This was something. True, it was not much but it was a step forward. The blind newsdealer, unlike his corner, had not ceased to exist. He was known to be living, and was supposed to be in one of the refugee camps around San Francisco. But as there are a score of camps, and some fifty thousand people living there in tents, it seemed doubtful if we would ever succeed in finding out in which particular tent lived one Barkhausen, who was blind, and who used to sell newspapers on a corner that no longer existed.

But everything cometh to him who waits, says the proverb. The very next day we were engaged in perusing attentively the classified ads of a daily newspaper to find if anybody had for sale a left-handed automobile of good moral character that had been brought up in the country, could speak two languages, and mind the baby. We went carefully through the advertisements entitled "For sale. Miscellaneous" and found nothing of the kind mentioned. Turning sadly away, we were about to devote ourselves to other tasks when our eye fell upon the two words, "Barkhausen" and "blind." Feverishly scanning the advertisement we found that it was indeed the lost newsdealer to whom our subscriber Mr. John Doe had so confidently entrusted $8.00 on the eve of the earthquake. His ad. ran thus:

A. C. BARKHAUSEN, blind newsdealer, formerly at Bush and Montgomery sts., has now opened a periodical agency at 2801 California st.; subscriptions or orders for weekly deliveries sent to that address will be kindly received and promptly attended to; just mail your address and I will call on you.

Almost anyone will admit that this is a curious sequel of coincidences; that Mr. John Doe should subscribe to the Argonaut; that he should subscribe for his friend Mr. Richard Roe in Canada; that he should subscribe for two years in advance; that he should give the money to a blind newsdealer whom he did not know; that earthquake and fire should follow this action; that a great conflagration should sweep over the city; that it should brush away as if with a besom of destruction four hundred blocks of buildings; that Mr. Doe should search vainly for his newsdealer; that he should tell the Argonaut of his search; that the Argonaut, which never had heard of the blind newsdealer, should join Mr. Doe in his search; that both should fail; that after all, out of the upheaval and wreck and ruin of this cataclysm, the blind man should be discovered at his old business of selling newspapers in the fringe of the houses left on the edge of the city that was ravaged by ruin.

Money Here and Elsewhere.

To show how rapidly trade is reviving in San Francisco one need only look at the bank clearances. It might be imagined, after the crushing disaster of last April, that San Francisco's volume of business would have fallen off enormously. But such is not shown by the Clearing House figures. According to them the volume of trade during the month of June was only about ten per cent less than for the corresponding period during the year 1905. The bank clearances for the first week in July, 1905, were $35,210,193.17; for the first week in July, 1906, they were $37,454,268.16. These figures are indeed extraordinary. They show the enormous vitality of the city of San Francisco, and of the resources of the great State behind it.

This revival of business, be it understood, is based almost entirely on the city and State unaided. The Relief Fund can not be said to count. Many of the large donations quoted in the Eastern papers as swelling the Relief Fund were made up of food and clothing; the actual cash fund amounted to only a little over six millions of dollars. Over five millions of that sum yet remains in banks here and in the East, and therefore only about a million and a half has been expended in aiding the destitute. This sum is so small as to have an inappreciable effect on the volume of business. Furthermore, the insurance companies have scarcely begun to settle their losses. Ten or a dozen companies are slowly adjusting and paying up, but about a hundred are merely making a pretense of adjusting, and are paying practically nothing at all. Therefore insurance money in this San Francisco business revival is a negligible quantity.

The depressed condition of the stock markets in London, Paris, and New York has been ascribed by some to the effect of the San Francisco disaster on the insurance companies, as causing them to throw large quantities of securities on the market to meet their San Francisco obligations. This explanation seems to us erroneous, as the amount of money paid by them to their policy holders in San Francisco is as yet so small that it could never have entailed liquidating any such volume of securities as to affect the great stock markets of the world. There are other causes, yet it is difficult to fathom them. In London, consols, which were a year ago 92, fell during the last week of June to 87½. As the English insurance companies are large holders of government consols, they would scarcely sell them at this low price to meet their San Francisco obligations; they could not get more than 88 in any event. Therefore they would prefer to sell their American railway stocks on this side of the water rather than their English consols on the other. But even in New York they would be forced to sell their American securities on a soft and declining market. The most steady stocks in the New York list seem to be slow settling, and so soft is the stock market that it has even affected gilt-edged bonds.

The Pennsylvania Railway has succeeded in placing a fifty-million loan in Paris. This is the first time that such a large block of American securities has been placed in the French stock market. That market is also weak; the French rentes, or government bonds, fell during the last week of June as low as 98.30. The cause of this decline is also difficult to understand. It is believed that the Conservative part of the French population have taken alarm at the spread of Socialism and the strength of the Socialist leaders in the Chamber of Deputies. Led by M. Jaures, the Socialists are threatening the imposition of a heavy income tax and it is alarming the holders of government securities. Hence their disposition to look kindly on American railway bonds.

The United States Government, unaffected by the soft conditions of foreign bonds, about to place thirty million dollars of Panama bonds on the market. These bonds are at two per cents, and are offered at "not less than par." It is believed that they will sell for about 104. The Government affects to believe that it is to be a "public subscription." Very likely it may be so intended, but it is probable that the banks will get the major portion of the Panama bonds, as they are on the same basis as the refunded twos for the use of national banks in securing their note circulation. These refunded Government twos, by the way, are also extremely soft. The credit of the United States Government is higher than that of any government in the world, for since the Boer War Great Britain's consols have declined to a point lower than has been known for many years. The government whose credit stands so high that it can refund four per cents into three and three per cents into twos, certainly is in excellent financial condition. Is it not, then, a curious financial status which will make even its refunded securities sag? In fact, government securities all over the world seem to be soft. The causes are obscure. So ascribe their decline to a fall in the purchasing power of gold—on which metal the basis of first-class powers are based.

Nothing further is known of the announced intention of the Treasury Department to deposit some ten millions of dollars in the San Francisco banks. It is a matter which is entirely within the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is not quite apparent to the layman how it will advantage the business men of this city. In actual volume of currency San Francisco must be well provided, for she has been shipping back millions to the East during the last six weeks.

Fire Protection, Old and New.

For a number of years there has stood on our shelves a work in three volumes entitled, "The Old-New—Ancient History, Modern Inventions and Discoveries," by Edward Fournier. In these three volumes

I. Fournier has accumulated a vast amount of matter tending to show that most of the inventions and discoveries which we believe to be modern are really old. From so comprehensive a work it is difficult to select, but let us note briefly M. Fournier's statement that the conversion of steam into mechanical energy dates centuries back, to the time of Hero of Alexandria, who caused a ball to rotate by means of a jet of steam. This device is one of forty-five different applications of steam to mechanical uses explained by Hero. Another is a ball impelled by steam, revolving rapidly on pivots. This is singularly like the old marine oscillating engine, in which there is no connecting-rod; the piston-rod works directly on to the crank-shaft, while the cylinder oscillates, steam being fed in through the trunnions; this type is now rather out of date. Another Hero device, a horizontal wheel rotating by means of steam fed against vans, has always been admired by mechanics. The eminent French engineer, M. Leon Lalanne, wrote: "Some day perhaps the world may return to this invention by Hero." The world did return to this device in 1629, when John Branca drove a mill by directing a jet of steam against the vans of a horizontal wheel. The world now seems to have returned to it again, for the British Government in its warships, and the Cunard line in its passenger packets, are now using turbine engines, which do away with cylinders, condensers, piston-rods, slide-valves, puppet-valves, eccentrics, and other devices for transforming energy by steam into power, rotary or horizontal. This is the very latest in steam motors. It is believed that it will turn over all the existing steam-engines to the scrap-heap. Yet to the writer, who knows naught of engineering, it seems marvelously like the devices of Branca in 1629 and of Hero in Alexandria ever so many centuries ago.

Space fails us in mentioning the many so-called modern things which M. Fournier proves to be old. Let us select insurance—it is a timely topic. England had marine insurance companies in 1650. But Barcelona had them in 1433. The Florentines had them even earlier, for they are known to have existed in Florence in 1423. As for life insurance, it existed in England in 1741, in Belgium it dates back to 1568. It is said that Colonel Colt, the "inventor" of the modern revolver, once picked up an ancient revolver in a European museum, and his race was a study as he twirled its cylinder between finger and thumb. Fournier says that the revolver was invented not long after gunpowder came into use in Europe, and that in 1638 there existed a magazine gun with a revolving chamber firing six shots invented by Courveux, armorer to King Louis XIV.

What will surprise most people is that the automobile is not modern. In the eighteenth century one Joseph Michael Cugnot invented a machine which he called the "locomobile," and which, impelled by steam, made very rapid time over the roads of France. It was submitted to the First Napoleon, who appointed a committee to report upon it. Probably, like the modern automobile, it had the bad habit of breaking down when you need it most, for it disappeared from history.

These curious and interesting facts prove to us that we moderns do not possess a monopoly of intelligence. Even if we are the heirs of all the ages, we sometimes mislay our heritages. Frequently we use modern appliances that are not so good as the old ones. We are well aware that many people will disagree with us, and say that everything which is new is better than anything which is old. This belief young people particularly will most strenuously entertain, but as Professor Jowett said to his class, "Gentlemen, no one is infallible, not even the youngest of us."

We are moved to these reflections by a strange discovery which has been recently made in San Francisco. Here and there, in the desert of cinders and ashes which is now the burned district of this city, may be seen buildings or groups of buildings still standing in the midst of the surrounding desolation. They excite keen curiosity as to how they were saved. In most cases they were saved by hard fighting, or by rudimentary appliances, such as carpets and rugs dipped in wine, vinegar or other liquids. But in most cases they were saved because the owners had water supplies of their own. This was notably the case in the Mission district, where some score or more of buildings were saved because they had an individual water supply. These houses are the property of John Center, a pioneer now ninety years of age, who erected these buildings years ago, and who constructed and has retained his own water supply for his own buildings.

The strange discovery of which we speak, however, concerns a forgotten municipal fire-protection plant. The modern firemen have discovered that the old fire-boys had fifty-five water cisterns built in the early days of San Francisco, which cisterns were located in the streets. Two of these cisterns the firemen found in the Mission district were filled with water, one located at Nineteenth and Folsom Streets, the other at Twenty-second and Shotwell Streets; each cistern contained one hundred thousand gallons. The supply of these street reservoirs checked the march of the conflagration, and prevented it from spreading below Howard Street and west of Twentieth Street.

Five other cisterns were found in the Mission district, but in the course of years they had been filled up with earth and hence were useless. It is the belief of the firemen that if the seven cisterns in the Mission district had contained water the fire could have been prevented from extending beyond Fourteenth Street and that thus more than twenty blocks of business houses and dwellings would have been saved. The cisterns in the Mission are at Sixteenth and Folsom Streets, Sixteenth and Mission Streets, Sixteenth and Dolores Streets, Nineteenth and Folsom Streets, Twentieth and Howard Streets, Twenty-second and Shotwell Streets, Nineteenth and Guerrero Streets.

Some of the Mission dwellers profess to believe that these cisterns have been wrecked and filled up by the Spring Valley Water Company. This is preposterous. The water company has larger interests than any property owner in San Francisco, with the possible exception of the Southern Pacific Company. That it should attempt to deprive the city and itself of any means of assisting to extinguish fires is beyond belief. Few corporations, perhaps none, have suffered so severely in the recent conflagration as has the Spring Valley Water Company. Its directors have lost much of their private fortunes by the fire. To think that it would permit its employees to wreck any portion of San Francisco's fire-fighting system is to believe that its officials are madmen.

It is probable that the filling up of the old cisterns is due to the laborers who have worked on the streets during the past forty or fifty years, digging trenches for sewers, water pipes, gas pipes, electric conduits, etc. These laborers found it easier to dispose of their rubbish by filling up the old cisterns rather than by hauling it away. So the disappearance of the cisterns may be ascribed in the first instance to the laziness and dishonesty of workmen, and in the second instance to the inefficiency and neglect of officials, for if the fire warden, the fire commissioners, and the fire department officers have known during the last fifty years of the existence of these cisterns, and yet permitted them to be filled up and put out of commission, they are deserving of the strongest condemnation.

The Mission Improvement Association have petitioned the Board of Supervisors and the Board of Fire Commissioners to have all of these cisterns cleaned out and at once filled with water, that there may be some fire protection afforded the district independent of any other water supply. We hope that the municipal officials may at once comply with this request. It will cost very little, and it may save much of what remains. Had the cisterns been full on April 18th they might have saved many millions of dollars. In fact, it is not impossible that they might have put a stop to the fire in its beginning, for a little fire is easily extinguished with a very little water. Thus, these old cisterns of half a century ago might have saved to the city of San Francisco and to its citizens a loss of some four hundred millions of dollars. This enormous property—not counting consequential losses—had nothing to protect it from fire save a single line of water pipe.

Perhaps we know more about some things than the old fellows did fifty years ago. And perhaps they knew more about some things than we do now.

Relief for Land Owners or Renters.

New and perplexing questions daily arise in the administration of the San Francisco Relief Fund. The Commissioners are now perfecting a plan for donating five hundred dollars to each lot-owner to assist him in rebuilding, the money to be paid to the contractor on the completion of the work.

Two of the daily journals seem to approve of this, the Chronicle and the Examiner, which latter journal says: "The class of citizens who possess land on which to build a house, but lack the means, represent the class of citizens who should be aided; it is the best element of the population, consisting of economical and industrious citizens." (The foregoing must not be considered a verbatim quotation, as we take it from La Voce del Popolo.) The Italian daily thus criticises the Examiner's conclusions: "You and I, reader, who do not possess a foot of land, do not represent, according to Mr. Hearst's sheet, the 'best element' among the citizens. And although we may be industrious and of good habits we are not worthy of being aided because we do not already possess land. If the millions donated by the generosity of the American people shall be devoted to putting up buildings for small land owners instead of for giving bread to the poverty-stricken who have no land, we shall all be regaled with the most colossal philanthropic flim-flam the world has ever seen."

At first blush the scheme of aiding land owners to build houses seemed a good one. But the Italian journal seems to think that those who have nothing deserve help more than those who have something.

Well, perhaps they do. Still, the Relief Commissioners can fall back on the Good Book—"To him that hath shall be given."

The Insurance Situation.

There is a slight lull in the insurance conflict. A fortnight ago it looked as if the defaulting insurance companies were on top. Some of the honest companies seemed to be wavering. Everything seemed to be going against the policy-holders. Matters have changed slightly, however, and now things are looking more favorable for the policy-holders. Some of the companies which were on the fence are abandoning the crooked companies, and slowly going into the camp of the dollar for dollar corporations. There are various potent causes for these changes. The first, in our opinion, is the organization of the Policy-Holders' Protective League. That body, which at first seemed to lack cohesion and unity of purpose, is working out its problems admirably. There were, of course differences of opinion at the first meeting. There always are. Assembled there were radicals and conservatives. This journal espoused the cause of those who favored vigorous and radical action. It believed in fighting the insurance companies who were trying to welch, but in assisting the weak companies who honestly tried to meet their obligations. The conservatives did not believe in fighting, but in negotiating. As is usual in such cases, a middle course has been followed.

During the past fortnight the Policy-Holders' League has succeeded in securing the adhesion of a number of commercial bodies, the latest and most important of which is the Clearing House Association. That body, in allying itself with the League, says that it believes the League is "actuated by a desire to see substantial justice done to all interests aiming to promote the future business of our city in the matter of insurance protection." The alliance of the Clearing House Association with the League means not only the aid of all the commercial banks of San Francisco, but it also means that the savings banks will follow them. Before many days all the savings banks in San Francisco will be allied with the commercial banks in the ranks of the Policy-Holders' Protective League. The interior banks will at once hasten to follow the example of the city banks. This allied action of the banks will mean that no policy from a crooked company can be used as collateral with a commercial bank in California, and no property owner insured in a crooked company can borrow money on mortgage from a savings bank in California.

Another factor which is having its effect on the defaulting insurance companies is that the press and the policy-holders in the East are gradually beginning to take note of the conditions prevailing here in insurance circles. Oddly, enough, up to a fortnight ago, little attention had been paid to it there. The great journals of the East have given vastly more space to the life insurance investigation in New York than to the fire insurance situation in San Francisco. Now, however, such journals as the New York World are daily chronicling the developments in San Francisco. That journal says in a recent issue, "San Francisco could make a valuable return to the people of the United States if it would compile and publish an official list of those fire insurance companies that fail to discharge their obligations in full and of those companies that are attempting to quibble, scale down, or repudiate."

This journal intends to publish such a list, but it is impossible at present, owing to the daily defections from the "six-bit-ters," and some crookedness on the part of companies which boast that they are "paying dollar for dollar." As soon as we can secure an accurate list we shall print it.

The worst offender among the welching companies is the Traders of Chicago. That concern went into what now looks like fraudulent insolvency. It attempted to get its policy-holders here to compromise at sixty per cent, but failed. The policy-holders' attorneys in Chicago declare that the Traders is fully able to pay at least ninety per cent. In the meantime the receiver of the Traders is sending out circulars to policy-holders denying their claims on every possible ground. Some twenty-nine denials are made. These are reasons given among others: as "said policy is void because it was assigned;" or "because building was vacant;" or "because loss was caused by military power;" or "because of neglect of insured to attempt to preserve the property;" or "because interest of insured is not correctly stated;" or "because said proof of loss is further objected to on every possible ground."

It is evident that the Traders' stockholders are going to make a stubborn fight. We hope that the Traders' policy-holders will make it an ugly fight—just as ugly as it is possible to make it, keeping within the law. The rich rascals who own most of the stock in the Traders are vulnerable. Their tender spots can be sought out. Let the policy-holders whom they are trying to rob hunt them down, drag them to light, put them in the pillory of public opinion, and flog them with whips of scorpions. Make them sweat blood, if not money. And if they will not pay their debt in money, take it out in hide.

House Servants in Relief Camps.

One of the curious features of the present situation in San Francisco is the extreme scarcity of domestic servants, although there are many thousands of people out of employment. The Relief Committee frequently receives communications asking where all the female servants can have gone. According to General Greely, it seems that the relief camps are full of idle domestics. He said to the Relief Committee: "I am tired of conducting a Federal pauper house. The sooner this feeding of able-bodied men and women is stopped, the better it will be for the growth of the city. The camps are full of idle and shiftless women, yet there is a great shortage of female help. Employment agents say that they know of any number of domestics who, when asked to accept employment said, 'Why should we work? We have enough to eat and a comfortable shelter.' There are girls in camp at the Presidio who have done no work since the fire and who will not accept employment, although there is a large demand for household servants. How long are we to go on giving such people a summer outing free of cost?"

The other members of the committee followed, giving their personal experiences in the camps, and agreeing as to the impossibility of getting either male or female servants there. Mr. De Young offered a resolution, which was passed, that all unemployed able-bodied men and women in the camps be forced by the camp commanders to work at keeping the camp clean, and that if they refused they should not be accorded relief supplies or the occupancy of tents. General Greely added that he thought the food supply ought to be cut off completely by the middle of August. Dr. Devine, the chairman, added to this, "We must charge rent for the tents and shelters; until we do this it will be useless to move the people to other quarters." The San Francisco members of the Relief Commission, however, do not favor the plan of charging rental, and are disposed to be less stringent in regard to cutting off the food supply.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Why the Palace Hotel Burned.

Paris, June 23, 1906.

Dear —: I arrived here yesterday, and was very glad today to find the Argonaut at Brentano's. The old paper does not deteriorate with its queer dress—which after all counts for less than "the cognoscenti" usually think. It's not the hat but what's under it that counts. It was all pleasure to read the Argonaut again, and I was glad to see your eulogy of the Palace, where I was living when the devil put his hoof on our town. As I had my breakfast in the court that morning after the shake-up, and stayed in the hotel until ordered out, I saw the whole fight to save it. The fire had been fought off on the Jessie and Annie St. sides when the city fire department tapped the hotel hydrant and took the water away to Battery and Market. Of course that ended it; the power plant in the Quartermaster's Building took fire from the Crossley Building, and the hotel was soon in flames. I am convinced in my own mind that the Palace would have been saved if its water had been left alone.

I found in New York, in London, and here in Paris, an astonishing amount of exaggeration of the effects of the earthquake and of the sum of money contributed for relief. In New York, in my presence, in the Union Club, the sum was given as "over twenty millions"—this, of course, was absurd.

After being driven from the Palace Hotel I left my mother's trunk in the Pacific Union Club basement. After seven days of mining in the cellar of the Club—with six men—I got from the ashes of the trunk all my mother's jewels—uninjured, except that the settings were blackened.

Yours sincerely,

J. W. B.

The Argonaut is Rarely Destroyed.

San Francisco, Cal., July 9, 1906.

Jerome Hart, Esq.—Dear Sir: I am quite sure that I have read every number of the best conducted and edited weekly paper ever published in the United States, issued prior to the happening of the "late unpleasantness".

I have never preserved a file of the paper, but no copy, so far as I know, was ever destroyed in my house. The custom of the family has been after reading the Argonaut, either to give or mail it to some friend, or lay it carefully away to be sent later on with other reading matter to charitable institutions.

It occurred to me that some of the papers might have become hidden away in obscure or seldom examined receptacles, and that probably you would like to have such as were to be found; so I have searched the nooks and corners of attic and basement, the result of which is noted on the accompanying sheets.

If you would like to have the papers, or any of them, it will give me great pleasure to present them to you; but whether you care for my "find" or no, I beg that you will accept my cordial good wishes for the continued success of the Argonaut and for your own prosperity and happiness.

Sincerely yours,

Chas. E. Wilson.

We Were Glad to Get Them.

Plainfield, Conn., July 2, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—You recently said: "We shall be very glad to receive old Argonauts." I sent you a package containing about two years and half. Considering your heavy losses, I did not intend there should be any expense to you, and therefore paid the express charges through. Success being the case, I return the stamps for one dollar.

which you enclosed to me to pay the postage. Accept my best wishes.

Truly yours,
B. A. Walker.

A Two-Year Subscription.

809 Turk Street, San Francisco, July 7, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: I take special pleasure in sending you a postal order for two years subscription to your paper. "Argonauta vivat, crescat, floreat!"

Yours respectfully,
Dr. Estorjio Calderon.

From a California Jurist's Daughter.

Upper Mountain Ave.,

Upper Montclair, N. J., July 6, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—Please find enclosed my cheque for four dollars, one year's subscription or the Argonaut.

My name has long been on your mailing list, and in this the paper's day of splendid and successful effort to continue its high standard of excellence I take pleasure in securing its weekly coming.

The Argonaut not only represents the quintessence of what is most lovable and honorable in San Francisco, but it draws into its columns, as surely as a magnet draws iron, all that is witty, eloquent, and curious in the world's social and intellectual ferment.

With congratulations, I remain

Truly yours,
Annie Lake Townsend.

A Suggestion from Paris.

9 Rue Compagne Premiere,
Paris, France, June 29th, 1906.

To the Director of the Argonaut.—Dear Sir: I take the liberty of requesting you to publish my idea concerning the rebuilding of the new San Francisco. It is this: that San Francisco should shape matters that Chinatown may not become a horror to the city as it has been. I would propose, for the best interests of all, that Chinatown should be rebuilt outside of San Francisco. It could be built in genuine Chinese style, with temples, pagodas and gardens, with all the bizarre phases of architecture found in the Chinese cities.

Yours very truly,
Matilda Lotz, Artist.

American Interests in Japan.

Yokohama, June 23, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: By this post, I am sending you marked copies of the "Japan Gazette" of Yokohama for June 15th and 20th, and the "Japan Mail"

Yokohama for June 20th, containing articles on the "Shipping Competition to Shanghai" between a Japanese line of steamers, the "Nippon Yusen Kaisha" and a British line controlled by Messrs. Butterfield & Swire. From the attitude you have maintained in your paper in your endeavor to safeguard American interests from eventual competition with Japan, I believe you will find the language and terms used by the mouthpiece of the Japanese line rather entertaining.

It is generally understood, locally, that Capt. F. Inkley, editor of the "Japan Mail", is relied on by Japanese authorities, and expected by them, sugar-coat any pill administered by the Japanese to foreigners which is not calculated to be pleasant to swallow, and to officiate as "Lord High Mootier of Rough Edges" whenever such service is needed.

Very faithfully,
An Over-Seas Subscriber.

From New South Wales.

98 Pitt Street, Sydney, 7th June, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: I have your issue of the 21st, which I shall preserve as a memento of one of the most appalling disasters in history.

All Australians sympathize with Californians in this terrible calamity which has overtaken the City of the Golden Gate; and those who know Americans appreciate the fact that their hearts are brave enough to survive the awfulness of any temporal disaster, and that, as a Phoenix from the ashes, will rise a still greater and more beautiful San Francisco to realize the aspirations and accomplish the destinies of the people of the Pacific Slope.

As the old Roman poet, "aere perennius" says,

"Justum et tenacem propositi virum
Mente quatit solida, neque Auster
Nec fulminatus magna manus Jovis;
Si fractus illabatur orbis
Impavidum ferient ruinae".

Allow me, further, as a subscriber, now for so many years, to your admirable journal, which I always read with interest, pleasure and profit, also sympathize with you in your own peculiar loss, to express the hope that, ere long, the Argonaut will appear in its old form. It could not be better, to all its old readers and to many more new ones.

Yours sincerely,
H. Peder Steel.

The Argonaut a Necessity.

Eureka, Cal., July 13, 1906.

Last week I mailed you a few Argonauts of early date, and have received your courteous acknowledgement. Today I mail five more which I treasured in my library. It affords me great pleasure to be able to contribute even so little towards the completion of your files. I have been a reader and subscriber since the first issue, and I mailed it to my friends in the East. The Argonaut! I cannot do without it. To me it is an absolute necessity, and I admire the way you have taken up the burden once more and I wish you all the success you are entitled to for your "grit" and perseverance.

Cordially yours,
Mrs. E. J. Chamberlain.

THE NEW SAN FRANCISCO.

Some Architects' Suggestions Concerning the Possibilities in Rebuilding.

It is so seldom that a city has the opportunity to build any considerable number of its houses at one time, that it seemed worth while to call attention to the possibilities for some harmonious action in rebuilding San Francisco. With this in mind, the editor of The House Beautiful invited expressions from a few leading architects in various parts of the country.

Russell Sturgis, of New York, wrote: The important thing in rebuilding a city, as in building a new one, is to design and complete attractive buildings. That is what Chicago and New York, Boston and Baltimore, are without—or so nearly destitute that exceptions do not count. If you can persuade the owners of property to employ architects of some training and much originality of mind, and if those architects, once employed, will go to the spot, work out their designs, and produce for each house the best that can be thought of under the circumstances, you will provide what San Francisco needs, and what all of the villages and towns of the United States need equally.

Any attempt to carry out schemes of uniformity of style will be giving the unnecessary, the fanciful, the non-artistic result in the place of the seriously important one. It is like ornaments—the vases and statuettes—in our sitting rooms: if they are fine in themselves, and especially if they are fine in color, they suit one another marvelously—Oriental and modern French, ancient Greek and modern American amateur experimental, all go together in a wonderful way. And if you would remind me that the owner of these gimcracks has of necessity some taste in their arrangement, and that this arranging is just what cannot be done to houses in a street, I remind you in return that the houses in the street have natural foliage to lend its powerful aid in harmonizing them.

Myron Hunt, of Los Angeles, wrote: I had but one residence in the earthquake district, and have just returned from its examination. It is situated on Russian Hill, which is next to the highest point of rock within the city of San Francisco. Owing to the size of the property and to the existence of a large amount of barren rock surface in the immediate neighborhood, this residence and seven others are the only buildings within a radius of more than a mile which were not touched by the fire.

The residence is that of Mr. Livingston Jenks, formerly of Chicago. It cost approximately $40,000 and was built by days work. Neither labor, material nor money was spared in the erection of the structural part of the building. It was occupied at the time of the earthquake. The entire rock upon which it stands was swayed to an extent which made it almost impossible for the occupants to get from one room to another. Pictures, statuary and bric-a-brac were thrown about indiscriminately. Nevertheless, $25 will repair the damage done. There are three cracks less than one foot long, which appeared in two rooms. The cracks are at the bases of segmental arches, and are no worse than shrinkage of timber might have produced. The chimneys were laid in cement and are entirely intact. The two and one-half story vaulted hall (plastered on framework, the wood-lath reinforced at all angles with one-half inch mesh chicken-wire before plastering) is entirely without cracks. The plastering is three-coat work, ordinary lime material, tempered with 10 per cent of imported keen cement.

The least damage was done where buildings stood on a rock foundation; the next least damage where buildings stood upon natural soil; the greatest damage where they stood upon filled ground.

Buildings of wooden construction, when the framework was well braced and the plastering of good quality, suffered practically no loss, unless they stood on filled ground. Their chimneys were, however, thrown down above the roof line, except in cases where full eight-inch walls were used and the brick laid in cement, in which cases most of these chimneys withstood the quake.

Brick buildings of all classes suffered most. The greatest damage is noticeably in brick buildings where joists were not thoroughly anchored to the wall. Much San Francisco brick work was laid dry; that is to say, the bricks were not wet before laying. The earthquake and fire threw these walls down, and the bricks lie on the ground, practically clean of mortar because of faulty laying. Well built brick walls, laid in cement, stood surprisingly well.

Well built stone buildings of all classes did not suffer much from the earthquake, but suffered greatly from the fire. Granite acted as it always does in a fire, and was the worst of all stone. Bad stone ashlar, not well bonded to the backing, was in many cases thrown off, as might be expected.

There was not enough steel frame residence work to call for any comment. Owners of steel frame office buildings, however, had almost no loss from the earthquake, and have the least loss from the fire.

San Francisco labor unions and material associations have prevented reinforced concrete from being used to any great extent in the city. There were many reinforced concrete floors in business buildings, however, and they are in remarkably good shape. In the towns about San Francisco there are a few reinforced concrete residences. I have data on one of them only. Next door to it there stood a frame building which was better built than the average. It was not entirely finished, but the roof was on. This frame building collapsed into mere kindling wood. The reinforced concrete building next door had its chimney thrown down from above the roof line. It now develops that these chimneys were built of brick and not of concrete. Except for the loss of its chimneys, there is literally no damage to this residence. After the earthquake the owner telegraphed the contractor that he wanted to go into the reinforced concrete business with him.

My conclusions are that all forms of construction, when thoroughly carried out, will continue to prove safe for San Francisco: that the steel frame or reinforced concrete construction is the most safe, both against loss of life and damage to property, but that in putting up steel frames and reinforced concrete structures, architects will in the future be more strenuous in insisting upon at least one full cross-wall in each direction, made of solid masonry, with the idea of furnishing an interior structural brace against the twisting motion of an earthquake. Such walls undoubtedly saved the veneering on the exterior from being cracked or thrown down by the whipping and twisting motion produced by the earthquake.

The loss by the earthquake impresses a visitor as being less than he expected, but the loss by the fire is greater than any written description can make an outsider comprehend.

A widow in a Maine town, according to the Boston Herald, was a strict constructionist in her theology, and would admit no lodger into her boarding house who had not a leaning toward Universalist views. One day an old sea captain happened along to ask for rooms.

"But what do you believe?" asked the widow.

"Oh, most anything," replied the captain.

"Do you believe there is a hell?"

"Sure," was the reply.

"Well," parried the widow, "how many do you think will go there?"

The captain cautiously remarked that he thought twenty thousand would be a fair estimate.

The widow paused, then stated that he could come in. "Twenty thousand," she said, "is better than none."

EARTHQUAKE ECHOES.

The Great Shock of October 21, 1868.

"What's that?"

"I don't know. It looks as if the roof were falling in."

Thus my companion and myself. We were driving in a buggy down Broadway, Oakland, and were looking at a building then called the "Wilcox Building." It was the morning of October 21, 1868.

As I said, we were looking at this building. A new story had just been added to it and we were speculating as to the safety of making such additions to buildings whose walls were only designed for structures of lesser height. It was five minutes to eight o'clock. We had pulled up, and were looking curiously at the new story, when my companion made the remark:

"What's that?"

It did indeed look as if the roof were falling in. The walls bulged out, the roof seemed to sink, the building moved slightly and then recovered its perpendicular. We were both so amazed that we could only stare in open-mouthed wonder.

At this moment I noticed that the horse was acting queerly. He did not look as if he were going to run away but simply as if something extraordinary were puzzling his equine brain. I fancied there might be something wrong with the harness and giving the lines to my companion jumped out to see. As my feet struck the ground I thought for a moment I must be mad. The earth rocked beneath me; it rocked with such violence that I could hardly stand. I seized the shaft, partly to steady myself and partly to get to the horse's head, for he was giving signs of such agitation that I feared he might run away.

As I got to the horse's head, there was a dull, rumbling roar, and a cloud of dust rose up and down the street. Then there was a crashing, jingling sound, and I saw the many window-fronts upon Broadway falling into the street. Following them came an avalanche of bricks and mortar from falling chimneys and fire-walls. And last of all came a dense mass of people from the shops and houses. Your human does not move as quickly as inanimate objects during an earthquake. When he does, he sometimes regrets it, for if he arrives at the same time as the falling bricks and mortar, he wishes he hadn't—unless, of course, he be a good Christian, whose salvation is all fixed and his goods deeds chalked up, in which case, of course a pious joy should pervade his breast.

All that I have related took but a few seconds. And in about a minute after the shock began Broadway was filled with runaway teams of every description.

There was at that time an open square, or vacant lot, on Broadway, containing nothing but trees. I remember noticing these trees and being struck, even then, at their absurd appearance. (One thinks quickly during an earthquake.) As the waves of the earth-spasm rolled along, the trees rose and fell, inclining first to one side, then to the other, bobbing and bowing in a ludicrous fashion.

Those who were on the San Francisco side of the bay that morning may think this description of the shock exaggerated. But when they consider that the local center of the earthquake of '68 was evidently at San Leandro, they will see that they are mistaken. Over there some buildings were entirely demolished, others twisted upon their foundations, and fissures and cracks opened in the earth many rods in length. Scarcely a chimney was left standing in Oakland or in Alameda.

A curious phase of the earthquake was the belief on the part of the Oaklanders that San Francisco was destroyed. A thick haze hung over the bay. It was impossible to see any of the spires and towers of San Francisco. The telegraph wires were down; the drawbridge over San Antonio Creek was thrown out of gear by the shock; the train (there was but one then) was penned up on the other side of the estuary. The only way of reaching the city was by the freight-boat which then ran on the creek. To this repaired the anxious Oaklanders and we still more anxious San Franciscans.

On the pier at the foot of Broadway was a crowd of several hundred men. It was divided into little groups, in the center of each of which was an excited man, telling where he was and what he did at the time of the shock. He was perpetually being interrupted by other excited men who wanted to tell what they did and where they were. Every man in every group was engaged in moving his arms windmill-wise to illustrate how the earth had quivered. In moments of excitement, the Anglo-Saxon race becomes as gesticulative as the Latin.

One man in particular I remember. He was one of those small men with immense fustian voices—one who could out-roar everyone else, and by virtue of his superior lung power had succeeded in telling his personal experience over any number of times. As soon as he had finished it, he began it again.

It may be necessary to remark here that all through the morning of October 21, 1868, there were continuous shocks. People had their nerves completely unhinged by the first shock, and the gentle yet ominous oscillations of Mother Earth kept them permanently so. I will further remark (apparently without relevancy) that there was an immense heap of coal piled up on the edge of the pier.

The little man with the big voice was still talking. His oration ran thus:

"You see we had just got up from breakfast when that there fust shock come. My wife she started to run. I says to her, 'Now, Jemima,' says I, 'whatever is the use of a-runnin'? Stay right where you are. There ain't no use a-runnin'.' But she wouldn't listen to nuthin' so I just grabbed her and held her until it was over. And what do you think?—when that shock come to an end, Jemima she had fainted, and I was just as cool as I am now."

"Drip-drip-drip-drip!"

The coal was falling into the water over the edge of the pier. Every one turned—the slightest noise was ominous.

"Drip-drip-drip-drip! Plash! Dash. SPLASH!"

The pier was rocking to and fro—first gently, then with vigor, then with a vicious thump which meant mischief. There was a sudden absquatulation to dry land. The crowd resolved itself into an immense and swiftly moving fan, the apex pointing toward the shore. The apex was our friend, the little man with the big voice.

At this point many of the Oaklanders lost their interest in San Francisco. They could not be again induced to go upon the pier. They contented themselves with vaguely remarking that they "would wait and see," and with whooping up others who seemed disinclined to go.

At last the boat made her appearance. I think it was the old ferry-boat "Louise," long since disappeared from these waters—under that name, at least. It was not a very large crowd that boarded her. There was a good deal of talk about tidal waves and things, and the people looked upon us very much, I fancy, as the Spaniards did upon Columbus when he set out on his voyage into unknown seas.

Most of us, as I have said, were San Franciscans. On the boat, I remember, was Michael Reese. Michael was drenched with woe. He feared that where San Francisco had reared her fair tower-crowned hill-tops to the sky, there was nothing but ashes, dust, and desolation—hence pecuniary damage to Michael Reese. He was a large, adipose, greasy mass of suffering. He even wept. Tears ran down his fat cheeks, and mingled with the imperfectly removed remnants of his breakfast.

A group stood around him, attempting to comfort him. I do not fancy they felt anything but contempt for him, yet they respected his millions. And this blubbery millionaire was being coddled like a blubbery school-boy.

"Ach Gott!" sighed Michael, blowing his nose with a large red bandanna handkerchief, "ich bin ruined! All dose years vat

I shtruggle vos tron away. Who could del nodings about an erdkvake, I like to know! Dot is not like fire. Dose insurance companies dey will not pay me nodings. Lieber Gott! Berhaps dose insurance kompanie vos gone up too."

And a fresh burst of tears came to the relief of the over-burdened millionaire.

John W. Dwinelle approached, and satirically comforted the weeping Dives.

"Do not be so cast down, Mr. Reese," said he. "Things are not so bad, I imagine, as they are represented. We shall presently be in sight of the city, and I think we shall see it standing. Ah, excuse me, Mr. Reese—you had eggs for breakfast, I fancy."

And he indicated to the weeper a large mass of egg-yolk upon his starboard jaw partially mixed with tears. Michael scrape it off, and resumed his weeping.

But soon we came where the fog-veil was not so thick, and the top of the shot-tower was seen piercing the haze. I remember that some enthusiastic spirits gave three cheers for the safety of the city. And as we gradually approached the pier, it was seen that the city was apparently all there. We did not learn until later that the shock had been lighter on the San Francisco side than on the other.

We hastened up the streets, looking for damaged houses, ruined walls, and corpse. We did not see as many as we had expected. Coming up Clay Street, however, near Sansome, there was a frightened boy, who, surrounded by many people, was pointing at a mass of blood and brains upon the sidewalk. His jaws were working convulsively but no sound came from them. A bystander told me that the boy had witnessed the death of the man whose brains had been dashed out, and which sight so horrified him that he had remained thus ever since the shock—a matter of a couple of hours. The man, it seems, had run out of the building when the first shock came, and had reached the sidewalk just in time to catch the falling fire-wall upon the top of his head.

I do not propose to weary my reader with an account of the earthquake. It is a recent history. But these things came in my head the other morning, when I was awakened at five o'clock by the familiar brating, twisting, grinding motion—the creaking of the groaning bricks, the ominous rumble of the shuddering metal roof. I said to myself: "The most severe shock since '68." And, so saying, these recollections came to me, and I jotted them down.

But I will indulge myself in relating a few or two anecdotes which I recall. There was a gentleman here from the East at the time who had been sighing for an earthquake. He had met many like him, by the way, but never saw any of them who wanted to feel two. I do not refer to temblors, but to good stiff shocks. No one who has ever felt one wants to feel another.

This pilgrim, then, had been yearning for an earthquake. Fortunately for him came before he went away. He went away as soon as he could get away, I may say. He was living in Brenham Place, and was awakened by the shock. He arose. He knew what it was. No man needs an introduction to an earthquake. He fled through the door. He nearly took it with him. He was only in a short night-shirt, but despite the fact he went into the center of the Plaza; there remained. He could not be induced to re-enter the house. Finally he hired a small boy to go and get his clothes, dressed himself in the heart of the population.

Later in the day he ventured out of the Plaza, and, accompanied by Tommy Newcombe, President of the Bohemian Club, went to Barry and Patten's to get a drink. The barkeeper mixed the drinks and placed them upon the counter. Newcombe pushed his back, requesting the barkeeper to take the ice out. The other did the same. It was half-past ten o'clock. There was a slight jingle of glasses, then a crash, and the bar leaned forward and courtesied to two friends in the most familiar fashion. The barkeeper was almost buried in a vitreous avalanche. The Eastern man knew, without being told, that this was another earthquake.

quake. He made for the street. He got there before anybody else in the house. These Eastern men are very quick to learn about some things—particularly earthquakes. He reached the street with such impetuosity that he was on the other side before he knew it. There was a building here belonging to Sam Brannan, the top of which was crowned with two long stones, meeting like a V. One of these fell with the second shock, just as our Eastern friend reached the sidewalk. The stone came shooting down like a conical projectile, struck the flagged sidewalk, made a clean hole, and disappeared in the depths below. The hole was about six inches away from the Eastern man. He nearly fell into it. He took the steamer for home.

When this shock took place I happened to be in the Odd Fellows' Bank, then on Montgomery Street, opposite where the Safe deposit building is now. A group of us were talking over the first shock. I remarked that I had not been inside of a building when the first shock came, but that, had been, I would have remained. I further said that I considered running from a building as highly dangerous, instancing the unfortunate man who was killed on Clay street as a case in point. All agreed with me. One in particular—a friend named Maillot—remarked:

"You are perfectly right. The man who could run out of a building during an earthquake shock is a d—d fool."

The words were scarcely out of his mouth when the half-past ten o'clock shock came. He does not remember very distinctly how I got there, but in about three seconds I found myself in the middle of the street. I have no recollection of coming down stairs. Strange to say, all the other men were there too. Maillot looked at me and remarked with grim humor:

"I thought you never ran from an earthquake."

"I never do."

"But you ran then."

"No. I didn't run. I flew."

So I did, and I very much fear I may gain. H.

Argonauts for Our Files.

In response to the Argonaut's request for loose and unconnected copies of the Argonaut which we would be glad to have in order to build up complete files, we have received packages of papers from a number of our readers. Among the many who have very kindly sent us papers and to whom we extend our thanks are the following:

Mr. S. K. Ballard, 3237 Briggs Ave., Alameda, Cal.

Mr. B. Neustadter, Portland, Ore.

Mr. Charles H. Schilling, 957 Fourth Ave., Oakland.

Mr. H. F. Hamilton, 125 Marlborough St., Boston, Mass.

Mr. Chas. E. Wilson, 1117 Mission St., S. F.

Mr. Sam Mayer, 1324 Monadnock Block, Chicago.

Mr. Bartholomew Noyes, 225 Albany Block, Oakland.

Mr. Victor Whitman, Redwood, Cal.

Mrs. Charles G. Hickox, 579 Prospect Ave., Cleveland, Ohio.

Mrs. J. W. Glennan, Redwood, Cal.

Mr. H. E. Green, Belle Fourche, So. Dak.

Melvin G. Dodge, Associate Librarian, Library, Stanford University.

Prof. Henry Senger, Berkeley, Cal.

Mr. S. O. Richards, Victoria, B. C.

Mr. Frankenau, Sanger, Cal.

Mrs. E. J. Chamberlin, Eureka, Cal.

Miss A. F. Gardiner, Victoria, B. C.

Mr. E. Roemer, Alameda, Cal.

Those cheers for Bryan at Secretary Taft's meeting of Southern Republicans seem to be a warning to Republican speakers in the Congressional campaign not to mention the Nebraskan's name.

OLD FAVORITES.

The Burial of Sir John Moore.

In the July number of the Critic there appears an astonishing article under this heading: "An Astonishing Discovery—'The Burial of Sir John Moore' taken from the French of Lally-Tollendal, by Henry N. Hall." The "Astonishing Discovery" which Mr. Hall has made is this:

"The Reverend Charles Wolfe is generally supposed to be the author of a single poem, 'The Burial of Sir John Moore,' which alone has sufficed to perpetuate his memory. As a matter of fact, he only translated it from the French. The extent of his indebtedness will be apparent to all who read 'Les Memoirs de Lally-Tollendal,' published by his son."

The poem was written under the following circumstances, according to Lally-Tollendal, per Mr. Hall:

"In 1749 a Colonel de Beaumanoir, a native of Brittany, raised a regiment in his neighborhood, and with it accompanied Lally-Tollendal's ill-fated expedition to India. The Colonel was killed in defending Pondicherry—the last stronghold of the French—against the forces of Coote. He was buried at dead of night by a few faithful followers on the north bastion of the fortress, and the next day the French fleet sailed for Europe with the remnants of the garrison. Lally-Tollendal was executed in 1766, but a worthy son made noble efforts to rehabilitate his father's memory. The memoirs were widely circulated and must have come into the hands of the Reverend Mr. Wolfe, who, though he stole, did not mar in the stealing."

Following this history of the genesis of the poem, Mr. Hall gives the text of Charles Wolfe's poem:

Not a drum was heard, not a funeral note,
As his corpse to the rampart we hurried,
Not a soldier discharged his farewell shot
O'er the grave where our hero we hurried.

We hurried him daskly at dead of night,
The sods with our bayonets turning;
By the struggling moonbeams' misty light
And the lantern dimly burning.

No useless coffin enclosed his breast,
Not in sheet or in shroud we wound him;
But he lay like a warrior taking his rest
With his martial cloak around him.

Few and short were the prayers we said,
And we spoke not a word of sorrow;
But we steadfastly gazed on the face of the dead,
And we bitterly thought of the morrow.

We thought as we hollowed his narrow bed
And smoothed down his lonely pillow
That the foe and the stranger would tread o'er his head
And we far away on the hillow!

Lightly they'll talk of the spirit that's gone,
And o'er his cold ashes upraid him,—
But little he'll reck, if they let him sleep on
In the grave where a Briton has laid him.

But half our heavy task was done,
When the clock struck the hour for retiring;
And we heard the distant and random gun
That the foe was sullenly firing.

Slowly and sadly we laid him down,
From the field of his fame fresh and gory;
We carved not a line, and we raised not a stone—
But we left him alone with his glory.

Printed in parallel columns Mr. Hall gives what he calls the "original of the poem."

This is indeed an "Astonishing Discovery." In fact, it is so astonishing that it arouses a certain amount of incredulity in the mind of the average reader. It did not take long for Mr. Hall's discovery to bring forth some comment. Two or three days later this appeared in the New York Evening Post, signed by Russell Sturgis:

The question about "The Burial of Sir John Moore" and its French origin was raised by F. J. Mahony in 1837; and with the same suggested answer as in your paragraph of yesterday's issue. In Volume 1 of Bentley's Miscellany, p. 96, appears the third "Scrap" by Father Prout; and with this is printed what seems to be the whole of Lally-Tollendal's poem: eight stanzas of four lines each. The poem is credited to the "Appendix to the Memoirs of Lally-Tollendal" (sic) by his son.

To any one who is familiar with the life and writings of Francis Mahony, the witty Irish priest, the mere appearance of his name as asking a question which was answered by "Father Prout," the pseudonym he most affected, is in itself suspicious. Mr. Sturgis speaks guardedly, but it is evident that he entertained doubts as to the gravity of Mr. Hall's "Astonishing Discovery."

A day later another writer hastened to shed light on this literary discovery. He wrote as follows:

The French version of "The Burial of Sir John Moore" is so obviously a jeu d'esprit in Father Prout's usual manner that one would think a knowledge of its source should be sufficient to enlighten any one as to the value of the discovery.

Reference to the same authority will show that the best of Moore's Irish Melodies were also plagiarized from a French original, and that the "Groves of Blarney" is derived from the Greek. In fact, the "Reliques" should prove a treasury of mares' nests, if there is any demand for the article.

The Dictionary of National Biography says in reference to these verses: "To the same number (the first issue of Bentley's Miscellany) he contributed a clever French rendering of 'The Burial of Sir John Moore' which he entitled 'Les Funerailles de Beaumanoir,' and pretended to regard it as the original of the poem."

That Father Prout should have proved to an astonished world that Moore's Melodies were also plagiarized from the French, and that "The Groves of Blarney" was stolen from the Greek, arouses grave suspicion as to his discovery concerning the original of the poor parson's poem. But suspicion is at once allayed by the direct statement in the "Dictionary of Biography" that it was Father Prout himself who had made the French version, in order that he might accuse the unfortunate Mr. Wolfe of having stolen it.

Mr. Hall is as unfortunate in his literary discovery as the Critic is in having discovered Mr. Hall. It is another illustration of the fact that there are many good people in the world who believe only that which is incredible.

The Republicans of North Carolina opened their convention in Greensboro with some 1500 delegates and alternates in attendance, the largest gathering in the State since 1876.

Nevada Republicans are stirred up over a report to the effect that Victor H. Metcalf and Congressman Needham of California are seeking Federal Judgeships and that one of them wishes to succeed Thomas E. Hawley, who recently retired from the Federal Court at Carson City. Leading Republicans say the Nevada Judgeship belongs to a Nevada man and that the Republican State ticket will be defeated if a non-resident is appointed by the President.

Michigan Central railroad officials believe that their Canadian line, formerly known as the Canadian Southern railway, has a record in the matter of safe travel unequalled by any road. That line, which is about 500 miles long, has never killed a passenger from train accident in all the 31 years of its operation. The Michigan Central lines in the United States unfortunately are not able to show any such record as that.

VANITY FAIR.

Mr. and Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, the American ambassador and his wife, who was a daughter of D. O. Mills of San Francisco, have done wonders for Mr. and Mrs. Longworth. No one in the diplomatic circle ever lived in greater splendor or entertained in a more sumptuous manner. It is costing Mr. Reid between $250,000 and $300,000 a year to keep the American eagle screaming, writes Wm. E. Curtis from London. If he remains four years, it will cost him at least a million dollars to gratify his social ambitions. His house rent is $40,000 a year, and he has a country seat for the summer, for which he pays $20,000. His embassy is the most sumptuous residence on Park lane, the most famous residence thoroughfare in London, and it is said to be insured, with its contents, for $5,000,000. The mansion is called Dorchester House; it ranks next to Buckingham Palace, the residence of the King, in magnificence. It surpasses Marlborough House, the residence of the Prince of Wales. The drawing rooms are arranged so that they open one into another, and combined can accommodate over a thousand people without crowding. The White House at Washington would look insignificant beside the American embassy in London. To maintain this establishment Mr. Reid has more than fifty servants, and those who are seen by the public wear liveries of light blue and gold, with broad revers of buff heavily trimmed with gold braid. The house belongs to Major Holford, a bachelor equerry of King Edward, and it is a rather singular coincidence that he should have attended his royal majesty the other night to be entertained in his own house by his American tenant.

The reverse of the embassy medal is shown in another dispatch: Some of the scenes at the American Embassy's offices in Victoria street during the first part of the Longworths' stay in London were almost indecent. The wretched staff was busy all day warding off infuriated ladies from the Wild West who declared that they were entitled as American citizens to be invited to Dorchester House to meet "our President's daughter." The butler and footmen at Dorchester House had to fight hard to prevent battalions of Americans from dashing through the hall without even presenting cards.

A Paris journal, Le Petit Parisien, publishes an editorial severely criticizing what it calls the "pomp and pretension" of the Longworth journey to Europe. Says the writer, apropos of the President's daughter and her husband:

"The manner in which their time will be employed is noted in advance with a precision which could be equalled only if it were a sovereign, accompanied by her royal husband, who was engaged in making a tour outside her own states. This display seems excessive. It is a good thing to be the daughter of a President of the United States, but it is not enough to warrant this young person receiving any more homage than is due any other equally charming member of her sex. Mrs. Longworth would show a nobler sentiment in being merely proud of her father, instead of seeking the flattery consequent upon personal grandeur. A wedding journey conducted with less ostentation would have been in better taste."

The tide of American visitation to Europe this year will rise far above the previous high water mark. The lowest estimate is that 250,000 Americans will land on European shores between May 15 and August 15, and that the sum of $500 is a fair average of individual expenditure. It is easy to believe that the aggregate will be at least $250,000,000. Of this huge total the largest share falls to Switzerland. That region has more than 2,000 hotels, little and large, employing an aggregate of 30,000 people, and the influx of travelers is already taxing the resources of all. Some of the hotels have retained all the cottages of the peasants near them for the season.

A. Barton Hepburn, former Comptroller of the Treasury and now president of the Chase National Bank, asserts that at least $400,000,000 is what it will cost this country for the expenses of its tourists in 1906.

Mr. Hepburn said: "The extravagant expenditures of American tourists abroad are responsible for the present conditions in the money market. These expenditures now reach the enormous sum of $400,000,000 or $500,000,000 a year.

The estimate of Mr. Hepburn was submitted to Thomas Cook & Son, who have wide experience in the tourist business. The New York manager said: "I don't believe it. It doesn't stand to reason. Our business touches, in general, persons from moderately rich to those with small incomes. Going to Europe is not so costly a job, when it's figured out right, as many think. Once you're on the other side you can travel and stop wherever you like, with good accommodations, all covered by an expense of $6 to $10 a day. Any more can be set down to the extravagance of a few of our suddenly-rich Americans but as a factor in American expenditures abroad these extravagant individuals count for very little. Bear in mind that a trip to Europe is the dream of almost every cultivated American. School teachers save their salaries for years to go. Ministers also and business and professional men.

"Most European travelers come back with 10 per cent. of their letters of credit unexpended."

It has been made abundantly plain, says the Springfield Republican, that the American public is becoming more and more infatuated with the theater. It is an exceptional magazine among the cheaper sort which does not make the prodigious display of the charms of actresses its chief stock-in-trade. Art is nothing. Before the multitude of young girls are flaunted the prizes of the "profession"—to work hard to master technic, to learn to interpret nobly the masterpieces of the great dramatists? Not at all; but to wear a costly Paquin gown and amazing diamonds to take a haughty Early Norman stage name, to reach somehow, if not the center of the stage, at least "the front row," to dazzle the public by sheer force of beauty, to be admired, stared at, appraised inch by inch, snapped up by the highest bidder—this is the debasing ideal of a noble profession which is being insidiously fostered among countless silly young people. Flamboyant accounts are given of the prodigious "achievement" of this or that brainless beauty who had but to show herself on the stage to marry a spendthrift earl or the prodigal son of a millionaire. The woman concerned in the White-Thaw case was in one of last month's magazines made to figure in a galaxy of splendidly fortunate stage betuties! It is not, then, wonderful that in every city and town in the country there are vain girls who know nothing of acting, who care nothing for acting, but feel sure that with fine clothes they, too, could be brilliant, conspicuous, bave their names in men's mouths, see their pictures in the magazines, enjoy a life of unlimited fun, glory and champagne.

Beauty has its market, no less than talent, but a market of the hideous sort Zola has depicted in his infamous masterpiece.

At last the bridge mania shows signs of decline in England. Although the game is by no means neglected, the passion for it which for two years possessed society to the exclusion of almost all other pursuits, has disappeared. One no longer hears of young girls deep in debts of honor to professional gamblers, and the voice of the lady novelist crying in the wilderness against the country house "hell" is silent. Bridge, however, has left behind it its indelible traces. It has changed the social habits of moneyed English people and left them feverish and restless.

STAGE GOSSIP.

Everybody onto Father.

During the dull summer months in New York "the perfesh" devote themselves to trying out new songs in the various "parlors" and "Melody Palaces" of the music publishers. Roy McCardell, in the New York World, amusingly depicts these experiences. Loud squawking from Parlor C. Kitty Lestrangle, "the So Different Sourette," who was the big hit last year at the Lagoon in Cincinnati, is trying over the new march ballad, "I Could Earn to Love a Soldier."

Miss Lestrangle has a lovely open voice. She gets off the key a great deal, and when the note is high she sings the words. She wants something pathetic to close her turn with.

"I come on just before the moving pictures," she says, "and by that time Cincinnati Dutchmen are full of her and want something to make them weep."

"A good mother song goes best with them. Then they take the last car home and commit suicide."

"Well? Well, why does any crazy Dutchman commit suicide? On account of my songs? Nix. I guess my songs keeps a lot of them from doing croak, for suicide in Cincinnati is at half the fad in summer as it gets to be after the Lagoon closes."

Julius Witmark is the "Big Screen" around the Melody Palace. He is a tall, dark young man and somewhat of a singer himself. He is willing to do shop.

"March songs have the call now," says Mr. Witmark, "they can be turned to order in all grades. The reddest thing to get is a real good comic song. If you will notice, the singing-loving public has to be catered along certain hard and fast lines. Other must always be treated tenderly."

"George Day wrote a burlesque Mother Song once. It was a great song, but the audiences wouldn't have it. It is all along telling about a mother earning for her wandering boy, fearing some danger had befallen him in some foreign land. Finally she received a letter 'From a land so far away, it made her old eyes sparkle, a fond heart to beat gay'; the letter said her boy was well, was hearty, strong and hale, and was where no harm could happen him, for he was 'in jail!'"

"It made them mad," said Mr. Witmark. "They didn't mind him being in jail, but they seemed to think the boys should have been kept from there."

The love for the antique as echoed song," said Mr. Witmark, "has lost appeal. The public does not care old garden gates, the old home by stream. It goes in for up-to-date apartment houses and sanitary plumbing, and these don't fit in sentimental songs very well."

A good sentimental song is always a good seller. Dear old mothers have call in them, but dying soldier boys sing their last messages to their sweethearts are more to the popular eye now. As a general thing Father is by trifled with. Father is always muck-raked in comic songs. Blow Almost Killed Father, Everybody Works But Father, are in point.

Father's lassitude and his chronic indulgence in alcoholic stimulants are always sure of scoring in a popular song. But the singer who would dare say that mother shirked the household or devastated the bottled beer would be hissed off the stage."

Notes and News.

James T. Powers in "The Blue Bird," the big Americanized London extravaganza, will be one of the first attraction of the coming season. He will again make a concert tour, opening at Carnegie Hall, New York, some time in October.

The first American tour of Leoncavallo, with the subsidized orchestra of La Scala theater, Milan, and ten Italian singers, includes Puccini, "La Boheme," "Roland and the Zaza." The tour will be at New York in October.

Lucy Bates, in David Belasco's new play, "The Girl of the Golden West," is now in her tenth month at Belasco, New York.

Henry Arthur Jones' new play, to be produced in New York in September, will be staged under the title of "The Hypocrites."

Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler, the eminent pianiste, will begin a tour of the United States in September.

Reginald De Koven is writing a comic opera for Henry W. Savage.

Pauline Hall recently met with a severe accident in a runaway at Yonkers, N. Y. Her leg was broken and she was badly bruised.

Edna Goodrich is the new leading woman of Nat Goodwin's company, now playing in Los Angeles.

Nat C. Goodwin and his company are in Los Angeles presenting "The Genius" and "When We Were Twenty-one."

The burlesque, "Roly-Poly," is a Los Angeles attraction.

M. B. Curtis is still holding on to his old play, "Sam'l of Posen." He is now presenting the comedy at Seattle, Wash., at cheap prices.

"Hearts of Tennessee," a play by a California author, is to be produced at Los Angeles by Morosco's stock company.

T. Daniel Frawley, who has been away from the Coast for several years, now has a stock company playing at Seattle, Wash. "The Charity Ball" and "Madame Sans Gene" were recent productions. Mary Van Euren is the leading woman of the company.

Many of the old members of the San Francisco Tivoli Opera Company are now appearing at Seattle. This week they appeared in the Bostonians' great success, "Robin Hood."

May Buckley is to be Kyrie Bellew's leading woman next season.

Lulu Glaser is to be seen in a new musical comedy by George M. Cohan.

George V. Hobart has been engaged to write a new play for May Irwin, in which she is to appear next season. She is to have the part of a society woman with a fondness for bridge-whist.

Marie Corelli, the novelist, will probably come over from England early in the fall to take personal charge of the rehearsals of the dramatic version of her story, "Barabbas," which Tyrone Power is to bring out next October.

"The Paris Model" is the title of the new operatic comedy by Harry B. Smith and Max Hoffman, now in process for Anna Held. The "model" of the piece is employed in a Parisian modiste's shop.

Mrs. Leslie Carter, the actress, and William Payne of New York were married at Portsmouth, N. H., July 13. Dr. Henry Emerson Hovey, rector of St. John's Church, the fashionable Episcopal church of Portsmouth, was called upon by a heavily veiled woman who was accompanied by a man dressed in motoring clothes. The two were unaccompanied. They produced a license issued by the local authorities and drawn in the name of Caroline Louise Dudley, aged thirty, of Lexington, Ky., and William Payne of New York. Payne is understood to be William L. Payne of New York, an actor who has played many prominent roles in many cities.

The appellate division of the Supreme Court of New York July 12 rendered a decision in the case of James S. Metcalfe, who brought charges of conspiracy against the associated theatrical managers because they would not let him into their theaters. The case was before the court on appeal by Charters Burnham, manager of Wallack's Theater, from a dismissal of the writ of habeas corpus secured in the case brought against him. The decision states that, according to the conditions printed upon the ticket, the manager of any theater has a right to say who shall enter his place of amusement, and, as such is the case, Burnham and his associates did not enter into a conspiracy when they agreed among themselves that Metcalfe should not be admitted to the various theaters managed by them. This legal action arose from Metcalfe's dramatic criticisms published in Life.

"Paulus" (St. Paul), a religious drama of extraordinary power, by Pastor Robert Falke, of Frankfort-on-the-Main, is profoundly impressing the theater-going world in Germany. Competent critics predict that it will rival the great passion play at Oberammergau. The third act culminates with Paul on Mars hill preaching, and afterward before the Athenian areopagus. Two hundred persons appear in this scene—Greek priests, philosophers, worshippers of beauty and courtesans. The fourth act shows Paul in the barracks of the Pretorian cohorts at Rome, while Nero is Caesar. In the fifth act the fall of Rome is produced with thrilling verisimilitude. The great cost of putting the play on the stage at Erfurt has been borne by two petty sovereigns, the Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar and the Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, a nephew of King Edward.

Paul Spadoni, the juggler, will head the new bill at the Orpheum next week. He makes a specialty of juggling such articles as fifty-pound cannon balls, a two hundred and fifty-pound iron cannon, and catches a twenty-five-pound shot between the back of his head and shoulders, on his neck, as it is fired from a cannon. Arthur McWatters, Grace Tyson and their company will present a spectacular musical comedy, entitled "Vaudeville." The Camille Comedy Trio are triple horizontal bar eccentrics, and James F. Kelly and Annie Mabel Kent will offer a hodge-podge of singing and dancing. Argyre Kastron, the young Greek violinist, will change her selections and Carlin and Otto, the German comedians, will tell new stories and sing new songs. The Military Octette and the Girl with the Baton, give a musical act. The Gartelle Brothers, comedy roller skaters, and Orpheum Motion Pictures, showing the latest novelties, will complete a varied and interesting program.

The New White House.

Raphael Weil & Co. announce the opening of the new White House, corner of Van Ness avenue and Pine street, for next Monday, July 23d. The new establishment, as was the old, will be the most artistic dry goods store in San Francisco. For weeks the firm's buyers have been busy purchasing in the East and Europe, and the shelves are laden with complete lines of the latest goods. The spacious store will be the mecca of tasteful shoppers who wish to replace the garments and household furnishings that were destroyed in the disaster.

MOTHERS BE SURE AND USE "MRS. WINSLOW'S Soothing Syrup" for your children while teething.

Next Sunday Go to Byron Hot Springs.—You can leave Friday afternoon or Saturday morning, returning Sunday afternoon or Monday morning. Two days at the springs, and the entire expense of the trip is $7.50. This includes the railway fare, transportation from railway station to hotel and return, a delightful ride of two and a half miles, accommodations at the beautiful Byron Hot Springs Hotel, and use of the wonderful mineral baths, all for $7.50. Try it.

For more than fifty years children, from the age of three months to ten years, have been benefited by Steedman's Soothing Powders.

LITERARY NOTES.

A Girl Wife.

An opening chapter in which turgid and overluxuriant rhetoric plays a too prominent part is apt to discourage the reader of "Truth Dexter." But the book improves as it goes on, and its author proves herself capable of writing, if not with simplicity, at least with sincerity. She carries the reader from a village in the rural South to crowded, worldly Boston, where we are invited to watch the intellectual development of a girl-wife's soul. The Southern wife is pitted against a lithe, green-eyed Boston Circe, a siren who is singularly unlike the typical Boston charmer, and would be looked at askance by those spectacled ladies. The story is romantic in theme, quixotic in motive and sophomoric in style.

Published by Little, Brown & Co.; $1.50.

Modern Horticulture.

Following naturally upon a study of the development of irrigation comes a book by W. S. Harwood entitled "The New Earth," in which the methods of modern and advanced horticulture are thoroughly analyzed and explained. The author has closely followed the work done by the staffs of the Experiment Stations of the United States, and his book will cause the unscientific farmer to realize the economic value of husbandry illumined and made facile by the latest discoveries of science. Plant development, soil inoculation, modern forestry, modern dairying and animal husbandry are among the topics discussed. The work is copiously illustrated.

A Japanese Romance.

John Luther Long, now recognized as one of the most sympathetic and discerning of American writers in the delineation of Japanese character, has written a poetic story of love and patriotism. In "The Way of the Gods" Arisuga, a Samurai of the Samurai, dedicates himself to "the great red death," in expiation of the long-hidden treachery of his dead father. His filial remission of the paternal sin is temporarily prevented by his marriage with an eta of "the despised, accursed caste"; for the husband of an eta is dishonored in the army. Unlike the Japanese chroniclers of the national character, Mr. Long exalts the gentler sex and does special reverence to the self-sacrifice practiced by Japanese women. In "The Way of the Gods" the filial ambition of Arisuga dwindles to a slight and trivial thing when viewed beside the heroism of the tiny, flower-faced wife, who sacrifices honor and life itself to the accomplishment of his unfulfilled task. The book is written with a delicacy and charm that greatly assist in bridging the gulf between Occidental and Oriental sentiment.

Published by the MacMillan Company.

A New Samantha Book.

One must enjoy humorous literature according to one's tastes. Genuine spontaneous humor there is not in "Samantha vs. Josiah," yet we doubt not that hundreds of couples will read the book aloud to each other and rock in their seats while they wipe tears of enjoyment from their streaming eyes. Samantha is the same old-fashioned Samantha thrown in contrast with ultramodern things. An automobile plays the star role in Marietta Holley's latest revival of her still popular heroine, and Samantha and Josiah, while the latter recovers from his various automobile accidents, wrangle over questions of religion, and please the reading public by using the plain, homely dialect of illiterate New England.

Published by the Funk & Wagnalls Co.; $1.50.

Fifth Avenue Sybarites.

In his carefully chiselled style, with a beautiful degenerate for a heroine and a sympathetic sybarite for a hero, Edgar Saltus writes "Vanity Square, a Story of Fifth Avenue Life." This lover of the polished phrase, the briefly epigrammatic sentence, generally lures his readers on, and often persuades them that he is a superexcellent writer. But his stories generally lack vitality and imagination in its finer sense. The men and women of whom he writes are incapable of spirituality, of sustained flights through the ether of high emotions. They always crawl. So it is with the soulless Borgia in "Vanity Square," and with the Fifth Avenue sybarite, who, cloyed with luxury, gratified sensations and high feeding, bores the reader with his boredom. There is a chaste and loving wife in the story, but Mr. Saltus does not excel in the delineation of a virtuous woman. The subject does not attract him, and Maud is a mere figment.

Published by the J. B. Lippincott Company.

Winston Churchill's "Coniston."

The lightning skimmer of fiction should pass Winston Churchill by. He writes in almost too leisurely a mood for this hustling age. "Coniston" has the true rural atmosphere of a New England village, the story being contemporaneous with General Grant's administration. Mr. Churchill gives a very complete picture of the life described; too much so, indeed. His canvas is overcrowded, and realistic as are his types of shrewd country politicians and their guileless henchmen, they jostle each other to the point of blurring the vividness of the portraits. That this author has his limitations is apparent after reading a couple of pages. He is an apostle of the commonplace, and offers no delicate savor to the epicure in words. But his safe niche in the public regard is due to the democratic simplicity of the life which most attracts his pen, and his sympathetic attitude toward love and life in their more wholesome aspects.

Personal and Miscellaneous.

Miriam Michelson's novel of old San Francisco, "Anthony Overman," will be published August 1.

The sales of Winston Churchill's five books, including the cheap editions of "The Celebrity" and "The Crisis," are about 1,500,000 copies.

"Morgan Shepard, one of San Francisco's publishers, has sought in New York a field. A company has been formed to be known as the Morgan Shepard Company, with large capital." So says the Los Angeles News.

The title of Rex Beach's novel, "The Spoilers," had already been used in England, so it appears there as "The Spoilers of the North."

John Bigelow's "The Mystery of Sleep," which was published a few years ago, has recently been brought out in French by the Librairie Fischbacher, of Paris, under the title, "Le Mystere du Sommeil."

Charles Dornon Robinson, the San Francisco artist, made several pictures in color during the progress of the fire. These will be reproduced in the August Century.

Carlos Wilson, a famous collector, who had 2000 volumes and 9000 portraits and rare prints relating to Napoleon, died in Boston recently. His collection is the finest in America, if not in the world.

The publishing house of Fox, Duffield & Co., from which R. K. Fox has recently retired, will hereafter be known as Duffield & Co.

"I had often heard Ibsen confess to a great distaste for seeing his own plays on the stage," writes William Archer. "I have quite definite conceptions," he said, "of my own characters, and the actors come between me and those conceptions, in some cases, permanently distorting or obscuring them."

H. G. Wells has just finished a book based on observations made during his recent visit to this country, under the title of "The Future in America."

The Psychologies of Professor William James are almost as popular as the novels of his brother Henry. Henry Holt and Company have just had to send to the Messrs. Macmillan in London a fourteenth printing of the "Brief Psychology," and that, after having sent them sixteen printings of the professor's big two-volume "Psychology."

Charles Battell Loomis, the American humorist, and Jerome K. Jerome, the British humorist, became fast friends when they were touring America together in the season recently closed, and Mr. Loomis sailed last week for England with his wife and daughter, to be the guests of the Jeromes.

"Nearly all the current issues of the magazines are filled with short fiction," says the New York World, "and as usual the stories are written by women, about women and for women. The magazines have done more than anything else to fasten upon American fiction the reproach of effeminacy." A curious light is thrown upon this statement by the letter written by the editor of one of our old and high-priced magazines to a well-known author, when he returned a short story by the latter. It was a good story, he wrote, but it had nothing in it about women, "and I cannot," said he, "accept for our magazine any story that does not contain a strong feminine interest."

Upton Sinclair's novel, "The Jungle," is to appear serially in many languages. Arrangements have been completed for its publication in L'Action of Paris, Il Tempo of Milan, in an underground revolutionary paper in Russia, and in a Dutch paper at Amsterdam. In this country, the Bohemian Fornort, the Polish Robotnick, various German papers, and the daily Vorwaerts are to print it. We did not suppose it was so bad as that.

Three of the most prominent novelists of the day are now in Lenox, Mass. Mrs. Edith Wharton, author of "The House of Mirth," is now at the Mount, the country place of her husband, Edward Wharton. It is said in Lenox that Mrs. Wharton has received more than $70,000 from her publishers and foreign royalties. Judge Robert Grant, author of "The Undercurrent," and "Unleavened Bread," with Mrs. Grant, of Boston, is in Lenox. Mr. and Mrs. Morris K. Jesup have Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Jesup Stimson as their guests at Belvoir Terrace. Mr. Stimson's new novel, "The Cure of the Soul," has attracted much notice.

Senator Perkins has communicated with the various scientific societies in Washington with a view to replacing the libraries of California and societies which suffered in the San Francisco disaster. Most gratifying responses have been made. Several societies there have not only promised to contribute from their own store, but have volunteered to act as agents for a collection of scientific works, papers, government publications, etc., here and abroad.

A PHILIPPINE INCIDENT.

Rag Time for a Funeral March.

Not long ago the enlisted men in the Philippines grew much excited over an incident which took place at the funeral of a United States marine. It seemed that the officer in charge had ordered the Filipino band to play at the funeral a rag time march entitled "You Always in the Way." So much feeling resulted among the soldiers, blue jackets and marines that an inquiry was ordered, and the officer in charge of the funeral services was court martialled. He testified that the band knew but of one tune, and therefore he had ordered them to play that particular march, presumably in funeral time. As a result of this explanation the officer was acquitted.

But the men in the ranks were not satisfied with the result of the court martial. Private A. L. Price of the United States Army Hospital Company wrote some verses based on the incident, which he had published in the Cable News, a Manila daily. A copy of this production was brought to attention of the Secretary of the Navy who referred it to the Secretary of War, presumably requesting action on the matter. About the end of May a cablegram was received from the War Department by the military authorities in Manila directing an investigation. As a result of the cablegram Private Price was arrested and confined in the post guard house at F. Espana to await trial. But the court martial did not take place. The matter was suddenly dropped, for what reason is not known.

A number of superheated specimens of verse have come from soldiers in the Philippines. This one is not the most specimen of the military muse:

We don't object to hikin' through hundred miles of sun,
We don't object to chargin' up a mountain on the run;
We don't object to livin' on a soldier's ration straight,
We don't object to dyin', but to re the Golden Gate
With ragtime funeral marches w the band is made to play—
It does sound a little awkward—"You Always in the Way."

We don't ask no favors from ye may do the worst you can,
For Congress can't make gentle where God has failed on man.
To 'ell with all this sick'nin' rot-bad air, dry and warm,
These rotten gags about respect due the uniform—
When shoulder straps can make a lose half his little head
And make him joke the holiness wraps the country's dead.

Yes, damn ye, we'll salute ye, and all say "Yes, sir," too,
But we salute the shoulder straps wouldn't speak to you;
You're further down beneath us than a dog a nigger owns,
Ye're dirtier'n a buzzard pickin' from dead men's bones,
When the flag is on our coffins ye'll the band to play.
That good old ragtime hymnal, "You Always in the Way."

You've stolen from a dead man the solemn fun'ral rite,
You've put a daub of mud upon a flag for which we fight;
Ye ain't disgraced the service, but know ye have at least
Showed how little man was in ye how near ye are the beast.
Few men that hold commissions would tell the band to play
The ragtime dance-ball music w soldier's laid away.

The bachelor looms large in world's eye at the present time. Fred Beit, the greatest diamond merchant alive, Lord Kitchener, the Lipton, James Henry ("Silent") Smith, Attorney General Moody, Sen. Penrose, Brandegee and Kean, eleven Representatives in Congress are among the notables who refuse to become benedicts.

STORYETTES.

Have and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A Southern woman says that her coiled woman surprised her one day with the announcement that she was soon to be married again. The servant explained that she had attended a funeral a few weeks before and that she was to be "the husband of the corpse." She added that the bereaved widower had noticed her at the funeral. "He said I was the life of the occasion."

Mr. George McCrae, M. P., amused members of the Heriot Club, in Edinburgh, the other night at their annual dinner with a few political stories. He told how on one occasion Mr. John Edmond was wasting the time of the House of Commons by wandering idly from his subject, till at last the Speaker had to call him to order. "All right," said the Irish orator, "I will not repeat what I was going to say."

Some years ago a faithful son of Indiana was enabled, by reason of an inheritance, to make a trip abroad. Upon his return the Evansville people were anxious to have his impressions "furrin parts," a wish with which the traveler obligingly complied. "Tell me all about Paris," some one finally suggested. "Paris," observed the Evansville man, gravely, "is certainly a wonderful place, gents—all things considered, a wonderful place. But," he added, thoughtfully, "Evansville for me."

A well known Law Courts joke originated with the first Lord Chelmsford, when Frederick Thesiger. Sir Cresswell Thesiger was trying a case in which the name of a vessel was frequently introduced. When mentioned by Sergeant Channell, who was deficient in store of aspirates, the vessel was the Ellen; when alluded to by Thesiger she was the Helen. "Stop!" cried Cresswell, presently; "I have got on my notes the Ellen and the Helen; which is it?" In his blandest tone Thesiger replied: "Oh, my lud, the vessel was christened the Helen, but she lost her 'h' in the chops of the Channell."

An honest hog-buyer started up in business and guaranteed the farmers a fair deal. He always weighed the porkers twice to guard against mistakes. Once in weighing a bunch of pigs the second time he found their weight had increased to the amount of 200 pounds.

He was at a loss to account for the condition until an employee confessed that at the first weighing he had inserted the toe of his boot under the scales and pried it up, thus cheating the farmer out of one hog. The buyer was indignant.

"What did you do a trick like that for?" he asked. "You couldn't have profited by it, anyhow."

"I know it, John," said the guilty man, "but I just couldn't help it."

It had always been the custom to cheat the farmer and the man couldn't bear to see the old customs passing away.

Kimball Carrow has the reputation of being the champion absent-minded man of Bedford, Mass. On one occasion he called upon his old friend and family physician, Dr. B. E. Sawyer. After a chat of a couple of hours the doctor saw him to the door and bade him good night, saying: "Come again. Family all well, I suppose?" "My heavens!" exclaimed Mr. Carrow, "that reminds me of my errand; my wife is in a fit!"

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Robert L. Taylor, who has been chosen at a Democratic primary election in Tennessee as the successor of Edward W. Carmack in the United States Senate, is probably the most popular man in his State, and he became so the first time he ran for Governor. His opponent at that time was his own brother. At the political mass-meetings, instead of making the usual speeches, he produced a violin, and, being a fine player, entertained the crowds with music that enraptured them and secured their votes for him. The "fiddling Governor", as he is known, has had three terms in the gubernatorial chair, besides having been a member of Congress and holding other political offices. Both he and Mr. Carmack are of the editorial profession.

The latest addition to the French Academy, Cardinal Mathieu, is not in favor at the Vatican. At the last Papal Conclave, he sat next to a stranger, who spoke no French—a language which Popes are, as a rule, expected to know. "Non loqueris gallice?—ergo non es papabilis," said Cardinal Mathieu to his neighbor, who replied: "Verum est, eminentissime domine, non sum papabilis! Deo gratias!" But the stranger, who returned this answer is now Pius X, and resents the affront thus put upon him.

On the seventieth birthday of Cesare Lombroso his two daughters, Gina and Paola, presented him with a copy of his life and works written by themselves. There is to be issued soon a testimonial volume on the works of Lombroso, written by about thirty of the scientists who attended the recent criminology congress in Turin. Each scientist has written a chapter on the particular branch of learning in which he is most versed, testifying to the great progress made in criminological science in the past sixteen years in consequence of Lombroso's studies.

Many exaggerated stories are in circulation as to President Roosevelt's condition. He is simply tired out—nothing more—by a strenuous winter and spring. Even now his vigor is such that, were he any other man, he would be called bubbling over with good health.

Jules Adolphe Breton, the famous painter, died at his Paris residence, July 5. He was eighty-nine years old. Jules Breton's works were greatly admired in America, and great sums were paid for them. He was born at Courrieres, Pas de Calais of most respectable parentage. Breton studied affectionately the human types around him, and painted them with truth, grace and vigor. In 1855 Breton first attracted wide attention in the Universal Exhibition at Paris with his "Les Glaneuses," "Le lendemain de la Saint-Sebastien," and "Petites Paysannes Consultant et "Petites Paysannes Consultant les Epis." Among some of his best-known works are "La Benediction des Bles," "Le Rappel des Glaneuses," "Le Soir—Les Semeuses," "Consecration de l'Eglise d'Oignies," "La Gardeuse de Dindons," "Un Grand Pardon Breton," "Les Lavandieres," "Jeune Fille Gardant des Vaches," "La Glaneuse," "Le Soir," "Les Communiantes," "La Fin du Travail," "L'Etoile du Berger," and "Les Dernieres Fleurs." Breton was a poet of distinction and the author of his own biography.

The Original Vienna Cafe Is Now Open to the Public.

In a new and central location at 1226 Post street, near the Emporium, is the cosy home of the Vienna Cafe and Bakery. The Dining Rooms have been fitted up most elaborately, making it one of the most attractive cafes in the city. The cuisine and service will receive the special attention of the proprietor, Mr. F. B. Galindo, who has catered to the San Francisco public for so many years past. A Grill, Restaurant and fine Bakery all in a handsome private residence is something entirely new and will no doubt recommend itself to ladies while out shopping. Special rooms for receptions and banquets are also one of its features. San Francisco's Original Vienna Cafe is opening up its new place in fine style where appetizing breakfasts, lunches and dinners are to be had at popular prices the same "as before the late unpleasantness."

Springfield Fire and Marine Insurance Company of Hartford, Conn.

Manager George D. Dornin advises that the City Department of the Springfield is now open in the Kohl Building. The General Department will occupy its old quarters on the California-street side, third floor, as soon as rooms are restored, and furniture, now ordered, made ready. Temporary Department headquarters will remain for the present at 1112 Broadway, Oakland.

The Springfield is among the companies which are adjusting and paying policy holders' claims in the San Francisco disaster involving $1,600,000. The payment of this sum will leave the company's capital $2,000,000, its reserve for reinsurance (or unearned) premiums $3,122,531.32, as appears by its financial statement of December 31, 1905, intact, and a net surplus of over $400,000. The assets of the Springfield at the close of 1905 were $7,156,531.72.

TECHAU TAVERN.

Large Crowds Gather in the Popular Tea Room.

As a shopping center the women buyers have already voted Van Ness avenue a success, and as a rendezvous during the busy afternoon hours they have set the seal of approval on the new tea room at Techau Tavern.

Elegantly housed at 1321 Sutter street near the crowded Van Ness ave- nue promenade, the far-seeing manage- ment of this well-known resort have made the LADIES' TEA ROOM one of the chief features of their splendid es- tablishment.

Since the opening day, between the hours of 3 and 5 p. m., these artisti- cally designed and elaborately appoint- ed apartments have been the meeting and resting place of the women shop- pers of the city. Here they gather to refresh themselves with some dainty tid-bit a la Techau—a salad, an ice cream, a cup of tea or delicious choco- late mid surroundings congenial.

That nothing might be wanting to complete their comfort an orchestra renders numbers from the modern and old masters and it is the privilege of the fair diners to ask for such selec- tions as best please their fancy. With its moderate prices and many conven- iences, small wonder then that the ladies find Techau Tavern so charming a place to sip tea, gossip and listen to harmony on a busy afternoon.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

Smith and Jones, talking about the Kaiser: Jones—They tell me that unfortunately he is very bellicose. Smith—Dear me! You surprise me! I always understood he was rather tall and slim.—Exchange.

"What I regard as most conspicuous about Georgie Gayson," said Mrs. Oldcastle, "is her naivete." "Yes," replied her hostess, "I wonder what made her get a red one?"—Baltimore American.

Senior Partner—There's one thing to be said in favor of classical music. Junior Partner—What is that? Senior Partner—The office boy can't whistle it.—Chicago News.

"Is there any available substitute for rubber?" asked the instructor of the class. "Yes, sir," answered Miss De Muir, one of the fair coeds. "I think 'stare' or 'gape' is just as good."—Chicago Tribune.

"I, sir," began Bragg, "am a self-made man." "Yes," replied Wise, "hut why apologize now? That won't help matters."—Philadelphia Press.

Mrs. Madison—How do you like your new neighbors? Mrs. Dyer—I don't know. I haven't tried to borrow anything yet.—Town and County.

Mrs. Flip—I have just been talking to a specialist, and he says my brain vitality has all gone to my long hair. Do you believe it? Flip—Well, er-I knew it had gone!—Detroit Free Press.

"Yes, I'm going to spend a few weeks at Kloseman's summer resort. My stomach is all out of order, and I need a rest." "Well, your stomach will get a good rest there, too. I know the place."—Chicago Tribune.

"In the struggle for liberty," shouted the long-haired anarchist, "you will always find me, hrotbers, in the van." "Sure," said the doughty policeman as he pulled him into the patrol.—Baltimore American.

Green—I cannot understand why De Short wants a divorce. His wife had nearly half a million when he married her. Brown—Yes, and she has every dollar of it yet. That's the trouble.—Chicago Daily News.

She—I see the number of marriages in England and Wales during 1905 was 260,489, a slight increase over the record for 1904. That would look as if the men are getting more sensible. He—Getting more careless, I should say.—Yonkers Statesman.

"You'll have to fix the poem over before I can huy it," said the editor. "There appears to be something the matter with its feet." "I would have you understand, sir," said the hard, with dignity, "that I am a poet and not a chiropodist."—Cleveland Leader.

"I would like a pound of your golf sausage," she said to the butcher. "Golf sausage? Sorry, madam, but we don't handle it. We have blood sausage, liverwurst, ham sausage, and other kinds, but no golf sausage." "Ob, dear, I'm so sorry. My husband said he much preferred the kind made in links."—Milwaukee Sentinel.

"I suppose that some of your battle scenes are very realistic?" said the sympathizer. "Yes," said the bum actor, "I have impersonated Napoleon at Waterloo several times when real shells were bursting all about me."—Kansas City Times.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

The Packers Potted It. Mary had a little lamb, And when she saw it sicken, She shipped it off to Packingtown And now it's labeled chicken. —New York Evening Post.

A Blue Grass Lyric. The dove's notes are the saddest In Kentucky; The streams dance on the gladdest In Kentucky; Hip pockets are the thickest, Pistol hands the slickest, Cylinders turn quickest, In Kentucky.

Song birds are the sweetest In Kentucky; Thoroughbreds the fleetest In Kentucky; The mountains tower proudest, Thunder peals the loudest, The landscape is the grandest—and Politics the d—dest In Kentucky.

The Enlivener. How stupid day by day it were And dead. An there were not some daily stir From Ted— Some big or little thing begun Some adversary on the run, Some doings by the doughty one.

How potent were the days to bore And tire, An it were not for Theodore, Esquire— Some heated solecism said, Some evil whacked upon the head, Some doings typical of Ted.

How wags the merry world with us And glad, With Theodore the Strenuous, Egad! Some smoke upon each setting sun, Some falsifier handed one, Some shindee ended or begun.

Alas! how shall we stand the blow Of fate, When Theodore shall us no more Elate? All eventful days and still! No daily grist from Teddy's mill! No news from Rough-and-Ready-ville! —St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

W. Bourke Cockran, of New York, Democratic Congressman and orator, left Santa Barbara, July 14, for Lake Tahoe with Miss Anne Ide, his fiancée, and a party of friends. He discussed just before his departure the political situation. In his estimation Mr. Roosevelt is the only choice for the Republican party to consider and he believes the President will be forced to accept the nomination. Likewise he thinks that Mr. Bryan is, at this time, the unanimous choice of the Democratic party.

An interesting relic of the San Francisco conflagration is a truckload of blackened masses of metal which the United Railroads Company recovered from its safe in the Rialto building. The metal originally consisted of thousands of dollars in silver dollars, halves, quarters, dimes, nickels, and one-cent pieces. The company is endeavoring to recover the coin value of the money from the Treasury Department. Otherwise, should it succeed in recovering only the bullion value it will suffer a loss of many thousands of dollars.

The Innocence of Dreyfus.

It is now twelve years since Alfred Dreyfus was first accused of selling military secrets to Germany. He was court martialled, found guilty, stripped of his sword, the insignia of his rank cut from his uniform in the presence of troops, drummed out of his regiment, and condemned to imprisonment for life at the convict settlement on Devil's Island off the South American coast. Even now it is a mystery why these charges were made against him. He was unpopular and he was a Jew. But these causes are insufficient for so awful a conspiracy. It is probable that some other person had been dealing in military secrets; suddenly imminent danger of discovery arose, and Dreyfus was made the scapegoat.

The famous Bordereau found in a wastepaper basket resembled some memoranda made by Dreyfus. But it was not sufficient evidence to convict. General Mercier laid before the courts a forged cipher telegram from one foreign military attache to another, incriminating Dreyfus. On this perjured and forged testimony Dreyfus was convicted. His torture on Devil's Island lasted for five years. He was cut off from communication with the world. He did not even know what was the false evidence which had convicted him.

A hostile newspaper in Paris unwisely published a fac simile of the Bordereau. A startling resemblance was at once discovered between the handwriting of Esterhazy and that of the incriminating paper. Matthew Dreyfus, the brother of Alfred, accused Esterhazy of being the writer. A violent controversy began, which soon took the form of an anti-Semitic crusade, with the Army against the Jews. As a result Esterhazy was whitewashed. It was here that the novelist Zola burst into the case, and with fierce indignation defended the absent soldier who was eating out his heart on Devil's Island. At first it seemed as if all France had turned upon the daring Zola. He was abused, fined, and twice condemned to prison. But the truth prevailed. One of the false witnesses, Colonel Henry, confessed, and committed suicide in his cell. Esterhazy fled and confessed abroad. The Procurator General at last was forced to admit that there was absolutely nothing against Dreyfus—that there was not even evidence enough to justify a new trial. Therefore the Court of Cassation, the highest court in France, has declared Dreyfus to be innocent. On the French National holiday, July 14th, the Official Journal published a decree announcing his reinstatement, his promotion, and his appointment as a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor. He enters the army again as a Major, and a demand has been made by the people of France that Zola should be honored with a niche in the Pantheon.

All of the foregoing is most melancholy reading except the last few lines. No man can stand against conspiracy, perjury, and forgery. Even the most generous nation may be deceived by such villain's work. That France is a generous nation is shown by the way in which she has acknowledged her error and has made such amends as she can to the living Dreyfus and to the dead Zola.

Did San Francisco Commit Arson?

Occasionally we receive communications saying that the Argonaut is "unfair and one-sided" in its treatment of the insurance companies. These communications are not frequent and when they come, it is needless to say that they come from insurance men. It is possible that we may be one-sided, but we know of only one side to the present situation and it is this: If the insurance companies are solvent, let them pay their honest debts; if they refuse to pay their honest debts, they are not solvent.

There is the whole situation. And if there is another side to it than ours, which is the right side, it is the kind which at football is called "off side."

We are reminded of this because we recently highly commended George D. Dornin for resigning his position as Pacific Coast Manager of the National Fire Insurance Company of Hartford, Connecticut, because he could not stand for that company's course toward its policy-holders. We were told by interested parties that in this article we did an injustice to the National of Hartford. Wishing to do an injustice to no man, we have since been silent. But various actions of the National of Hartford since Mr. Dornin left it confirm us in our belief that as an honest man he is well out of it. We are told on the best authority that the National of Hartford, while professing to be on a dollar-for-dollar basis, is trying to force an arbitrary cut on its policy-holders. This is a horizontal scaling-down, and one not based on the facts in each individual case. When the National Company has succeeded in bulldozing a policyholder into accepting this arbitrary and horizontal cut, they then take up the case for "individual adjustment" and scale it down again.

Recent developments incline us to believe that the National of Hartford is a company with which no honest man should have anything to do. Here follows one of their latest attempts to evade liability: Before the fire there stood certain property on Van Ness and Pacific Avenue, which was insured for twelve thousand dollars in the National of Hartford. After the fire, Miss Jane McKee, as administratrix of the estate of her mother, Mary McKee, filed proofs of loss with George D. Dornin, former manager, and E. P. Farnsworth, former adjuster, who, after investigation, acknowledged liability and decided on an adjustment in the full amount of the claim. Just about this time the National betrayed signs of "welching," and gave in its adherence to the ranks of the "six-bit" companies.

Thereupon Manager Dornin and Adjuster Farnsworth promptly resigned. The company then sent one of its Baxter Street adjusters here, with an assortment of holes into which it proceeded to crawl. The company through this Eastern adjuster now denies all liability for its McKee loss, on the ground that the fire was "occasioned as the result of back-firing by the authorities."

Miss McKee, as administratrix, has now brought suit against the National of Hartford to recover the amount they agreed to pay her. The McKee attorneys claim that they have abundant evidence to prove that the property was not destroyed by back fire, but by the ordinary course of the conflagration.

The writer is not acquainted with the McKee family, and has no interest in them other than the sympathy which any man must naturally feel for women who are about to be robbed by a crooked insurance company.

The McKee attorneys probably have testimony to prove their contention concerning the absence of a back-fire. But let us admit for purposes of argument that there was a back-fire. If so, it is scarcely credible that Miss McKee should have set fire to her own house. If then the house was burned by reason of a back-fire by "the authorities," it is impossible that the entire municipal government of the city and county of San Francisco could have set fire to Miss McKee's house. As the Board of Supervisors consists of eighteen men, it is not probable that they committed arson as a body. Therefore, we must come down to the Mayor. If E. E. Schmitz set fire to Miss McKee's house, he could not have done it as Mayor. While engaged in committing that which is contrary to the laws of the land which he is sworn to administer, he is acting in the scope of his own employment merely. Therefore, if guilty of this act, he did not commit it as Mayor, but in his individual capacity. If he did it in his individual capacity, he is guilty of arson, and the National Company of Hartford should take steps to have him indicted. The municipal corporation, known as the city and county of San Francisco, cannot commit arson any more than it can commit burglary or murder. If Mayor Schmitz ordered illegal acts, such as arson or murder, the very fact that they were not legal shows that they were not official, hence not the acts of Mayor Schmitz, but merely of Mr. Schmitz. Therefore, even if Mr. E. E. Schmitz fired or ordered to be fired Miss McKee's house, it is he who is guilty and not the city and county of San Francisco.

The National of Hartford alleges that a back-fire was set; that, therefore, they will not pay to Miss McKee twelve thousand dollars which they owe her. The converse of this is that if the back-fire had not been set, they would pay to Miss McKee the twelve thousand dollars which they owe her. Therefore, they are apparently penalizing or fining Miss McKee for permitting or encouraging a back-fire to be set which destroyed her property. But is she responsible? Even if it were proved that the fire had been set by the city and county of San Francisco—and this we have disproved—Miss McKee is not herself guilty of arson. Were the municipality guilty, and were the municipality forced to pay twelve thousand dollars damages to the National of Hartford, Miss McKee would still be responsible only for her quota of the amount in her individual capacity as a citizen. That is to say, as a single citizen of San Francisco, she would be responsible for about one-four hundred thousandth part of twelve thousand dollars, or three cents, instead of the whole of it, if it were proved that the city were guilty. But not only can it be proved that the city was not guilty, but if it were Miss McKee would not be responsible for the twelve thousand dollars but only for three cents. Yet the National of Hartford is now trying to rob Miss McKee of twelve thousand dollars, when by its own argument it claims that the municipality was responsible for the illegal acts leading to the fire, and, therefore, responsible to the insurance company for the amount.

The National of Hartford is trying to throw the responsibility for the fire, for its extinction, and for the preservation of her property all on the shoulders of a woman. It is throwing on her responsibility which does not attach to her, and is attempting to evade its own responsibility. Whoever is responsible for the destruction of the property, the National of Hartford is responsible to Miss McKee, and should in all honor and decency pay her the twelve thousand dollars which it agreed to pay. If the McKee property which the National insured was illegally fired by some third party or parties, the National must look to them for indemnity—not to Miss McKee. We are aware that in the mass of verbiage by which crooked insurance companies attempt to dodge their debts it is provided that the insured shall not recover "by reason of the acts of military or civil or usurped authority." The first two might possibly pass, but the last is so preposterous as to destroy the whole claim. Even the first amounts to little. "Civil authority" exercised illegally is not civil authority at all. "Military authority" exercised without warrant of law in time of peace is not "authority" but outlawry. As for relying on "usurped authority," to invalidate their policies, words fail us to express the weakness of such a claim by insurance companies. Under it, if a drunken tramp had applied the torch to the McKee property, saying as he did so, "I am the Governor of the State," that act would have been "usurped authority"; from that moment all liability under the policy would cease and determine, and the National of Hartford would go free.

A further reduction to absurdity of this absurd insurance argument may be thus stated: In practically all policies it is stipulated that "if the policy-holder shall not use every effort to preserve his property, all liability under the policy shall cease." If Mr. Schmitz fired her property, Miss McKee did not resist him; if the eighteen Supervisors, the Fire Commissioners, the Fire Department, and the city and county of San Francisco fired her property, Miss McKee did not resist them; if the United States troops came over the hills from Fort Mason, and with certain deadly or lethal weapons did threaten to shoot leaden bullets into or upon the bodies of those resisting the firing of the McKee property, Miss McKee very probably and very properly fled. Yet when she did so she violated her policy, according to the National of Hartford. She did not "make every effort to preserve her property."

From the foregoing it is apparent that the municipal corporation as such could not have set fire to Miss McKee's house; that the Mayor as Mayor could not have done so; that it is not probable Miss McKee, the owner, did so; that if the Mayor as a private person committed the act, he is responsible merely as a private citizen. Therefore she must look to the insurer, the National of Hartford, to indemnify her. But that company must look to the perpetrator of the illegal act. It has no reason to hold up Miss McKee. It may have to bring suit either against the city of San Francisco or the United States army. It is not denied that the United States troops had much to do with the demolition of buildings along the advance of the conflagration. It is not known whether they took orders from Mr. Schmitz or not. But it is undisputed that martial law was not proclaimed, hence the presence of the United States troops as peace officers and their acts in extinguishing fires and saving lives were entirely outside of the law. The United States Government would, therefore, promptly repudiate all responsibility. Mr. Schmitz as a private individual cannot place responsibility for criminal acts on the municipal corporation of which he is the Mayor. The United States troops, while under illegal conditions and directed by a civilian performing an illegal act, cannot throw the responsibility therefor upon the Federal Government. It would, therefore, seem that the only claim for indemnity which the National of Hartford has for the destruction of the McKee property which it had insured, is against the military officer in immediate command of the squad of troops destroying it. Therefore, if the National of Hartford cannot get its twelve thousand dollars from Mr. Schmitz, it had better try and get it from the captain or lieutenant commanding the squad of troops which fired the McKee property. But we repeat that these facts give it no reason or warrant for attempting to rob Miss McKee.

There seems to be a certain confusion in the fire insurance mind concerning the rights, duties, and obligations of policy-holders. Mr. James Nicholls, President of the National of Hartford, in his recent pronouncement to agents and policy-holders, said in substance that as the earthquake damaged the water mains, every piece of property in San Francisco at once deteriorated in value 25 per cent, because of the diminished fire protection; therefore (said Mr. Nicholls) we will pay only 75 per cent at the outside. This comfortable conclusion was at once echoed by one of the sauerkraut companies, the Rhine and Moselle, whose manager informed a committee of policy-holders that the company refused all liability on account of the leaking water mains. We could understand this curious contention of Mr. James Nicholls if he were trying to rob the municipality of insurance money carried by him on municipal buildings, for it is the duty of the municipality to maintain and keep in repair its water mains. But this is not the duty of a private citizen. Do Mr. James Nicholls and his sauerkraut confreres of the Rhine and Moselle Company, maintain that the moment a municipal water main broke Miss McKee, a policy-holder, became responsible for its repair? And if she did not at once repair it, or perform the impossible feat of keeping it from being broken when God was trying to break it, does Mr. James Nicholls believe that such an act vitiates her policy? If he does he is a very curious person, even for the president of a crooked Connecticut corporation.

Correspondingly, does Mr. James Nicholls believe that Miss McKee, a woman and a non-voter, has any control over the acts of the municipality of San Francisco? If she has no control—even the modified control of a voter—over these acts, how can she be held in any way responsible for these acts, even if they be legal? And if these acts be illegal that Mr. James Nicholls tries to hide his crooked company behind them in order to evade liability, how then can he pretend that Miss McKee is responsible for certain acts of the municipal corporation when he avers them to be illegal acts which such a corporation as a corporation could not commit, and which she as a citizen could not legally sanction and could not vote for, even if she could vote, which she cannot do?

We spoke but now of "crooked Connecticut companies." We wish it distinctly understood that we do not mean by this to speak at all Connecticut companies. We have the very highest respect for New England and New Englanders. Out of that sturdy, strong, little group of commonwealths there has come the finest type of manhood and womanhood that has been known in the United States since they were only United Colonies. The courts of New England rank high. The literature of New England is at the head. The men of New England gave freely of their blood in the War of the Revolution and the Civil War. The women of New England gave freely of their husbands, sons, lovers and brothers without complaint when their country called them. Therefore, we say that there is no disposition on our part to judge unfairly of New England. But while the old Bay State and the Land of Sady Habits have produced high-minded and honorable men and women, they have also produced abundantly of the other kind. And if Connecticut produced the first and best State Constitution, she also was the commonwealth where flourished the ancient Blue Laws. We know that it is now the fashion to deny that the Blue Laws ever existed, but even if they did not, the spirit which permitted them existed and it exists today. The writer has himself been stopped at the State line of Connecticut on a Sunday at the train held up for a certain number of hours until the "hours for Divine service" were over and travelers permitted to cross the State. This in very recent years. He has also witnessed the Connecticut idea of a Cl-fearing Sunday at the great summer resorts around New London, where it is impossible to purchase a glass of Apollinar in the front part of one of the big hotels, while the back doors are encumbered with boat-men, yachting crews, and longshore men, white, black and brown in various stages of intoxication.

Yes, there are two kinds of New Englanders. In the old days it was the same. There were high-minded and patriotic New Englanders, like Samuel Adams and Daniel Webster, who were not money-lovers; and then there was the other kind of New Englanders, who sometimes made money honestly, but who made money; who made money selling supplies to the British troops; who made money sending Medford rum to Africa, selling it in exchange for negroes, which they brought to the American coast and sold to their Southern brethren returning thence to New England for more rum and then to Africa for more negroes. It was the other kind of Connecticut Puritans who passed laws against tobacco-smoking, but when they found they could raise tobacco in Connecticut, passed laws against smoking any tobacco—except Connecticut tobacco. It was the other kind of Connecticut Puritans who passed laws against selling tickets of lotteries—Massachusetts lotteries, Rhode Island lotteries—but who had laws passed farming out to them Connecticut lotteries, by which they made much dirty money. But they made money all right—dirty money, tainted money, blood money. On these foundations rest many of the large fortunes of New England. Those pious gentlemen who made so much money out of rum, murder, and black flesh and blood were most of them deacons in the church, and begat large families, as deacons do, which families are now enjoying the fourth generation's ancestral wealth. In Connecticut most of them are stockholders, many of them directors in Connecticut fire insurance companies.

But if their money is tainted, the ancestral taint ought to have worked out of the blood by this time. Running lotteries, selling goods to the enemy, fitting out slavers, "black-birding," privateering, perhaps a little piracy on the side—these ways of money-getting might be winked at a century or more ago. But the polite and polished descendants of these Puritanic-piratic gentry had better fly the black flag if they intend to rob their fellow citizens in this day and generation. For if they fly the stars and stripes, by the Lord we'll sink them!

The Hoaxing of Chicago.

Last week we printed a discovery of a remarkable mare's nest by a correspondent of the New York Critic, one Mr. Hall. The fact that a leading literary periodical in our metropolis should fall a victim to the literary hoax of "Father Prout," a witty Irish priest, concocted two generations ago, makes us walk warily. But we are all of us liable to be hoaxed. If New York is the richest and Boston the most dignified city, Chicago is certainly the most fly, or as she would put it, the most "flip." Yet even Chicago once was hoaxed, unmistakably, irredeemably, irrevocably hoaxed.

The heart-rending occurrence in question took place when Matthew Arnold was visiting the United States. He had just returned to New York from a lecture tour to Chicago, where he was made the honored guest of some of the richest pork and beef millionaires of the Lakeside City. On his return to New York, however, there was wired back to Chicago an article from the New York Tribune signed by Mr. Arnold, in which he spoke with the utmost scorn of Chicago's social and literary shortcomings. What most moved his scorn was the fact, as he said, that one evening at a Chicago dinner party he spoke of "Obermann," but his neighbor did not know who or what "Obermann" was. When he explained that it was the work of De Senancour, "To my amazement and disgust," he added, "not a single person in that assemblage, man or woman, had ever heard of 'Obermann' or had ever heard of De Senancour."

The grief and rage with which this philippic was received in Chicago could not be told in words. For several days the journals of that city were filled with letters denouncing Mr. Arnold and his "abuse of hospitality." Another curious manifestation of the Chicagoese resentment of foreign depreciation, together with their thirst for knowledge, was shown by the fact that the libraries of that great city were inundated by hordes of persons seeking for copies of "Obermann" and information about De Senancour. It goes without saying that they were mostly ladies.

About the fourth day the aggrieved Mr. Arnold pricked the bubble with his pen. It seems that the article in the Tribune was a clever hoax. It had hoaxed all concerned, including the Tribune editor and the Tribune readers, for New York laughed heartily at Chicago's ignorance of "Obermann." It had also hoaxed Chicago, which was painfully sensitive over its own ignorance. The only American community which remained utterly impassive amid the ruins of America's pretensions to literary knowledge was Boston. Boston had heard of "Obermann." There was a copy of it in the Boston Public Library; the only one, it was said, in the United States.

The amusing part of this whole matter is that not one Frenchman in five thousand ever heard of De Senancour, and not one Frenchman in five hundred thousand ever heard of "Obermann." The Tribune hoaxer had selected one of the most obscure of French novels and one of the most obscure of French writers. But he brought down birds with both barrels.

The delightful comment concerning Father Prout's "Reliques" that "It is a treasury of mares' nests" applies admirably to the "Astonishing Discovery" made by Mr. Hall.

Drones in the Relief Camp.

The rumors that the relief camps are filled with drones have been investigated by the Relief Commission. The report made last week showed that the total number of men, women and children in the various camps under civil jurisdiction was 17,210. There are still a number under military control. The army authorities estimate that about one-fifth of the male refugees are able-bodied men, and out of these they have only been able to discover about two hundred who were loafers. The remaining men are old men, crippled men, and invalids. The Relief Commissioners state that only about one per cent of the camp dwellers are able-bodied and idle men, and they are being expelled as rapidly as discovered. With the women it is different. The army men state that over one-third of them are unmarried, idle, and able-bodied, but will not accept employment. In one camp last week there were one thousand women; when employment was offered to them only six consented to accept it.

Union Station for San Francisco.

All sorts of plans for improving San Francisco are in the air. Many are impracticable, some are preposterous. Of the many plans, that which seems the most practical and the most to be desired is the erection of a great Union Station. In the matter of railway stations San Francisco has remained long enough in the village stage. True, the Ferry Building is a handsome and commodious one; it serves its uses well; for many purposes it was invaluable during the recent great fire. Still, a ferry station is not a railway station. No great city can be adequately served, for either passenger or freight traffic purposes, by boats which cross the water. Even England, which is cut off from the Continent by the "Silver Streak," is again considering running railway trains in a tunnel under the Channel. New York, at its Grand Union Central Station, is already entered by one great trunk railway and a number of minor ones. But New York is about to have another great railway station, entered by a tunnel from the Jersey shore, through which the Pennsylvania Railway and subsidiary corporations will land their passengers in the heart of the city.

San Francisco, it is true, has another railway station in addition to the Ferry Building—the Third and Townsend street station. This has been assuming greater importance, as the Coast Division has been gradually merging into the main line, and as the fast limited trains have been entering San Francisco by way of the peninsula. The station itself, however, has not assumed proportions commensurate with the importance of its trains. The railway people are not to be blamed for this, for they have not possessed sufficient land to erect a great station there, and have not found it possible to meet the prices of the land owners around them even for freight-yard purposes, much less for a great passenger station. But the burning of San Francisco's business district is bringing about such sweeping changes that the Southern Pacific people probably do not regret that they did not begin construction at Third and Townsend. The erection of a passenger railway station much nearer the center of the city is now more feasible, and already the idea is taking shape and doubtless it will soon be in concrete form.

Will the city be asked to spend several millions of dollars in the erection of a Grand Union Station in the heart of the city? It has been suggested that the present site of the City Hall would be an excellent one for a railway station. There seems to be an objection among many municipal officials to rebuilding the City Hall on its old site. Why, we do not know. We see no good reason for removing the City Hall, but if it be erected elsewhere its location would be an excellent site for a Union Station. If not, there is plenty of vacant land in the immediate vicinity which doubtless could be secured. At present there is much vacant land in San Francisco, we are sorry to say.

If the station be erected on this or any other central site the trains will enter it by means of an underground approach—probably a shallow tunnel like the Subway in New York, where the street is practically a steel-arched roof to the tunnel. The old Fourth Avenue approach in New York to the Grand Central Station at Forty-second Street is a very good type of tunnel; that thoroughfare is generally called "Park Avenue" by New Yorkers, by reason of the little parked plots which dot its center for many blocks, to permit the escape of smoke and steam from the trains below. If such an approach were constructed in San Francisco, the steam locomotives should be dropped on the outskirts of the city, and the trains brought in to the central station by means of electric locomotives, in which method Baltimore was the pioneer in this country. This project would be linked with the plan of bridging the bay at Dumbarton Point, by which all of the transcontinental trains and many other fast and limited trains would come directly into San Francisco without trans-shipping passengers at the ferry. A further point in this plan which would please San Franciscans would be that the fast trains would run directly through the hated and rival city of Oakland, side-tracking her, so to speak, and leaving her off the map.

The idea of a Union Station is so admirable that all manner of objections will at once be made to it. It has been a general rule in California, when in doubt over any proposition, to find out what the Southern Pacific wanted and then do the other thing. It has frequently been perplexing, however, when it was not known precisely what the Southern Pacific wanted. In that case it was generally decided to oppose the probable preference of the railroad. If subsequent developments showed that this was a mistake, the press and people would suddenly switch to the other track. At present, however, Californians, and San Franciscans above all, are not so bitter against the Southern Pacific as they used to be. Doubtless they will become so after a decent interval. But just at present the recollections of the calamity and its generosity to the refugees are too recent for any of us to begin knocking. But we all of us have our little hammers laid away.

The first objection to the plan as outlined by the daily press, is that it is a "Southern Pacific scheme to get the city to spend several millions of dollars for the railroad." We do not think so. If the city were to sell the land to the Southern Pacific and permit the corporation to erect a railway station alone, then the objection would be that "the Southern Pacific was monopolizing terminal facilities." The answer to this second objection is that if neither the city nor the Southern Pacific may build the station, the next corporation eligible to undertake it would be the Santa Fe. But a similar objection would lie there. That proposition being turned down, there would remain only the Western Pacific, which, being a newer corporation and not yet inside of San Francisco, is much more popular than the older ones. When it gets here, it will have to divide the curse with them. But even a new, pure, shiney white and virginal railway gradually grows grimey and black in the eyes of the populace and the press, as it begins to haul. Against the Western Pacific there would be urged the same objection, "monopoly." Such being the facts, perhaps it would be best to conclude that the municipal corporation is the corporation to undertake the work.

From a pecuniary standpoint the city has nothing to fear. The plan would cost several millions of dollars, it is true, but the money could be readily obtained by issuing bonds. If the city entertained doubts as to its ability to finance the loan or to construct the building and its approaches, it could turn the matter over to a holding corporation or a constructing corporation. There are plenty of men in the United States who would jump at the proposition. Then the station would belong to no one railway company, but either to the city or the holding corporation, which would lease terminal facilities to the railways. Naturally, in constructing the building and its approaches, it would be only fair to consult the wishes of the various corporations about to lease it. They would not only provide the interest on the bonds and a sinking fund for maintenance and betterments, but they would in not many years pay enough in rentals wipe out the face of the bonds. In fact, the chief difficulty in floating the loan would be that potential purchasers might object to the bonds on the ground that their life would be too short.

San Francisco ought to carry this plan into execution while she is still in the embryonic condition following the recent fire. In a year or two it would be difficult to have such a choice of sites as now. Nearly every large city in the United States has a Union Station. They have been found indispensable. Strangers from other cities arriving in San Francisco wonder how we do business with our present primitive methods. New York, which for years has had one of the largest stations in the country, is enlarging it and supplementing it by another, as we said above. Washington, the capital city, is also completing a magnificent Union Station. All over the United States many cities much smaller than San Francisco possess handsome and capacious Union Stations. In the great cities of the Old World it would be impossible to concentrate all the railways in a single station, but the plan of bringing them close into the heart of the city is almost universal. In London, for example, there are fourteen great railway stations near the center of the city. All these may be called "Union Stations," numerous as they are. For example, Victoria Station—which is in the heart of the West End near Buckingham Palace—is the terminal point for six railway lines. So are other great stations in London are Euston Square, St. Pancras, King's Cross, Paddington, Liverpool Street, Cannon Street, Charing Cross, and Waterloo. If anyone doubts their "greatness" he need only take up a stand at Charing Cross or Cannon Street Station—we were going to say during the busy hours, but we will modify it and say almost any hour of the night or day. To give an idea of the size of these great stations, Paddington is not the largest in London, and is the terminus of only a single railway, the Great Western, yet it is enormous and holds so many thousands of people that its platforms are lined with eating stations and newspapers stands. Two or three of them could never accommodate the thousands of people who are there at the same time.

It is a curious and instructive sight, looking down from the Tower bridge on the great city of London, to see the scores of trains threading their way at full speed through this vast wilderness of bricks and mortar. London has no time to go far afield to take its trains. Its trains must come into London, and come rapidly. Different nations have different ways of doing things. We in America prefer a tunnel; in London they prefer a viaduct. So while there are miles and miles of railway tunnels in London, there are more miles of viaducts. Signaled by their white steam amid the dingy chimneys, threading their way over land purchased at fabulous sums, these railway trains make their way into the great central stations.

Paris, like London, has many great railway stations—over a dozen. The principal ones are those of the Eastern Railway, the Invalides, the St. Lazare, the Lyons, the Northern Railway, the Orleans, and the Strassburg Railway. These too are all in toward the heart of the city, the St. Lazare Station, being just behind the Opéra, while the Eastern and Northern Railways tations are also close in, just off the Rue Lafayette. Paris has her underground system also, as well as an admirable Belt Railway, by which it is possible for a traveler round, let us say, from London to Marseilles, to run around on the Belt Railway, and not be forced to disembark in Paris.

Berlin has a magnificent Union Railway station, and there are many minor cities in Europe, like Bale in Switzerland, which possess fine railway terminals—magnificent stations which put to shame the present facilities enjoyed by the city of San Francisco.

The financial side of this proposition need not be feared. There will be other means of revenue besides rental from the railways. All sorts of facilities for travelers could be afforded. Stores and shops could be rented in the ground floors; on the upper floors there would be space for restaurants, news stands, and other establishments catering to travelers, and there could even be a terminal hotel in the building. For the best hotel in Northwestern England, in our opinion, is a part of the enormous Northwestern Railway Station in Liverpool. It is quite possible to sleep very comfortably in the terminal hotels, as English railway trains move in and out of the stations without the barbaric clamor which is so characteristic of ours.

There are other considerations which will appeal to San Franciscans in favor of such a station. If the city owned such a building it could be devoted to other uses beside those of a terminal station. A gigantic hall or "concourse," such as is found in many great railway stations, could be used for mass meetings and similar gatherings. Our Ferry Building is by no means equal in size to many of the railway stations in other cities, but even it has served many purposes. Have not great statesmen while traveling held receptions there?

There is another point which will appeal to many thousands of our people. Since the destruction of the Mechanics' Pavilion by fire there no longer remains in San Francisco any large building suited for amusement purposes. The destruction of the Mechanics' Pavilion to many brought a distinct pang. Since the early '80's all sorts of famous events have taken place there—Authors' Carnivals, giddy mask balls, dog fights, cock fights, John L. Sullivan knockouts, and the many hippodromes of recent years. There seem to be more suckers in the city, by the way, than there used to be in the early '80's. If the fight promoters had tried to run so many raw fakes on the men of the early '80's as they do on the present rising flip generation, the gentlemen holding down seats at $5.00 per would have grabbed a bunch of fighters and their managers and wouldn't have done a thing to them.

And this is another of the many excellent reasons why we ought to have a Union Station. We have not a single building in which to pull off fake fights for the suckers of the rising generation.

Germany and Insurance.

The Argonaut has been not a little amused at the attempt of some journals to create a belief that the Kaiser would interfere in the present insurance tangle on the side of the San Francisco policy-holders. We remarked a fortnight ago that as Germany has a constitutional government and possesses courts of law, we did not see how it was possible for the Kaiser to interfere.

Since then the following dispatch has come to hand:

BERLIN, July 18.—The Tageblatt today affirms that it is authorized to deny the report that the German Government is considering the propriety of using its right of inspection in the case of fire insurance, in order to compel the settlement of the San Francisco claims against the German companies. The legal situation is regarded as being extraordinarily complicated. The Government could only interpose after its rights have been legally established.

Sky-Scraping Fire Apparatus.

Amid the clamor of contending factions over sky-scrapers and ordinary buildings, we observe that the sky-scraping advocates have not touched on one vital point, which is this: To protect sky-scrapers you must have a sky-scraper fire apparatus; to extinguish fires twelve, sixteen or eighteen stories above the ground you must have fire apparatus that will reach some twenty stories above the ground. Where is such apparatus to come from? The San Francisco Fire Department does not possess water towers or ladders high enough or pressure strong enough to reach to the top of such lofty buildings. The fire in the World Building in New York some years ago burned out the stairs and elevator shafts half way up the building and cut off the occupants of the upper stories. The firemen were unable to reach the top of the building, and for a time it looked as if many lives would be lost. In St. Louis last week a fire broke out on the thirteenth floor of the Missouri Pacific Building. The water towers and extension ladders failed to reach anywhere near the thirteenth floor. The firemen had to hoist up hose by ropes from the windows of adjacent sky-scrapers. The fire was put out with great difficulty. Had it not been for the adjacent lofty buildings its extinction would have been impossible.

Again we ask the sky-scraper advocates how they are going to protect sky-scraper buildings without a sky-scraper fire department?

Crooked Sauerkraut Companies.

One of the worst of the defaulting foreign companies is the Rhine and Moselle of Strassburg. This company owes its policy-holders in San Francisco $4,250,000. It absolutely refuses to pay a cent. It says that the earthquake clause in its policies renders it not liable. The German managers met a committee of policy-holders the other day and made these statements. They added, however, that the company was disposed to "make a gift" to the policy-holders because they were sufferers. They said that this "donation" would probably not be more than five hundred thousand dollars.

The policy-holders warmly resented this. The chairman, Joseph Herzog, said, "I am not a pauper. If your company is not liable I do not want a dollar from it, but if it is liable it must pay me in full." The other members of the committee expressed themselves likewise.

The committee asked the German managers if in their opinion all the fires of April 18th, 19th and 20th were due to earthquake. "Yes," they replied. "But," said the chairman, "San Francisco used to average three fires a day. During these three days, therefore, there must have been nine ordinary fires. Can your company tell which were the extraordinary earthquake fires and which were ordinary ones?" The Rhine and Moselle managers refused to reply. "If," said the chairman, "there was any fire not caused by earthquake, was not your company liable for loss under such a fire?" "If there was such a fire," replied the German chairman, "is there in your policies any clause stipulating that we, the policy-holders must furnish you with a water supply?" To this also the German managers refused to reply. The committee withdrew, intending to advise the general body of policy-holders to bring suit against the Rhine and Moselle, and to refuse this sop of sauerkraut so contemptuously thrown to them.

The Greatest of These Is Charity.

Last week the Pacific Press, a large printing plant belonging to the Seventh Day Adventists, a religious body located at Mountain View, was completely destroyed by fire. The plant was the largest in California of its kind, including type-setting machines, power presses, job presses, photo-engraving plant, book binding plant, etc. A paper was published there called "The Signs of the Times," the denominational organ of the Seventh Day Adventists. A large amount of book and newspaper printing was done there, including religious publications, tracts, leaflets, etc.

The managers of this printing plant were sincere believers, thorough-going exponents of their belief, and had the courage of their convictions. As the Seventh Day Adventists reject Sunday as the Sabbath, and believe that Saturday is the Biblical day of rest, they have always kept their plant going on Sundays and have shut down on Saturdays. Furthermore, they have always refused to print any books or publications which did not accord with their ideas of what is right.

When the Argonaut was burned out last April and found itself without type, linotype or press, we made haste to ascertain where we could get this journal printed. So complete was the demolition of printing plants in San Francisco, so incomplete were those to be found in small towns, and so rushed with work were those in the lesser cities, that we were forced at first as far afield as Chicago in our search for temporary accommodations. This led to an unfounded rumor, which still exists, that the Argonaut contemplated abandoning San Francisco for the East.

In our extremity we addressed ourselves to the Pacific Press. The managers very politely replied that they would be glad to print the Argonaut, but according to Adventist tenets they could not do so unless we would guarantee that nothing of an irreligious nature should appear in its reading columns, and that no liquor or tobacco announcements should appear in its advertising columns.

Now the Argonaut cannot claim to be religious. It tries to be as religious as it may. But in that regard it is like the reformed Celtic inebriate whose parish priest met him after a slight backslide. "Ah, Patrick, Patrick," cried the reverend gentleman, "I thought I had made a teetotaler of you." "So ye did, Father," replied Pat, gazing at him with moist eyes, "and it's a teetotaler I am, your riverence, but I'm not a bigoted wan." Correspondingly the Argonaut tries to be religious, but when it comes to tobacco co and liquor we try not to be bigoted. The Argonaut as a corporation does not indulge in alcohol and has never been addicted to the use of tobacco as a beverage, but as we have never believed in sumptuary legislation, we have always thought it well to allow every man to poison himself in his own way, whether it be with coffee, tobacco or rum. We are aware that this may seem selfish and cynical, but we are also aware that if we worried much over the matter it would make no difference to the gentlemen addicted to tobacco and to rum. Therefore, we let them alone. Correspondingly if dealers wish to advertise their wares, even if they be vinous or nicotine, we have always permitted them to do so. We try to advertise only wares which are the genuine stuff. Personally, we think that all liquor is bad enough without any deleterious ingredients being added. But the matter works out its own salvation, for only dealers having first-class wet goods patronize the Argonaut, as its readers are so critical that they will not knowingly purchase aniline wines or fusil oil whisky.

Although without reproach in these regards, we were much cast down by the rebuke of the religious manager of the Pacific Press, courteously as it was couched, and mildly modified so as not to wound the publican and sinner. Thanking him for his courtesy, we turned to go. As a farewell gift he presented us with several tracts and a copy of "The Signs of the Times." This latter journal contained an article beginning "Woe, Woe!" It was tinged with a stern joy, and was addressed to some lady who apparently had led a loose life, who came from Babylon, and who sat on seven hills. "The Signs of the Times" applied an unpleasant epithet to her never seen out of the Bible, and seemed to be really glad that something had happened to her. And the religious journal said that her fate was a "special judgment of God," and went on and prophesied that a great many more things would happen to her before God got through.

Well, they have. Poor San Francisco has had her face down in the ashes now for lo, these many weeks.

But how about the Pacific Press plant? How about the Seventh Day Adventists? How about "The Signs of the Times"? and how about the religious editor who wrote "Woe, Woe!"? We do not want to be unkind, but it seems to us as if our pious brethren have had some kind of a special happening in Mountain View.

We in San Francisco could scarcely have suffered from a "special judgment of God," for we all went down together—Christian and pagan, Mongol, Jew and Gentile, publican and sinner. The churches were hit harder than any other buildings—hardly any of them are left; archbishop and rabbi, minister and Russian pope, mourn the loss of cathedral and synagogue, temple and orthodox Greek church. So there could not have been a "special judgment" in our case—if so, it would have hit the saloons, and left the churches alone.

But how about the Pacific Press? More than three months after the great fire a special one comes to wipe out the Seventh Day Adventists' plant. Whatever can they have been a-doing of? Perhaps speaking uncharitably of their neighbors.

Well, we'll all forgive them. There's no unkindness. All of us San Franciscans are broke, our property is destroyed, and the insurance companies won't pay us. Now our Mountain View friends, the Seventh Day Adventists, are ruined too.

Come in, brethren, and join the band. The printers and publishers are all close up under the droppings of the sanctuary, for they need salvation most. Brother Spreckels, will you please move along and give the new arrivals a show? Brother De Young, couldn't you make a little room on that Mourners' Bench? Brother Hearst, will you kindly take your place on that penitential stool, and make room for the new mourners? Step up, brethren—step right up in front, and take your places on the Mourners' Bench?

We will now sing: "While a plant holds out to burn, the vilest sinner may return." Page 77, right hand side, top of the column, "While a plant holds out to burn." All of the congregation will please rise and sing.

The Insurance Situation.

Two weeks after the great disaster the Argonaut made a careful canvass of the situation and remarked that it was our belief that some thirty companies would attempt to evade liability; that the German companies would probably attempt to repudiate their policies; that it was our belief that the British insurance companies would stand strictly by the letter of their contracts, but that they at least would pay what they had to pay. We are sorry to say that our forecast is coming true.

The Duchess Insurance Company of Poughkeepsie, New York, will be unable to meet its San Francisco losses. It is organizing a new company to be known as the Duchess Fire Insurance Company. The old company has liabilities of something like $700,000 in San Francisco. The new company will doubtless endeavor to get new business.

The North German of Hamburg has at last decided to deny all liability, taking refuge behind its earthquake clause. Its liabilities in the burned district are estimated at over $4,500,000. Walter Speyer, for many years local manager, has resigned, as he will not countenance the company's course.

The Williamsburg City Fire Insurance Company is another defaulting company which is trying to avoid its just liabilities. It is attempting to secure the removal of actions brought against it from the California courts to the Federal courts.

The Eagle Insurance Company of New York is another concern which revoked the appointment of its local manager in order to force the policy-holders to sue in the New York courts.

The American Insurance Company of Newark, N. J., is returning objections to its policy-holders' proofs of loss, demanding all sorts of impossible conditions, such as "furnishing verified plans and specifications of the fixtures and machinery, etc., destroyed;" likewise "all books of accounts, bills, invoices and other vouchers, etc., destroyed." As the loss of nearly every business man was total, it may easily be seen how impossible is this demand.

The Milwaukee Mechanics' Insurance Company of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, has not as yet paid any of its policy-holders. It claims it is prevented from so doing by a peculiar Wisconsin statute, and it is bringing suit ostensibly to have this statute set aside.

THE GREAT FIRE AT NIGHT.

Billows of Flame—Leaping up High as if to Reach the Stars—The Fiery Shower of Cinders—The Dull Roar of Dynamite.

Strange as it may seem, in none of the accounts of the great fire that I have seen have any writers dwelt on the scene at night. They have told of the great volume of smoke in the daytime, of the remarkable appearance of the sun, of the rain of sand and cinders, but they none of them have described (or rather tried to describe) the awfulness of the night scene.

Our residence is in the Western Addition, near the new center, Fillmore street. Little narrow Fillmore street, which before the fire used to seem like the principal street of a sleepy country town, is now the center of retail trade. On Thursday afternoon of the 19th, our part of town was largely deserted by the householders. Nearly all the people had packed up, and left for the Park or Presidio, for the smoke was getting nearer and nearer, and increasing in volume. We all knew that if the fire crossed Van Ness, our home, too, must go, so I packed up ready for the notice to leave that had been given to so many others. What a queer sensation that was! To go deliberately among your belongings, your treasured gatherings of years, and save what you could carry. "What you can carry" means very little when you have a long distance to travel, with nothing but your feet to take you there and just two hands to bear the burden.

We were about to start, for the fire seemed to be about two blocks away, and we had determined to wait till it got that near us, before we left. When we were ready to go our nearest neighbors suggested that we should first approach the fire as near as possible, before we left for good. So we walked toward the fire and found it much farther away than we expected.

We walked to Gough and Washington streets, just below Lafayette Park, where thousands had taken refuge; and from there we saw that the fire had been measurably confined to the east side of Van Ness avenue. I had crossed the avenue at the Clau Spreckels' mansion, and the stable, which faced on Sacramento street, was then burning. Franklin street to the west side of Van Ness had caught and burned for a few blocks, but they told us they were going to make a final effort there to stop its westward course, and stop it they did.

It was between seven and eight o'clock in the evening; the hill is high just there, and from the corner we could look over a scene which can never be forgotten. As far as the eye could reach, to the south and away toward the Mission; looking toward Russian Hill on the north (the fire was then spreading that way) there was a raging sea of flame. We were two blocks away from the actual blaze; yet we could hardly face it, so intense was the heat. Miles of fire and smoking, blazing ruin spread out before us. Our beloved city was in flames. It looked like what in our childhood we were taught Hell would be—a consuming fire that roared and swayed and leaped up high into the heavens, as if it desired to reach the stars that looked down on us, for the night was a beautiful one.

Now and then a dull roar announced that more dynamite was being used. A high leap of flame and white smoke would mark the place.

"Look!" said a bystander, "Look! you will never see such a sight again."

Pray God, no. I hope no city ever will. It seemed too horrible to be real. It was as if one were in the throes of a monstrous nightmare, out of which one must awake. It did not seem as if we were living in it at all, but as if it were a spectacle devised to terrify us. It was a hideous dream; it was anything but a reality.

We were so stunned with our hours of horror that we did not take it all in; our minds were not capable of it. People ever forgot what day of the week it was. And all the time over us there fell a rain of sand and lime and cinders, that stung and blinded us and added the finishing touch to the awful scene.

It was Hell. Hell personified. Words fail me when trying to tell another what it was like. It would take a Dante to describe it, a Dore to picture it.

Some walls and chimneys yet stood, but they only served to heighten the effect as the hungry flames leaped to their tops and waved tongues of fire into the still air.

Picture it, you who did not see it. Think of standing on a high hill and as far as you could see before you imagine billows on billows of flame and vast volumes of smoke. Think of a blaze so great that you could read fine print miles off. You can dimly picture what that night scene was in San Francisco.

AN EARTHQUAKE EPISODE.

The Story of a Husband, a Lover and a Wife.

We were returning from the fair of Liorio by a zigzag mule-path over the mountain. Jennari had treated me to a good dinner, as he had been paid a fine price for his wares, and we had dined so heartily that the jarring gait of the mule was anything but agreeable. And we had lingered so long at the table that we were late, too. It must have been two o'clock in the morning; and the sky was so densely covered with clouds that I could scarcely see the mule's head. During the first mile I had lighted my dark lantern, which illumined the path for a yard or two, but after a half hour the oil failed, and we were in utter darkness.

My friend Jennari, accustomed as he was to these mountain trails, little heeded our predicament, besides, he had faith in his wiles, while the bargains he had made at the fair, and the prospect of soon seeing his dear Aquila, put him in a cheery frame of mind.

"I assure you," he said to me, "I assure you my eight days' absence from the side of my dear bride seems an age. You should know the difficulties and struggles I went through to win her. Since our school days we had been sweethearts, and for eight years she made me crazy by her indecision. And when I inherited those beautiful lands from Uncle Nunzio, do you think that her parents were willing to give her to me? Not at all. But, by Jove, I was more obstinate than they; and now, after eight years' striving, she is under my roof—good wife, faithful and loving! Yes, Aquila loves me now. She sees the difference between me and that silly fop, since our marriage.

"Who was your rival, Jennari?" I asked. "Mario Talanca, the ridiculous son of that good woman, Appolonia. Do you know him? He is a fool who thinks himself irresistible to all women, because he dresses stylishly and can twirl his cane like a juggler. It was he, mind you, who thought to keep Aquila from me. Bah!"

Jennari spoke with so much heat that I knew that the contest for Aquila's hand must have been a bitter one, and I also saw at victory had not softened his hatred for Talanca. There was no doubt of Jennari's loyalty for his bride, still I was not so sure he reciprocated his affection. But I was not so silly as to tell him so.

Daylight had dawned as my companion was recounting his story, and finally we reached the town. Town, did I say? Heavens what desolation and ruin! A glance told us the sad tale—a dreadful earthquake had laid waste the pretty little village. We sprang from our saddles in haste, leaving the mules on the path. Over piles of stones, between crumbled walls, past groups of weeping people, we ran in dread haste.

"Surely my house is not wrecked," shouted Jennari. "It is built on a rock, and the walls are strongly anchored to the rock with iron rods."

"Let us hope so," I answered. "Here is the house standing."

A few paces on there was a torch standing between two stumps, heaven knows for what signal. Jennari snatched it and scrambled up the hillside. Another violent tremor came and the earth slid from under our feet; as we passed out of a doorway an arch tumbled behind us; and two big blocks of granite grazed our bodies. Amid the roar of tumbling buildings and the screams of despair I heard a cry of joy from Jennari: "My house is safe. Look! There! There!"

We ran, jumped, slid, climbed, flew. The door was open and we hastened in.

"Aquila! Aquila!"

Up to the attic, down to the ground floor, into the cellar.

"Aquila! Aquila!"

The house was empty. She must have fled into the streets. He took another torch from the storeroom, and again rushed out, waving the torch wildly around amidst the thick dust still lingering from the shock.

"Aquila! Aquila! I am here! Who has seen Aquila Jennari? Aquila Jennari, who has seen her?"

Shouting hoarsely, up and down the town, heedless of the wailing of the wounded, over new ruins, over yawning abysses, out into the open country, Jennari ran.

"Aquila Jennari! Who has seen Aquila Jennari?"

But no one answered his frantic cries. He was distraught, and I had more and more trouble in quieting him.

"Your house is standing," I said, "and your wife must be safe."

"That is certain," he exclaimed; "but where is she?"

"She has fled to the open, of course. It will soon be light and then our search will be easy."

But my words fell on deaf ears, and he would have again begun his mad flight if a wild cry, coming from the heart of a woman—a mother-cry—had not checked him.

"My son! my son! I hear him calling!"

Forgetting for the instant his own grief, Jennari, stopped. His torch revealed a handsome old woman, a gray shadow, gray as the ruins on which she was crouched, feverishly, madly digging with bloody nails in the rubbish.

"Jennari, you son of Bonaria, whom I loved like a sister," she wailed, "forget your hate against my son! He is here alive! Aid me to find him, Jennari!"

He did not hesitate a moment. Sticking the torch between two chalky masses, he began to dig with superhuman ardor. Stones, door-jambs, slates, tiles, and broken and crushed utensils, we tossed aside hastily, while the poor mother pointed to the spots where we could locate the bedroom, the living-room, or the studio. All at once, in removing a heavy adobe block, I discovered a hole, and reaching in felt an arm.

"Here!" I called out excitedly. "I have found the opening to a room."

The beautiful old woman sprang forward with a tiger-like movement. "Mario! Mario, my son! Tell me you are alive! Give me your hand! Mario, my Mario!" she screamed into the opening. But no voice replied.

We were compelled to use our utmost strength to tear her away, and she only yielded when Jennari threatened to leave her if she did not allow us to continue our digging. He seized the torch, fixed it to a pole, and thrusting it through the aperture moved it around the ruined room. The walls were intact, but the ceiling, half fallen, covered the floor. From the rubbish protruded a leg. Jennari looked around, swung into the hole and let himself down to the bottom. I handed the torch to him, and he began his search of the room. The mother crouched at the edge of the grave-like ruin, gazing into the depths with breathless shuddering, and following his every move as he wildly tore away the debris.

Jennari's labored breathing suddenly ceased, he uttered an exclamation of horror, and dropped the torch. He recovered it quickly, and by its flickering light we saw two bodies in close embrace, crushed one against the other. Oh, the horror of that grisly spectacle!

Jennari started from the corner of the room, and stood beside the bodies, a picture of satanic fury. His eyebrows contracted until they covered the pupils, his back rose in an arch, his hands were raised like claws, ready to clutch. With the cry of a wild animal, he fell upon the bodies, one hand disappeared into the hair of the man, the other grasped the tresses of the woman, while with livid face he tried to separate the two mouths from their last voluptuous kiss, sealed by death.

He slowly rose from his gruesome task, and gazed at the grief-distorted face of the mother. Up from the depths of that tomb of sin and death came the sardonic voice of Jennari:

"Don't grieve, Madame Appolonia, your son is dead, crushed to death in the embraces of my wife, don't grieve! The earthquake has done him full justice!"

I bounded forward to grasp the mother as she sprang as if to throw herself into the opening. I had not taken five steps before a second and more tremendous shock opened new fissures and heaped ruin on ruin. Faithful husband and faithless wife were in a common grave.—Translated for the Argonaut from the Italian of Francesco Caputi, by Augusta Bixler.

A Letter From the German Consul.

Recently the Argonaut copied from the dailies some statements attributed to Mr. F. Bopp, the German Consul at San Francisco, concerning the alleged interference of the Imperial German Government in insurance matters in San Francisco. We questioned then whether these remarks attributed to Mr. Bopp could be correct, and remarked that, in our opinion, their authenticity was extremely doubtful. Mr. Bopp now corroborates our paragraph. We are glad that he has done so, for the printing in the daily papers of mis-statements apparently coming from an official of such standing would lead to misconceptions on the part of policy-holders in German companies, and would buoy them up with false hopes.

Consul Bopp said:

KAISERLICH DEUTSCHES KONSULAT,

Oakland, Cal., July 23d, 1906.

To the Editor of the Argonaut—Dear Sir: My attention having been called only lately to the article referring to the German Fire Insurance Companies in your issue of the 14th inst., I beg to inform you that your doubts with reference to the authenticity of the remarks attributed to me—

"That the German Insurance Companies

"would pay all claims dollar-for-dollar,

"that the German Emperor had ordered

"them to do so, that I advised all policy-

"holders not to settle in any case, etc."— are well founded. Notwithstanding repeated denials on my part these alleged remarks are still being quoted occasionally and commented upon. I, therefore, deem it advisable to emphasize again that I never made those or any similar remarks. The view that I take in the matter was defined in a statement that I made to Mr. F. W. Dohrmann Sr., Vice-President of the Policy-Holders Protective League and which Mr. Dohrmann caused to be published in several papers.

In this statement I said, that according to my information the German Insurance Companies were solvent, that they were able to pay all losses in full, that therefore their financial condition did not in itself necessitate any general "horizontal" cut, that there was no reason why just claims should not be paid in full and that a compromise was only justifiable in cases involving uncertainty as to law or facts.

At the same time I advised the policy-holders to be patient and reasonable, to appreciate the extraordinary difficulties with which the companies have to contend and to give them the time required to examine their losses and raise the necessary funds, as a hurried realization of their assets would necessarily involve great losses and eventually lead to their insolvency which would otherwise be avoidable and therefore be detrimental to the interests of the policy-holders as well as to the interests of the companies.

You would greatly oblige me by kindly inserting this communication in full in your valuable paper.

Yours respectfully,

ROPP,
Imperial German Consul.

Reform Republicans find attractive the name of "Lincoln Republicans" to distinguish them from the regular sort. The name started in Philadelphia last year, and it has now reached New Hampshire.

AFTER THE DISASTER.

Earthquake Remnants — Catastrophic
Ashes—Paraphrastic Slag—Cinders, Debris, Dross.

Principal Armstrong is teaching the 800 pupils in the tented schools of Golden Gate Park how the soil can be cultivated. Two acres of ground have been laid out in sections of 100 square feet. The school children already know the names of nearly all the birds and half the plants in the park.

Charles Dormon Robinson succeeded in making a number of paintings of the fire when it was at its greatest height, on Thursday night, April 18, from 11 to 3 in the morning. Mr. Robinson was in the fires of 1851, 1853 and 1854, as well as in the much greater catastrophe of 1906.

The steamer Deutschland, which left New York on April 16, received from an unknown steamer news of the disaster by wireless telegraphy. The message was to the effect that the entire city of San Francisco was destroyed. Many San Francisco people were on the steamer. Says the Call: "Among them was a woman prominent in the highest society circles and the wife of one of our multimillionaires. When the news reached her she became momentarily insane and made a wild dash across the deck and attempted to jump over the rail into the sea, when she was caught by some of the officers of the ship and carried to her cabin."

One of the hills before the claims committee of the relief fund is that presented by Varney & Green for $34,000, which the firm says represents the amount of lumber which was torn from their hillboards during the emergency days to be used in the construction of the rustic kitchens which formerly adorned the streets. The committee offered the firm $5000, but they refused, saying, "The billboards were our stock in trade."

"What would you like, madam?" asked a Red Cross official of a woman in the line of refugees. "A baby grand piano." was the unexpected response. "I am a concert singer, and I see in the papers that you are rehabilitating people in their business. If you can get me a piano. I shall be awfully obliged to you." The next in line was a man who asked to be given a wooden leg. He lost his in the fire.

On July 13th workmen were excavating in the basement of what was a book store on Montgomery Street, near Post. After removing a quantity of bricks and twisted iron, they unearthed a pile of smoldering books, which had been buried since April 18th. When exposed to the air the smoldering mass burst into flame. The heat was so intense that the workmen were compelled to abandon their task temporarily.

On the morning of April 19 Henry Payot, senior member of the firm of Payot, Upham & Co., struggled up Van Ness avenue from Ellis street with two trunks filled with his most precious possessions. He left them at the house of Attorney Walter H. Linforth, at 1400 Washington street, where he thought they would be safe. That night the flames came close to Linforth's home and Henry Payot again took up his burden. He managed to climb to the top of Russian Hill, where a friend promised to watch the precious trunks. The next day Russian Hill was swept by fire and Payot's two trunks disappeared in smoke. Yet his house at 911 Ellis street, from which he had hurriedly rescued his valuables, withstood the flames.

The impression still prevails in the minds of many San Franciscans that hundreds of injured persons were hurned to death in the Mechanics' Pavilion, which was used as an emergency hospital. This is denied by Election Commissioner McGuire. "I have heard on several occasions that the doctors had to chloroform the patients to put them out of misery," says Mr. McGuire. "This report is denied by such reliable men as Dr. James Ward, president of the Board of Health; Chief Steward Burcher of the Emergency Hospital and other parties that were in the pavilion before it hurned down. I was helping at the pavilion until it caught fire and helped to carry the last patient out just as the roof started to burn."

The block bounded by Greenwich, Lombard, Polk and Larkin streets escaped the flames which swept the Russian Hill district. The buildings were saved because it is a block peopled by homeowners. Their homes represented the savings of a lifetime, and when the fire had driven the soldiers from the scene the householders dodged back through the smoke, determined to do the utmost to save their property. They had no water, but found a barrel of vinegar. The barrel of vinegar was rolled out on the sidewalk. Men gave their coats and women tore off their skirts to be dipped into that vinegar and hung upon the walls and roofs as shields against the flames of the blazing houses sixty feet away. Thus, in the midst of fire, these people fought for hours and conquered.

Hundreds of buildings east of Howard street and south of Fourteenth street escaped the flames, although all else west of Howard and north of Fourteenth was destroyed. The people in the saved district owe their homes to the foresight of John Center. Mr. Center constructed his own water system as early as 1851. It includes artesian wells, a large subterranean reservoir, two frame tanks with a capacity of 80,000 gallons each, fire hydrants and a steam pump with a capacity of 20,000 gallons an hour. Two streams of water from this system supplied four engines, which fought the flames for twenty-seven hours and checked the fire on Howard street and again on Fourteenth. On Friday morning, April 20th, there remained six feet of water in the tanks, enough to have maintained two stream for fifteen more hours, or to have fed one stream indefinitely from the large subterranean reservoir.

"Many persons," says the Bookman, "will remember the extraordinary sensation created in Paris two or three years ago by the vaticinations of a certain Mademoiselle Couedon, whose feats of clairvoyance astonished the French capital. In January, 1905, the correspondent of a New York newspaper secured from the French sibyl a forecast of the events of the coming year. In addition to a number of other prophecies, was a striking and somewhat detailed prediction of the fate which was impending over an American city, the name of which, however, was not given. The toppling over of tall buildings was graphically described, and particular stress was laid upon the disturbances which were to take place beneath the surface of the earth. Apparently, and in fact obviously, the fate of San Francisco had in some way projected itself within the range of this woman's second sight."

Of the forty-three attorneys engaged in the litigation over the Julius Friedman estate but three appeared in Judge Kerrigan's court when the case came up last week, and the hearing had to be postponed. Friedman was found dead in bed at the Palace Hotel on January 1, 1900, leaving an estate valued at $500,000. That forty attorneys should fail to show up at the division of a half-million shows strikingly the dislocation of the legal world.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Among the birthday honors recently was a knighthood for F. Carruthers Gould, the political caricaturist of the Westminster Gazette. Thus has another cartoonist joined Sir John Tenniel in that distinction. The honor meets with universal acclaim in the English press, even from the victims of Sir Francis's wit. He has done good service to the Liberal party.

H. J. McCoy, secretary of the San Francisco Y. M. C. A., announced July 16, that he had received an order from John D. Rockefeller to give $250,000 toward rebuilding the San Francisco Y. M. C. A. buildings provided an equal amount was received from others. Mr. McCoy said he had already obtained $105,000 in addition to the Rockefeller offer.

A polo player at 65 is P. F. Collier, owner of Collier's Weekly, a man of wealth. Mr. Collier is the most ardent of horsemen, and has been playing polo for twenty-five years. Several times during recent years it has been his misfortune to be injured; once he sustained a broken collar-bone. But these mishaps have left his enthusiasm unabated.

A witness of the battle of Waterloo, in 1815, has just completed her 104th year. She is Mme. Dupuy, who was born in Belgium in the year 1802. When a girl of 13 she saw from a neighboring hill the downfall of Napoleon on the famous battlefield. Before the fight she and her mother sold provisions to the French soldiers, and after the carnage both of them helped to pick up the wounded and hurry the dead.

The commission appointed to investigate the surrender of Port Arthur has finished its labors, and recommends that General Stoessel, former commander of the Russian forces at Port Arthur, be dismissed from the army and shot; that Lieutenant General Fock, who commanded the Fourth East Siberian division at Port Arthur, be dismissed from the army and undergo a year's hard labor; that General Reiss, chief of staff of General Stoessel, be dismissed and banished, and that Admiral Alexeff, former viceroy in the far East, Lieutenant General Smyrnoff, commander of the Port Arthur fortress, and General Vernander be reprimanded.

Winston Churchill is running for get there—he is a hard worker. A Governor of New Hampshire. He may part of his first novel, "The Celebrity," was written half a dozen times. "Richard Carvel" was written five times. While "The Crisis" was being written Mr. Churchill had an office in the business district, St. Louis, where he observed long business hours, writing, rewriting, dictating and revising. Trained at Annapolis for the navy, Winston Churchill deliberately adopted writing as a profession.

Alfred Beit, the well-known South African financier, died in London, July 16. Mr. Beit was born in 1853 at Hamburg. He was a life governor of the DeBeers Consolidated mines, and a director of the Rand mines, Rhodesia Railways, Behuanaland Railway trust, Consolidated Company, Bultfontein mine and British Chartered South Africa Company. A suit was brought against Mr. Beit on the ground of complicity in the Jameson raid and his prosecution was demanded by Dr. Leyd, the representative of the Transvaal in Europe and in 1896, his resignation from the board of directors of the British Chartered South Africa Company was accepted. When Cecil Rhodes died in 1902 Mr. Beit was one of his executors. Early in 1903 Mr. Beit had an apoplectic stroke at Johannesburg, and never fully regained his health. Mr. Beit is said to have been the richest man in London. He gave large sums of money to the Red Cross and other institutions and recently donated $500,000 to found a university at Hamburg. He controlled the output and price of the world's diamond industry.

Judge Schofield, of the Boston Superior Court, has officially laid down the right and wrong way of alighting from a car. The case which involved this pronouncement was that of a woman who sued the Old Colony Street Railway Company for damages because of injuries received in leaving a car. The defense was that the passenger got off with her face to the rear of the car. Because of this the judge instructed the jury as follows: "I shall instruct you, gentlemen, as a matter of law, that if this plaintiff in getting from this car got off from the left side, placing her left hand on the stanchion of the car and her right foot on the ground, so that she faced the rear of the car, and, while the car was in motion, attempted to get off while facing the rear of the car, she is guilty of contributory negligence and cannot recover."

JOAQUIN MILLER.

The Poet Tells of the Burning of San Francisco.

From his home, "The Heights," on the hills across the bay facing the Golden Gate, the poet saw the burning of San Francisco following the earthquake of April 18, 1906.)

Such darkness, as when Jesus died!
Then sudden dawn drove all before.
Two wee brown tomcats terrified,
Flashed through my open cottage door;
Then instant out and off again
And left a stillness like to pain—
Such stillness, darkness, sudden dawn
I never knew or looked upon!

This ardent, Occidental dawn
Dashed San Francisco's streets with gold,
Just gold and gold to walk upon,
As he of Patmos sang of old.
And still, so still, her streets, her steep,
As when some great soul silent weeps;
And, oh, that gold, that gold that lay
Beyond, above the tarn, brown hay!

And then a bolt, a jolt, a chill,
And mother earth seemed as afraid:
Then instant all again was still,
Save that my cattle from the shade
Where they had sought firm, rooted clay,
Came forth loud lowing, glad and gay
Knee-deep in grasses to rejoice
That all was well, with trumpet voice.

Not so yon city—darkness, dust,
Then martial men in swift array,
Then smoke, then flames, then great guns thrust
To heaven, as if pots of clay,
Cathedral, temple, palace, tower—
An hundred wars in one wild hour!
And still the smoke, the flame, the guns,
The piteous wail of little ones!

The mad flame climbed the costly steep,
But man, defiant, climbed the flame
What battles where the torn clouds keep!

What deeds of glory in God's name!
What sons of giants—giants, yea—
Or heedless lad or veteran gray.
Not Marathon nor Waterloo
Knew men so daring, dauntless, true!

Three days, three nights, three fearful days
Of death, of flame, of dynamite,
Of God's house thrown a thousand ways;
Blown east by day, blown west by night—
By night? There was no night. Nay,
The ghoulish flame lit nights that lay
Crouched down between this first, last day!
I say those nights were burned away!

And jealousies were hurned away,
And hurned were city rivalries,
Till all, white crescenting the bay,
Were one harmonious hive of bees.
Behold the bravest battle won!
The City Beautiful begun,
One solid San Francisco, one.
The fairest sight beneath the sun,

MISS IDE'S BIRTHDAY.

Was Formally Presented to Her by Robert Louis Stevenson.

When Miss Annie H. Ide, the fiancée of Bourke Cockran, was a little girl in nafores she was a pet of Robert Louis Stevenson in Samoa. She spent much of her time at the Stevenson bungalow, and the childless novelist wanted to adopt her.

Failing in this, Stevenson got permission from the Ides to have little Anne at his bungalow a certain number of hours a day. Once she complained that she was defrauded of her natural rights because she happened to have been born on a Christmas. The next day Mr. Ide received the following document:

"I, Robert Louis Stevenson, advocate of the Scots Bar, author of 'The Master of Ballantrae' and 'Moral Emblems,' civil engineer, sole owner and patentee of the palace and plantation known as Allima, in the island of Upola, Samoa, British subject, being in sound mind and pretty well, I thank you, in body; 'In consideration that Miss Annie H. Ide, daughter of H. C. Ide, was horned out of all reason upon Christmas Day, and is therefore out of all justice denied the consolation and profit of a proper birthday;

"And, considering that I, the said Robert Louis Stevenson, have attained such an age that I have now no further use for a birthday;

"And in consideration that I have met H. C. Ide, the father of the said Annie H. Ide, and found him about as hite a land commissioner as I require;

"Have transferred to the said Annie Ide all and whole my rights and privileges in the thirteenth day of November, formerly my birthday, now, hereby and henceforth the birthday of the said Annie H. Ide, to have, hold, exercise and enjoy the same in the customary manner by the sporting of fineiment, eating of rich meats, and receipt of gifts, compliments and copies of verse, according to the manner of our ancestors.

"And I direct the said Annie H. Ide to add to the said name of Annie H. Ide, the name Louisa—at least in private—and I charge her to use my said birthday with moderation and humanity, the said birthday not being so young as it once was, and having carried me in a very satisfactory manner since I can remember:

"And in case the said Annie H. Ide shall neglect or contravene either of the above conditions, I hereby revoke the donation and transfer my rights in the said birthday to the President of the United States of America for the time being;

"In witness whereof I have hereto set my hand and seal this nineteenth day of June, in the year of grace eighteen hundred and ninety-one.

"ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

"Witnesses: Lloyd Osborne, Harold Watts."

Miss Ide accepted the birthday gift and thereafter became Annie H. Louisa Ide. She always treated the gift properly.

The new Episcopal Cathedral that is being planned for the summit of the California street hill will be a magnificent edifice. The site is donated by the Crocker estate and is bounded by Taylor, Jones, California and Sacramento streets.

The San Francisco Bar Association has received $15,000 fire loss from the Phoenix Insurance Company of London. The money will be used to replace the Association's law library. It is also in receipt of 1400 law volumes from the New York Bar Association.

This was the effect of the San Francisco calamity upon the London stock market: "The common stocks of the eighteen American railways dealt in in London showed an aggregate depreciation of nearly $75,000,000 in two days. Now of these only two companies can possibly have suffered direct loss from the earthquake and the fire, the Atchison and the Southern Pacific. Nevertheless, Union Pacific shares fell from 163 to 155½ and Atchison from 97 to 92. The rally from the bottom was as rapid as the fall had been. It is now seen that the rebuilding of San Francisco will add enormously to the revenue of the western railroads."

OLD FAVORITES.

When the Cows Come Home.

Recently the Bohemian Club held a reunion at its new quarters in San Francisco, the first since the fire. Naturally the occasion was a unique one. Many friends met for the first time in three months who previously had met daily for years. The occasion was rendered additionally interesting by the presence of "Uncle George" Bromley, the octogenarian Bohemian. "Uncle George" had intended starting East on the morning of the earthquake, but was detained by the earthquake. Despite his great age he retains his powers of amusing and interesting. The club delights to hear him recite, and this is one of his favorite recitations:

With kingle, klang, kingle,
Way down the dusty dingle,
The cows are coming home;
Now sweet and clear, and faint and low
The airy tinklings come and go.
Like chimings from some far-off tower,
Or patterings of an April shower
That makes the daisies grow—
Ko-king, ke-clang, kokinglelelele,
Way down the darkening dingle
The cows come slowly home.

Soft sounds that sweetly mingle,
With jingle, jangle, jingle,
The cows are coming home;
Malime, and Pearl, and Florimel,
De Kamp, Redrose, and Gretchen Schell,
Queen Bess, and Sylph, and Spangled Sue—
Across the field I hear loo-oo,
And clang her silver bell,
Go-ling, go-lang, golvinglelelele,
With faint far sounds that mingle,
The cows come slowly home;
And mother-songs of long-gone years,
And baby joys, and childish tears,
And youthful hopes, and youthful fears,
When the cows come home.

With ringle, rangle, ringle,
By twos and threes and single,
The cows are coming home.
Through the violet air we see the town,
And the summer sun a-slipping down;
The maple in the hazel glade
Throws down the path a longer shade,
And the hills are growing brown.

To-ring, to-rang, toringleringle,
By threes and fours and single,
The cows come slowly home.

The same sweet sound of wordless psalm,
The same sweet June-day rest and calm,
The same sweet scent of bud and balm,
When the cows come home.

With a tinkle, tankle, tinkle,
Through fern and periwinkle,
The cows are coming home;
A-loitering in the checkered stream,
Where the sun-rays glance and gleam,
Starline, Peachbloom and Phoebe Phyllis
Stand knee-deep in the creamy lilies,
In a drowsy dream.

To-link, to-lank, tolinklelelele,
O'er banks with buttercups a-twin-kle,

The cows come slowly home;
And up through memory's deep ravine
Come the brook's old song and its old-time sheen,
And the crescent of the silver queen.

With a kinkle, klang, kingle,
With a loo-oo, and moo-oo, and jingle,

The cows are coming home;
And over there on Merlin hill,
Hear the plaintive cry of the whip-poorwill;

The dewdrops lie on the tangled vines,
And over the poplars Venus shines;
And over the silent mill,

Ko-ling, ko-lang, kolvinglelelele,
With a ting-a-ling and jingle,
The cows come slowly home.

Let down the bars; let in the train
Of long-gone songs, and flowers, and rain;

For dear old times come back again
When the cows come home.

The Masonic Hall Association have been offered $750,000 for the Masonic Temple site, on the northwest corner of Post and Montgomery streets. The site is 75x160, and is one of the choicest business corners in San Francisco. The price obtained for the lot will establish the value of real estate in that section of the city. It is said it is wanted for the Wells-Fargo Nevada National Bank.

The Salt Lake Tribune, discussing the killing of Stanford White by Harry K. Thaw, says: "We have a few words by way of objection to a bumptious remark made by an assistant district attorney in New York City: 'It was simply a question whether New York has gone down to the level of a mining camp, or whether a man has got a chance for his life.' Now that is precisely the difference between New York in general and this particular New York case in especial, and the ethics of a mining camp. In a mining camp a man gets a chance for his life. In New York he does not. In this case Stanford White had no chance whatever for his life, nor does the New York tough or murderer in any case intend to give his victim even the shadow of a chance to fight back. He strikes in the dark; he strikes without warning; and he aims to strike to disable and kill. The developments in the circle which White and Thaw seem to have frequented, show a low level of degradation, vice and loathsome villainy which could not possibly find a parallel in any mining camp in the world."

Andrew Carnegie enjoys telling how, until comparatively recent date, the old time Scotch prejudices were retained by the hard-headed professors of the university in Aberdeen.

There was a certain Professor Cameron, who had a weakness for the refinements and minor graces of life; so, just after "at home" cards became fashionable, one of the driest specimens of the old professional regime was the recipient of a missive from Cameron which read as follows:

"Professor and Mrs. Cameron present their compliments to Professor Pirie, and hope that he is well. Professor and Mrs. Cameron will be at home on Thursday evening, the 12th instant, at 7:30 o'clock."

The crusty old chap to whom this note was addressed replied in this wise:

"Professor Pirie returns the compliments of Professor and Mrs. Cameron, and begs to inform them that he is very well. Professor Pirie is glad to learn that Professor and Mrs. Cameron will be at home on Thursday evening, the 12th instant, at 7:30 o'clock. Professor Pirie will also be at home."

Bertha Krupp's fiance, Herr Dr. von Bohlen und Halbach, the secretary of the Prussian Legation at the Vatican, has already practically given up diplomacy and is hard at work at Essen getting familiar with the ramifications of his future wife's enormous business. The late Herr Krupp provided in his will that Bertha's husband should become leading director of the works, and Bohlen is devoting all the powers of his brilliant mind and untiring energies to fit himself for that position. He works ten hours a day, and it is expected that he will soon be master of all the details. It is said he cherishes the plan of forming a German steel trust. The salary of the new director after his marriage will be $200,000. Every member of the Krupp family, including the two sisters, has been made to learn a trade. Bertha is an accomplished dressmaker, and instead of buying her wedding trousseau she has made most of it herself. The 120,000 employees of the gun factory have raised a subscription sufficient to buy magnificent wedding gifts for the two sisters. Barbara's betrothal followed quick after Bertha's engagement.

The Emperor of Germany's intimate knowledge of American affairs is often a matter of surprise to Americans who meet him. Miss Frances Griscom, daughter of Clement A. Griscom, the American railroad and Standard Oil magnate, was one of the German Emperor's guests at dinner on board the royal yacht "Hohenzollern" when the Emperor approached her and said:

"Miss Griscom, I am very sorry that you were not present at our yacht races the other day to see my yacht win."

"I should have been glad, your Majesty, to be present," replied Miss Griscom; "but the water was a little too rough for me."

"Ah," replied the Emperor, "not a good sailor, then. Well, Miss Griscom, the next time my yacht races and the water is rough I shall insist upon your presence, and we will pour oil on the water. And, believe me," ended the Emperor with a smile, "the oil will be effective, for I shall see to it that it is Standard Oil!"

The question "Shall Women Smoke?" is being vigorously discussed in the London press. This is the way it looks to Punch:

Some faddist in the press first raised the question,

When anxious of a grievance to be rid—

Hinting disease or death or indigestion
Probable, if they did.

"Indignant Dame" replied a morning later,

Giving the lie—or several—direct;
Describing him a low prevaricator—
Or words to that effect.

The fat was in the fire. A smart "Young Mother" urged it was chic, and womanly as well;

One "Damsel" found it soothing, while another

Simply abhorred the smell.

"Father of One"—outside the infant's hearing—

Vowed that no girl of his "such things" should do;

"Father of Nine" refrained from interfering—

Thinking it wiser to.

A "Spinster" said the weed was all she trusted

To take from single cussedness the sting;

A lady, who inscribed herself "Dis-gusted,"

Loathed the unseemly thing.

An "Indian Colonel" found the practice "frighty,"

And asked, if women thronged the "Smokers," too,

Where—in this crimson territory—might he

The scheming sex eschew?

"Enthusiastic" called it bliss-bestowing,

Which "Youthful Cynic" stigmatized as rot;

And "Tweeny Girl" was diffident, unknowing

Whether to whiff or not.

Such are the strange, reciprocative scorings,

Such are the quaint, antagonistic views,

That filled the papers during several mornings,

Taking the place of news.

Whether the thing is really wrong or rightful,

We know not yet; but this is sure the while—

Either it is entrancingly delightful.

Or else supremely vile.

The $25,000 traveling allowance which was placed at the President's disposal by Congress, is, as the Boston Transcript points out, the fifth appropriation made for the President's benefit. Two of these other allowances are larger than the $50,000 of official "salary." The appropriation for care of the White House, including the coal bill and the maintenance of its greenhouses, is $60,000 a year. The salaries of employees, only a few of whom, however, are personal attendants, aggregate another $60,000. Then come $20,000 for lighting—so construed as to include even matches—and $20,000 more for contingent expenses. This latter applies to the "official" stable, though the President has to maintain his own horses and hire all his stable employees except the driver. So the gross amount allowed by Congress for what may be called the Presidential office will henceforth be $235,000 a year.

Some of the newspapers of the Mexican Capital have taken up an agitation for a reform in the business hours. Heretofore it has been the custom to close all shops and offices absolutely between the hours of 1 and 2:30 or 3 o'clock in the afternoon. Some of the foreign stores have attempted to get away from this system, but the small amount of trade gained by thus doing away with the ancient "siesta" hour (now largely a tradition in the capital) was not enough to pay for the trouble. The noon rest hour is a reasonable one in the tropics, where it is always a period of dullness and unusual heat, but there is also the other side, in that the long hour suggests a heavy noon meal which in the tropics, more than anywhere else, is unreasonable. But the principal opposition to the noon rest hour is the consequent lengthening of the working hours into the evening, so that stores and offices never close before 7 o'clock, and often not before 8. This throws the evening's recreation into the night, so that no theatre can begin a performance before 8:45 at the very earliest, and the time of recreation is lengthened into an "all-night seance."

The John Lane Company is about to issue a biography of President Diaz of Mexico, by Mrs. Alec Tweedle. The biographer gives extracts from the President's private diary and letters, and other material, including 100 or more illustrations.

STAGE GOSSIP.

Joe Weber has made arrangements for the production in the Studebaker, Chicago, Monday, July 30, of a three-act farce by Richard Watson Tully of San Francisco, called "A Strenuous Life."

It is reported that Marie Corelli, the novelist, intends to come over from England early in the fall to take personal charge of the rehearsals of the dramatic version of her story, "Barabas," which Tyrone Power is to bring out next October.

Representative Kahn of California has written a book of a comic opera dealing in the spirit of satire with certain social conditions in America, at least, so report sayeth. The music is being prepared by Julian Edwards, and it is probable that the Shuherts will produce the opera in the autumn. Heinrich Conried has decided on a policy with regard to his choristers. He will not engage any of them as long as he or she is a member of the labor union.

Jan Kubelik will open the tour in 1907 on Jan. 1 in Honolulu. His first concert in the United States will be in Seattle, Jan. 21.

Miss Florence Roberts will be seen "Giaconda" next season in the East. Miss Roberts gave the first English production of the D'Annunzio play in San Francisco in 1904.

E. H. Sothern, and presumably Julia Arlowe, in "John the Baptist" is an announcement held by the Shuherts for a later date. Little is known of the play, its author or the general scheme of production, but that Mr. Sothern to have a biblical play of his own has been told to his intimate friends.

Olga Nethersole will appear in a dramatization of Gertrude Atherton's "Daughter of the Vine," next season.

Miss Donald, the prima donna of the Covent Garden opera season and chief attraction since the retirement of Melba, has caused a sensation by announcing that she is betrothed to the actor, Sevilhac. Donald is a Canadian of Jewish descent and it was Sevilhac who discovered her and brought her out. The romance is therefore entirely logical.

A unique theater party at the home of Bernard Shaw in London a fortnight ago had Robert Loraine for its only player and the redoubtable Irish dramatist himself for its sole auditor. Shaw wanted to know something of the manner of the American performance of "Man and Superman," and Loraine humored him by giving a one-man performance of the whole comedy. The audience was delighted with the performance and all the critics present praised highly the work of every member of the cast.

Francis Wilson has written the book of a comic opera which will be produced by Klaw & Erlanger.

Arnold Daly and his manager, Sam Gumpertz, were acquitted in the New York Court of Special Sessions of the charge of violating Section 385 of the Penal Code in producing George Bernard Shaw's play, "Mrs. Warren's Profession," at the Garrick Theatre, October 30 last.

Clay Clement is out with his announcement of a new play. It is to be the crystallization of long-studied ideas on Sam Houston of Texas. It is to be the name of the play, Sam Houston.

Play-writers, play-goers and players are sending congratulations to William Winter, dean of dramatic critics, poet, actor and biographer, who recently celebrated the 70th anniversary of his birth. At first-night gatherings in Broadway there is no more conspicuous figure than William Winter, with white tousled hair, upturned coat-collar and muffled throat. Old and feeble as he has grown, every premiere of importance is attended with conscientious regularity. In all kinds of weather he makes the journey from his Staten Island home to the theatrical center, which has moved from lower Broadway to Fourteenth street, and then on to Times Square, since he assumed the post of dramatic critic forty-one years ago. Moreover, he considers it not too great a task to witness scenes from each of a half-dozen new plays in a single night, and his wanderings from playhouse to playhouse are quite as much a feature of important theatrical nights as the curtain calls and the authors' speeches.

Joseph Jefferson, in remembrance of the many fishing trips he enjoyed with Grover Cleveland, remembered the former President of the United States in his will, dated October 27, 1899, and filed recently in the Recorder's office, New York. In a codicil dated five years later than the will, Mr. Jefferson wrote: "To my friend, the Hon. Grover Cleveland, I bequeath my best Kentucky reel." This reel is said by those who knew Joseph Jefferson in life to have been one of the actor's most treasured possessions.

Shakespeare in Opera.

The latest things in operas in London town these days are playful little parodies on Mr. Shakespeare's plays. They put on "Hamlet" with a ghost that does a song and dance and springs a mouldy gag or two while all the chorus chants, and Hamlet, on beholding him, lifts up a lively clog. And says: "Is that you, father, dear, or just a London fog?"

When old King Lear goes maundering across the canvas sea His graceless daughter winks and says: "Now, don't you Lear at me!"

And Kent exclaims when through the storm he hears his monarch shout: "It's pretty windy, ain't it, King, to take those whiskers out?" And when his subjects hail the King the old man says, complaining: "Away with you! How dare you, knave, to hail when I am reigning?"

When dark Othello from the wars comes aoble shuffling back Iago says: "I'm scared of him because he looks so black." And Desdemona's stifled while that villain calmly smokes, Remarking philosophically the while: "I hope she chokes!" And when Othello stabs himself Iago, with a roar, Shouts out: "There's always room where you are bound for just one Moor!"

When Caesar gets the gleaming knives he's circled by a bunch Of show girls, while lean Cassius mourns: "'Twas too much Roman punch!" Macbeth beholds the aged crones dance round their bubbling pitch And asks them with a grin of glee: "Now tell me which is witch?" They're turning crowds away, they say, and down by Avon's wave, It's said, the bard is turning, too—he's turning in his grave.

—Montreal Star.

The Marco twins will be seen for the first time in several seasons at the Orpheum, July 29. These individuals, one over six feet in height, and the other under four, give a performance decidedly out of the ordinary. The famous Basque Quartet, who were at the Orpheum some three years ago, are now on their second visit to America and will undoubtedly receive a warm welcome. The three Hickman Brothers, singing, dancing and talking comedians, will make their first appearance in San Francisco. Ida O'Day, a dainty little mite of femininity and an accomplished singing comedienne and banjoist, is known all over England and America. Kelly and Kent, the comedy couple, will vary their amusing act, McWatters, Tyson and Company will introduce new specialties in their musical comedy, "Vaudeville," and Paul Spadoni, the light and heavy juggler, will continue to astonish his audiences. The Camille Comedy Trio, in their funny triple horizontal bar entertainment, and Orpheum motion pictures, showing the latest novelties, will complete an unusually strong program.

The last of the University concerts in the Greek Theater is set for half past three o'clock Thursday afternoon, August second. The honor of closing the series falls to the Minetti String Quartet, which is composed of Giulio Minetti, first violin; Hans Koenig, second violin; Andre Verdier, viola, and Arthur Weiss, violoncello.

The program will be as follows: Quartet in F major (op. 18, No. 1) in the following movements: Allegro con brio; Adagio affettuoso ed appassionato; Scherzo—Allegro molto, and Allegro. Next will be "Lento" (from American Quartet in F, op. 96), Dvorak, and "Canzonetta" (from Quartet in op. 12) Mendelssohn. The concert will close with the Quartet in E minor, known as "Aus meinen Leben," by Smetana, with movements as follows: Allegro vivo appassionato, Allegro moderato alla Polka, Largo sostenuto, Vivace.

LITERARY NOTES.

Old California.

The interest that Californians feel in novels of ante-Gringo days will serve to draw attention to Marah Ellis Ryan's novel, "For the Soul of Rafael, a Romance of Old California." The author has striven earnestly to endue her story with the drowsy, sun-warmed atmosphere of old Mission days, and has measurably succeeded. True, the effort is apparent; true, too, that her dull, amiable Mexican women prattling of their lovers and their masses are not provocative of interest. Their identities are far from being distinct, and the indolent reader will resent the effort he must make in order to keep track of the Marias, the Anas, and the Teresas. But as he reads he feels himself on the dusty, sun-scorched plains of California, and his ideas of the life that is depicted are brightened up and vivified. There are few American writers, however, who can lend it charm; perhaps from a temperamental lack of sympathy with the people that followed it. There are scenes and stories illustrative of the Latin's love, hate and revenge in the book, written with excellent taste and with no undue straining for effect. But, like the photographic illustrations, they require some greater touch of idealization to lift them further away from the commonplace. The book is effectively bound and contains full-page illustrations and marginal decorations.

Published by A. C. McClurg & Co.; $1.50.

Town Girls in the Country.

The truly womanly woman always possesses the home-making instinct. In spite of their social follies, this trait is thoroughly developed in the two sisters in Mary Stuart Boyd's "The Misses Make-Believe," and, when not perverted by social ambitions, their genius for making much out of very little is so enviable as to make them in the end an admirable pair.

The author of the book will probably never leave the ranks of mediocrity, but many women will read it with pleasure, because she lingers so fondly over the engrossing household trifles that to the feminine mind make up the sum of human things. Withal, this story of the gradual transformation of two foolish town-bred young ladies into rosy-cheeked country girls healthfully interested in gardening and poultry raising, is told agreeably and plausibly, and their social experiences in rural Devon are not lacking in humor.

Published by Henry Holt & Co.; $1.50.

A Flimsy Novel.

Apparently the twentieth-century need of writing a novel has been the sole motive that urged M. G. Easton to the perpetration of "The House on the Bridge," a long, rambling, disconnected, episodic tale with no plot in particular, and an infinite quantity of purely extraneous matter to pad out the book to the usual size.

M. G. Easton—who fails to hide her sex under noncommittal initials—puts in so many admiring details about the unremarkable childhood of her unremarkable heroine as to almost amount to pomposity. M. G. Easton's literary measure can be gauged from the fact that she is capable of using a parenthesized exclamation point. A background of mystery, dipsomania, and lunacy fail to lend weight or the sombre interest aimed at to this exceedingly flimsy novel.

Filibusters and Buccaneers.

"The Glory Seekers" is a gossip record of the lawless dreams and enterprises of the buccaneers of early days, when the United States, on their western and southern boundaries, were surrounded by limitless areas of land that excited the cupidity of men who would be kings. For it was sovereignty as well as wealth that these freebooters yearned for. The author, William Horace Brown, has collected his material from many sources; old histories of wild happenings in the territory out of which was built the Southern and Western States. Aaron Burr, the preux chevalier among these would-be founders of empire, comes first, and the book includes lengthy reviews of the careers of James Wilkinson, who held unlawful commerce with the Spanish government; Philip Nolan, who dreamed of making a principality of Texas; Augustus Magee, whose rash ambition led him to head a military invasion of the same territory; Colonel Perry, leader of a military enterprise directed against Spanish possessions, and a tragic story of the Florida Maroons or runaway slaves who were the prey of brutal filibusters.

While "The Glory Seekers" rises to no great dignity as a historical chronicle, it reopens old vistas in the recorded beginnings of our prosperity, and throws sidelights on comparatively unknown bits of the national history.

Hugo's "Hernani."

The latest volume in the American Book Company's admirable school edition of standard works is Victor Hugo's "Hernani." This dramatic masterpiece is presented with ample aids for its reading in class. The editor, James D. Bruner, Ph.D., contributes an introduction which treats fully of the theory of the romantic drama, its versification, language, plot, together with an account of the first performance of the play. The notes are numerous and copious, drawing many comparisons between passages of "Hernani" and those of other well-known plays.

Published by the American Book Company; 70 cents.

"Camp Kits and Camp Life."

The distribution of copies of "Camp Kits and Camp Life," by Charles Stepmann Hanks, a supply of provisions, and transportation to one of the mountain counties, would go far toward settling the relief committee's problems. Mr. Hanks's book is entertaining as general reading, but he has intended it as a practical guide to lovers of outdoor life. Many useful directions are given on how to make camp; the necessary outfits; the care of a rifle; receipts for camp cooking; treatment of injuries and sickness; and all the varied lore of the woods.

Published by Charles Scribner's Sons; $1.50 net.

"Sunset" Magazine.

The June-July Sunset is one of the finest numbers ever issued by this handsome magazine. Most of the articles are, of course, concerned with the story of the fire and earthquake. Joaquin Miller contributes a poem; Charles S. Aiken, the editor, writes of "San Francisco's Plight and Prospects;" Edwin Sorenson Jr., the well-known war correspondent, has eloquent praise for municipal and army leaders in "Handling a Crisis;" E. H. Harriman's striking article on "San Francisco's Experience," is reprinted from the May Sunset; Professor McAdie tells of "The Scientific Side of It;" and Charles Warren Stoddard contributes "Old Mission Idyls," the first of a series of six articles. The number is copiously and beautifully illustrated.

Personal and Miscellaneous.

"Edgar Allan Poe," declares George Moore, "is unread in America, whereas he is an integral part of the artistic life of Paris."

The publishers of the New York Herald are being prosecuted by the postal authorities for violation of the law forbidding the use of the mails for the dissemination of "obscene, lewd, lascivious and indecent matters in print." The matter mentioned in the complaint consists of eight so-called "Personals" which appeared in the Herald of Sunday, July 15th. The section under which the complaint was brought is the same under which Joseph Dunlop, the editor and proprietor of the Chicago Dispatch, was tried and sentenced in 1894 to serve two years in the penitentiary and pay a fine of $2000.

It is not generally known that Robert Browning was the author of a French grammar. It appears that even the late Dr. Garnett, whose knowledge of literature was encyclopedic, had not heard of this early venture of the poet's. His surprise was therefore great when a reference to the work in question by Browning himself was pointed out to him. It occurs on page 203 of the first volume of Browning's Letters to his wife: "Thus, in more than one of the reviews and magazines that laughed my 'Paracelsus' to scorn ten years ago—in the same column often of these reviews—would follow a most laudatory notice of an elementary French book, on a new plan, which I 'did' for my old French master, and be published—that was really a useful work."

An old fashion in sensational fiction is recalled by a new edition of James De Mille's "Cord and Creese," a story better worth reading than most of the more recent examples of its class.

We wish Mr. Kipling would write out more fully his ideas and impressions about literature, says Harper's Weekly. He could make an essay which, while it might not say all there is to say on that subject, would be exceedingly good reading, and doubtless edifying. He has spoken before about the magic of words. In the story, called "Wireless," he says—as near as we remember it—that there are only five passages in all literature which are pure magic, and three of these he credits to Keats.

A movement is on foot to erect in Washington a statue to Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. While England has placed a bust of the great poet in Westminster Abbey, America has done very little to declare the affection with which so many Americans regard the "Poet of the American Fireside." The president of the Longfellow National Memorial Association is the Chief Justice of the United States, General Greeley is secretary and Brainard H. Warner, 916 F Street, N. W., Washington, is treasurer. Among the regents are the President, ex-President Cleveland, Mr. Carnegie, Monsignor Conaty, President Eliot, Cardinal Gibbons, Senator Lodge, Bishop Mackay-Smith, Herbert Welsh, Bishop Potter and Henry Watterson.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A London bus driver had shouted "Igh Oborn!" till the passenger on the seat behind him could no longer resist the temptation to make a joke.

"Excuse me," said the passenger, "but haven't you dropped something?" "I see wot you're driving at," returned the driver, keenly, "hut never mind, I shall pick it up when we get to Hoxford street."

Everybody calls Alfred J. Stofer, a well-known Washington character, "Major" Stofer.

"Where did you get your title, Stofer?" Representative Littlefield of Maine once asked him.

"Earned it, suh," Stofer replied, "killin' Yankees in the war."

"But, Stofer, you were not old enough to be a soldier."

"Who said I was a soldier, suh; who said I was a soldier? I was livin' in my native village of Culpepper, Virginia, suh, in those tryin' times, and it was there I won glory for the sainted Confederate cause and myself killin' Yankees."

"But how did you kill them?"

"Killed them by indigestion, suh, by indigestion. I sold em apple pies and killed 'em by scores."

Last summer a well-known professor went with his family to a small seaside resort on the east coast of England and boarded with a farmer who was in the habit of taking paying guests. This year he wrote to the farmer and in his letter said: "There are several little matters that I desire changed should I decide to pass my holidays at your house. We don't like the maid Mary; moreover, we do not think a sty so near the house is sanitary." The farmer replied: "Mary is went, and we 'avent 'ad no hogs since you went away last August."

An ambulance surgeon had a curious experience the other night.

He was summoned to a police station to examine an unconscious prisoner. The prisoner, very muddy and disheveled, lay on the floor of the cell rooms. The physician bent over and examined him, and then, rising, said in a loud stern voice:

"This man's condition is not due to drink. He has been drugged."

A policeman turned pale and said in a timid, hesitating voice:

"I'm afraid yer right, sir. I drugged him all the way from Carney's saloon, a matter of a hundred yards or more."

A London lady who has been holiday-making wrote to a servant that she would be home next evening at 6:30 (D. V.), and asking that dinner be ready. Arriving home she found no dinner. The cook appeared with apologies. "Would you mind telling me, ma'am, what 'D. V.' means?" she said, "I couldn't make it out, but Sarah (the housemaid) said it must mean Due at Victoria." So we allowed you an hour to get home from the station."

A young clerk grown up in the employ of a prosperous German grocer was, by reason of his ability and knowledge of all the details, virtually entrusted with the management of the business, and, although given frequent advances of salary, began to feel that his services were absolutely indispensable, and not properly appreciated from a money point of view. He laid the matter before his employer, placing particular stress on what a difficult matter it would be to operate the business without him. This claim was admitted by the employer, who inquired further:

"But, Chon, vat if you should die?"

"Oh, then you would have to get along without me," remarked John.

After a few minutes' deep thought the employer looked up at John and said:

"Vell, Chon, chust gonsider yourself d it."

One day Carlyle suddenly stopped at a street crossing and, stooping, picked up something out of the mud, even at the risk of being knocked down and run over by passing vehicles. With his bare hands he gently rubbed the mud from it. He then took it to the pavement and laid it down on a clean spot on the curbstone. "That," said the old man in a tone of tenderness he rarely used, "is only a crust of bread. Yet I was taught by my mother never to waste anything; above all, bread; more precious than gold. I am sure that the little sparrows or a hungry dog will get nourishment from this bit of bread."

After which he went home and abused Mrs. C. savagely and swore at the slavey.

The mixed metaphor gives many unsuspecting members of Parliament a fall. Mr. Asquith not long ago amused the House with the phrase: "Our tongues are tied, our hands are fettered and we are really beating air to no purpose."

Mr. John Burns improved on this by declaring, in reference to the children's employment bill, "I will now repeat what I was about to say when the honorable member interrupted me." Then there was the wealthy manufacturer member who, dealing with the legal position of trade unions, asseverated that "the interests of the employers and employed are the same nine times out of ten—nay, I will go further, and say ninety-nine times out of ten."

A member of the present Opposition, observing signs of dissent from a Liberal, exclaimed: "Ah, the honorable member opposite may shake his head, but he cannot shake mine." "Sir," said Mr. Walter Long on education matters, "we are told that by this legislation the heart of the country will be shaken to its foundations."

It was commencement day at M-Seminary. The mother of the prettiest girl graduate was there—overflowing with pride at her daughter's success. "I'll tell you these girls have to walk chalk," said the complacent mother. "They can't go anywhere without a 'shampooer.'" A little later, turning to her companion, the good lady said: "Can you tell me what State 'Table-d'hote' is in? My oldest daughter is in the South somewhere, for her health. She wrote me that she was better, and was going to Table-d'hote for the first time. Now I've looked all over the map of the United States and I can't find that name anywhere."

Lady of the Golden Gate.

"Serene, indifferent to fate," she stands—

Bare-breasted, girt with sand, and sun-caressed;
With power undiminished, strength unguessed

Till now, though gaping pits and rav'ning brands

Have scorched her tunic and have scarred her hands—

As who should say: "My race is not yet run;
My triumph comes when my new days are won.

Bring bay and laurel! These are my demands."

So speaks our lady of the Golden Gate,
And we who hear the marvel of her voice

Smile back, and toss her laurel, rose, and bay;

Because serene indifference to fate
Breeds strength to conquer, power to gain a choice

That thrusts our night of sorrow into day. —New York Sun.

The preliminary sketch of the new Palace Hotel, which was made by a New York firm of architects, has been approved by the Sharon estate people. The draughtsmen have been instructed to have their plans finished in six months. These plans include a duplicate of the court of the old Palace Hotel. The hotel will occupy practically the same ground as it did before the fire and will be ten stories in height. It will require four or five months to clear away the debris. "Roughly speaking, the new Palace Hotel will contain some 600 or 700 rooms," says Colonel Kirkpatrick. "The ladies' cafe will be located on the Jessie Street side of the building and be connected with the palm garden by a succession of arches, which will give a broad vista of 130 or 140 feet, looking across the two apartments. In the other direction, the palm garden will have a length of 180 feet. The men's grill will have a different location, with an entrance from Annie Street. The building will be a modern steel-frame structure and as fireproof and earthquake-proof as human ingenuity can provide."

The palatial home of Claus Spreckels on Van Ness avenue will not be repaired for residence purposes. This house is said to have cost, completed and fitted, $700,000. The house itself was badly damaged, and its entire contents, consisting of magnificent and costly rugs, furniture, plate, china and paintings, were destroyed by the fire. Mr. Spreckels has renovated the old home place out on Howard street.

Notes and Gossip.

The engagement of Mrs. Rebecca McMullin Belvin, daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. John McMullin, to Mr. Francis J. Heney, is announced. Their marriage will take place in September.

The engagement is announced of Miss Lucy Burroughs Platt, sister of Mrs. Charles Platt, to Mr. Frank Victor Ferrers Baker.

The wedding of Miss Harriette de Witt Allen, daughter of Mrs. Henry F. Allen, to the Rev. Dr. Edward A. Dodd of Boston, took place on Wednesday afternoon at the Episcopal chapel at Ross Valley. The ceremony was performed by Bishop Nichols. There were no attendants of either bride or groom and only relatives were present at the marriage. Dr. and Mrs. Dodd will leave shortly for Boston, where Dr. Dodd is assistant rector of the Church of the Immanuel.

The wedding of Miss Rosebud Heydenfeldt, daughter of the late Judge Solomon Heydenfeldt, to Lieutenant Horace Nathaniel Munro, First Cavalry, U. S. A., took place on Thursday, July 19th, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Platt, at 2000 Vallejo Street. The ceremony was performed at high noon by the Rev. Burr Miller Weeden, of St. Luke's Church. The bride was attended by her sister, Miss Elfin Heydenfeldt, and Miss Lucy Burroughs Platt. Lieutenant Richmond, First Cavalry, U. S. A., was the best man. After a brief honeymoon spent in Southern California, Lieutenant and Mrs. Munro will go to Fort Clark, Texas, where he is stationed.

It is announced that the wedding of Miss Ethel Hager and Mr. Lansing O. Kellogg will be celebrated in September, although the exact date has not been arranged.

It is announced that the wedding of Miss Florence Cole, daughter of Mrs. Edward Pleasant Cole, to Mr. Charles R. McCormick, will take place on Saturday, July 28th, at the home of the bride on Pierce Street. Miss Cole will have as her attendants Miss Gertrude Jolliffe and Miss Jane Wilshire.

Captain Sydney A. Cloman, General Staff, U. S. A., was the guest of honor at a dinner given at the Bohemian Club on Friday evening of last week by Mr. J. C. Wilson. In letters to a personal friend in this city Admiral and Mrs. George Dewey have announced their intention of passing the coming winter in Southern California and a residence has been selected for them in Pasadena. Mrs. Dewey's rather delicate health makes this residence in an equable climate desirable.

The block on Van Ness avenue formerly the site of St. Ignatius, has been leased for five years to an Eastern house at a total rental of $291,000. A large department store is to be erected on the site at a cost of about $75,000 or more.

Springfield Fire and Marine Insurance Company of Hartford, Conn.

Manager George D. Dornin advises that the City Department of the Springfield is now open in the Koh Building. The General Department will occupy its old quarters on the California-street side, third floor, as soon as rooms are restored, and furniture, now ordered, made ready. Temporary Department headquarters will remain for the present at 1112 Broadway, Oakland.

The Springfield is among the companies which are adjusting and paying policy holders' claims in the San Francisco disaster involving $1,600,000. The payment of this sum will leave the company's capital $2,000,000, its reserve for reinsurance (or unearned) premiums $3,132,531.32, as appears by its financial statement of December 31, 1905, intact, and a net surplus of over $400,000. The assets of the Springfield at the close of 1905 were $7,156,531.72.

Del Monte Offers

During the reconstruction of San Francisco, Hotel del Monte offers a welcome shelter to those desiring a homelike place for rest and recreation. The park-like grounds, the golf links, the flowers, the many walks and drives were never more attractive than at the present. The entire hotel has recently been renovated and improved, with steam heat, electric lights, hot and cold water, telephones in every room. Why not make this attractive resort near San Francisco your permanent home? Special terms for families. Address Geo. P. Snell, Manager, Del Monte, California.

Army and Navy.

Admiral S. W. Very, U. S. N., sailed for the Mongolia on Friday of last week for Honolulu, where he will assume command of the Naval Station, in relief of Admiral H. W. Lyon, U. S. N., recently ordered to the command of the Mare Island Navy Yard. Admiral Very was promoted to his present rank on Sunday, July 22d, while at sea, that being the date of the retirement of Rear-Admiral R. B. Endford, U. S. N.

General Adolphus W. Greely, U. S. A., commanding the Pacific division, accompanied by his acting-aide, Captain Frank L. Winne, U. S. A., left on Sunday of last week for the Department of the Columbia on a tour of inspection. They expect to be absent for about ten days.

Lieutenant General Frederick Funston, U. S. A., commanding officer of the Department of California, left on Wednesday for American Lake, Washington, where he goes to command the army maneuvers to take place there, accompanied by those members of his staff who are not already in the Department of the Columbia. The officers appointed on his staff for this mission are: Captain William G. Hanson, General Staff, U. S. A., Chief of Staff; Lieutenant Edwin C. Long, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Military Secretary; Colonel John L. Clem, Assistant Quartermaster General, U. S. A., Chief Quartermaster; Captain John J. Riley, Fourteenth Infantry, U. S. A., Assistant to Chief Quartermaster; Lieutenant Colonel George B. Davis, Deputy Commissary General, U. S. A., Chief Commissary; Captain William Abbott, Commissary, U. S. A., Assistant to Chief Commissary; Lieutenant Colonel William H. Corbuser, Deputy Surgeon General, U. S. A., Chief Surgeon; Captain Pierre C. Stevens, Paymaster, U. S. A., Chief Paymaster; Captain Edward P. Orton, Paymaster, U. S. A., Assistant to Chief Paymaster; Captain Meriwether L. Walker, Corps of Engineers, U. S. A., Chief Engineer Officer; Captain Kenneth Thomson, Ordnance Department, U. S. A., Chief Ordnance Officer; Captain Edward D. Wildman, Signal Corps, U. S. A., Chief Signal Officer.

Commander C. A. Gove, U. S. N., and Mrs. Gove have arrived in the city from Washington, D. C., and are guests at the Hotel Dorchester. Commander Gove has been detached from the Bureau of Equipment in Washington and ordered here to command the cruiser Milwaukee when she is commissioned.

Lieutenant - Commander G. W. Brown, U. S. N., has been ordered detached from the Pensacola at the Naval Training Station, Yerba Buena Island, San Francisco, and ordered to Pennsylvania as executive officer, relieving Commander C. C. Marsh, U. S. N. The Pennsylvania is at present in the New York Navy Yard.

Lieutenant Enoch Crowder, U. S. A., was ordered here as Chief of Staff, relieving General Stephen W. Jocelyn, U. S. A., relieved, is now in Washington, D. C., as Acting Judge Advocate General, but is expected to arrive here shortly during September.

During the absence of Colonel John A. Clem, U. S. A., Chief Quartermaster of the Department of California, at the army maneuvers at American Lake, Captain William Wrenn, U. S. A., will be Acting Chief Quartermaster.

Major Gaston, U. S. A., on duty here with the Relief Committee, and Mrs. Gaston, are living at El Drisco, apartment house on Pacific avenue.

Captain Sydney A. Cloman, General Staff, U. S. A., who arrived a fortnight since from Washington, D. C., and who has been the guest of Captain and Mrs. William G. Haan, at Fort Mason, left on Wednesday for Vancouver Barracks. He has been detailed as special observer of the maneuvers at American Lake and will march there from Vancouver Barracks with the Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A.

During the absence of Captain Leonard D. Wildman, Signal Corps, U. S. A., Chief Signal officer of the Department of California, Captain Hanson, Black Signal Corps, U. S. A., will, in addition to his other duties, take charge of the office of the Chief Signal officer at Department headquarters.

Lieutenant Thomas N. Knox, First Cavalry, U. S. A., has been assigned to duty as Acting Quartermaster and Acting Commissary on the transport Ingalls, during the voyage from Manila, September 1st, to New York.

Lieutenant Charles S. Tarlton, First Infantry, U. S. A., now at the Army General Hospital at the Presidio of San Francisco, having been reported fit for duty, has been ordered to report to the commanding officer of the Presidio for temporary duty, until the sailing of the next transport, when he will proceed to join his regiment in Manila.

The Naval Board of Inspection and Survey, consisting of Captain H. Austerhaus, U. S. N., senior member, Captain John C. Fremont, U. S. N., Commander I. S. K. Reeves, U. S. N., and Commander E. W. Eberle, U. S. N., arrived last week from Washington, D. C., having stopped en route at Seattle to inspect the new battleship Nebraska which vessel, it is understood, exceeded her speed requirement of 19 knots, making a record on her trial of 19.6 knots. The board left here at the end of last week for Santa Barbara for the purpose of conducting the speed trial of the cruiser Milwaukee, which took place in the Santa Barbara channel on Wednesday.

The Army Small Arms' Competition of the Pacific division for this year will be held at the Presidio of Monterey from August 1st to 7th inclusive, the rifle competition being from August 1st to 4th, inclusive, with a preliminary practice preceding on July 30th and 31st, and the pistol competition August 6th and 7th. Lieutenant-Colonel Garrard, Fourteenth Cavalry, will be the officer in command.

The following officers are ordered to report to the commanding officer of the Presidio of Monterey, not later than July 28th for duty in connection with the competition as range officers: First Lieutenant James Hanson, Battalion Adjutant, Fourteenth Infantry; First Lieutenant Theodore Schnitz, Fourteenth Cavalry; First Lieutenant Raymond W. LaMotte, Fourteenth Infantry; Captain William H. H. Chapman, Twentieth Infantry, distinguished pistol shot; Second Lieutenant Arthur E. Ahrends, Twentieth Infantry; Second Lieutenant Charles B. Moore, Twenty-second Infantry.

It is said that the congratulations of his friends cost General Warfield his life. He intended taking an earlier boat, but so many friends stopped him to offer congratulations on his appointment as Police Commissioner of San Francisco that he missed the boat and had to take the later train, which led to his tragic death under the wheels of the engine.

The engagement of Miss Annie H. Ide and Representative Bourke Cockran is the fourth romance as the result of Secretary Taft's personally conducted marriage-junket party to the Philippines. The marriage of Representative Nicholas Longworth and Miss Alice Roosevelt is the most notable of Cupid Taft's achievements. The Cockran-Ide wedding will be celebrated at Washington early in October. William Bourke Cockran has been twice married. His first wife died in 1880, and his second wife in 1895. After the latter's death, Mr. Cockran was unconsoled, and, to divert his mind, began to take an active interest in politics, although, in 1884, at the request of John Kelly, he joined Tammany Hall, and in the national convention at Chicago made a memorable speech against Grover Cleveland. His reputation as an orator was firmly established by his speech against Cleveland in the national convention of 1892. Mr. Cockran has built up a law practice estimated to be worth at least $100,000 a year. He was elected to the Fiftieth Congress from the Twelfth Congressional District and served with distinction. He refused a renomination and declined a nomination to be Judge of the Court of Common Pleas at a salary of $15,000 a year. Mr. Cockran is now about fifty-two years old, a man of massive physique and in perfect health.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

"Mamma, what are twins?" asked little Bobby. "Oh, I know," chimed in Dorothy, with all the superiority of an elder sister. "Twins is two babies just the same age; three is triplets; four is quadruplets and five is centipedes."—Harper's Weekly.

A reporter of the Paris Matin tried to purchase a genuine Rockefeller interview with a check for $1,000. He failed. The proper way to make an American millionaire talk is not to offer him a thousand dollars, but to try to get a thousand dollars away from him.—Puck.

A statistician announces that "In 1904 the United States produced 99 per cent of the entire world's known production of natural gas." In that year, it will be remembered, we had both a long session of Congress and a Presidential campaign.—Washington Post.

Mr. City Boarder was being entertained by his rural sweetheart. "Do you play and sing 'When the Cows Are in the Corn,' Miss Milkyweigh?" "Lord bless you, no!" she ejaculated. "I got the dogs and chase 'em out!"—Harper's Weekly.

"I'll take that," said the man, indicating a silver-mounted handglass, "and I want you to engrave on it, 'From J. J. B. to Phyllis.'" "Very well," replied the salesman, "we'll put it on the back here—" "Oh, no; put it around the edge on the front. I want her to see it."—Philadelphia Ledger.

"Mamma," asked the little girl, "has Mr. Brown got heart disease?" "I don't know, my child. Why do you ask?" "Well, it says in my new book that faint heart never won fair lady, and when I saw Mrs. Brown I made up my mind that something must be wrong with his."—Toledo Blade.

"I understand," began Mrs. Gailey, sternly, "that you have been seen at the theater with my husband—" "Well, interrupted the pretty governess, defiantly, "what of that?" "Well, Miss Reeder, if you wish to remain in my employ you'll have to keep better company."—Philadelphia Press.

Lady Visitor—That new girl of yours seems very nice and quiet. Mistress of the House—Yes, she's very quiet. She doesn't even disturb the dust when she's cleaning the room.—Everybody's Journal.

"'Tis butt a man," remarked the belligerent goat, as he saw the solitary traveler draw near.—Baltimore American.

"Why did you have the sun-dial moved, Amy?" "I wanted it where the moonlight would shine on it, so we could tell the time of night."—Life.

Mistress (soliloquizing)—I'm afraid this hat's rather out of date. Maid—Oh, no, mum. It's quite fashionable. Cook has just bought one exactly like it!—Punch.

At the Garage. Boy—Mr. Smith is telephoning for his machine. Can you send it to him today? Head man—Don't see how we can. Why this machine is the only one around here fit to use!—Life.

Medical Student—What did you operate on that man for? Eminent Surgeon—Five hundred dollars. Medical Student—I mean, what did he have? Eminent Surgeon—Five hundred dollars.—Puck.

A little girl was out walking with her aunt one day. The aunt bowed to a man they were passing. "Who is he, Aunt Jennie?" asked the little girl. Mrs. Littlefield told her that he was Mr. Melrose, the village undertaker. "Oh, yes," replied the child quickly, "I remember him. He undertook my grandmother."—Harper's Bazar.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

"The Muck-Rakers."

"What are the bugles blowing for?" said Lawson-on-Parade. "To turn us out, to turn us out," D. Graham Phillips said. "What makes you look so white, so white?" said Lawson-on-Parade. "I'm dreading what I've got to hear," J. Lincoln Steffens said. They're exposin' the exposers; it would make your hair turn gray To reflect on what will come when they expose each expose, When they find a newer frenzy, or a treason every day— They're exposing the exposers in the mornin'.

"What makes Charles Russell breathe so 'ard?" said Lawson-on-Parade. It's bitter cold, it's bitter cold," U. Jungle Sinclair said. "What makes Miss Tarbell look so faint?" said Lawson-on-Parade. "A touch of sun, a touch of sun," S. Hopkins Adams said. They're exposin' the exposers, they are callin' of 'em down, They are huntin' of 'em hotly from New York to Packin'town; They will chuck 'em in a lake o' ink, an' let 'em swim or drown— They're exposin' the exposers in the mornin'.

"I started all this bloomin' row," said Lawson-on-Parade. "I think Miss Tarbell saw it first," Rex Beach rose up and said. "What's all that noise that shakes the ground?" said Lawson-on-Parade. "It's Teddy Roosevelt's muck-rake speech," a pale reformer said. They're exposin' the exposers, there is trouble in the air; There are Folks and Hadleys coming from concealment everywhere; And they'll all write stuff, and talk, too when they've got the time to spare; They're exposin' the exposers in the mornin'.

—W. D. Nesbit, in New York Times.

Our Daring President.

He has backed the bad bronco that bucks o'er the plain, He has galled the grim Gotham police; He has charged on the cock-ahoop cohorts of Spain Till he had them imploring for peace. He has given the Senate a sort of a nudge— And he also has bearded a federal judge.

He has sunk 'neath the seas in a submarine boat; He has tackled race suicide, too; He has tried for a grip on the octopus' throat; There is nothing the fellow won't do. It is all very well to say "Nonsense!" and "Fudge!" He has even talked back to a federal judge.

The Original Vienna Cafe Is Now Open to the Public.

In a new and central location at 1226 Post street, near the Emporium, is the cosy home of the Vienna Cafe and Bakery. The Dining Rooms have been fitted up most elaborately, making it one of the most attractive cafes in the city. The cuisine and service will receive the special attention of the proprietor, Mr. F. B. Galindo, who has catered to the San Francisco public for so many years past. A Grill, Restaurant and fine Bakery all in a handsome private residence is something entirely new and will no doubt recommend itself to ladies while out shopping. Special rooms for receptions and banquets are also one of its features. San Francisco's Original Vienna Cafe is opening up its new place in fine style where appetizing breakfasts, lunches and dinners are to be had at popular prices the same "as before the late unpleasantness."

Next Sunday Go to Byron Hot Springs.—You can leave Friday afternoon or Saturday morning, returning Sunday afternoon or Monday morning. Two days at the springs, and the entire expense of the trip is $7.50. This includes the railway fare, transportation from railway station to hotel and return, a delightful ride of two and a half miles, accommodations at the beautiful Byron Hot Springs Hotel, and use of the wonderful mineral baths, all for $7.50. Try it.

The Late Russell Sage.
When Russell Sage died last week the world lost a man who was worth eighty millions of dollars. He was born in 1816, lived to be ninety, and when he died the world lost a mean man. There are many men who get to be skinflints when they are sixty and get worse when they are eighty, but Russell Sage was a skinflint when he was a boy. When he was fifteen years old he used to sell whisky by the glass over a counter and when he was twenty he used to sell rum by the hog-head. He also was noted as a horse trader. Any human being who goes into both the liquor and the horse business before he is twenty-one is bound to be crooked and bound to get rich. Mr. Sage had acquired a fortune of $75,000 before he was twenty-five years of age. He added to it in the big railroad boom of the early 40's. He had much to do with buying up little railroads and selling them to big ones. But he never built a railroad and he never constructed anything. He was essentially a money lender. He did most of his money lending to bucket-shops and sharp brokers on Wall Street for usurious rates of interest. He has died leaving an enormous fortune. It is said that God testifies his opinion of money by the kind of people to whom he gives the most of it. He gave an awful lot of it to Russell Sage. This faintly foreshadows the way in which the dead usurer is regarded in the Celestial regions, but what is thought of him below nobody knows yet except Russell Sage.

British Companies Disclaim Liability.

During the more than three months which have elapsed since the great fire in San Francisco some of the most prominent British insurance companies have refused either to acknowledge or to disclaim liability. Their agents here have taken refuge behind the silence of the home offices. Among these silent companies have been the Commercial Union Assurance Company, the Palatine Fire Insurance Company, the Alliance Insurance Company, the Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society, the Commercial Union Fire Insurance Company of New York, and the Indemnity Fire Insurance Company of New York. The latter two are subsidiary companies of British corporations.

Three representatives of all these companies arrived in San Francisco a week or ten days ago, and after going over the ground they issued through their attorneys, Van Ness & Denman, a statement defining their position. It is not calculated to cheer up their policy-holders, whose claims on these companies amount to something like fifteen millions of dollars. A careful reading of this statement shows that these companies practically disclaim all liability.

The British companies say in substance that they are advised, both by their counsel in England and here, that they are "not liable for any losses occasioned by or for which the earthquake of April 18th was either directly or indirectly the cause." They also say that they are advised that the payment of such losses will make their directors pecuniarily answerable to their stockholders. They say they are advised that under the decisions of the American courts the losses for which claims are now made against these companies are not valid claims, being due to earthquake; that there was extended earthquake damage independent of the fire; that the fire was caused either directly or indirectly by the earthquake; that the earthquake cut off the water supply; that the destruction of the city resulted from the absence of water; that the repeated declarations of the daily papers confirm this; that all of these facts are easily susceptible of proof; "that if there had been no earthquake there would have been no conflagration; that if there had been no earthquake San Francisco would not have been destroyed." The companies' counsel say that the only answer they hear to these allegations is that San Francisco juries will find otherwise. The companies' counsel say, "This may be so, but the companies will continue to believe that what is generally understood to be true can be proved."

As to the course the companies intend to pursue, they say in substance that they will make good actual loss in cases where their legal liability can be proved. As to what cases these are, they say, "It is not possible at this time to specifically name the particular cases we have within this class." There are numerous cases, they say, in which buildings were "destroyed before the fire reached them," and here the companies will not pay. In cases where the fire was "a direct and immediate result of the earthquake" the companies will not pay. Where the fire can be traced to "an earlier fire which can be shown to have been caused directly by the earthquake" the companies will not pay. "The only possible question in any case," they say, "will be whether loss resulted directly or indirectly from earthquake." They add that in every case in which fire can be traced back to the earthquake the companies will not pay.

In cases where the primary fire was not caused by earthquake, but where the earthquake's destruction of the water supply deprived that district of water, the companies presumably will not pay, although their declaration in this regard is not explicit.

The companies admit that there was available water in one portion of the city, but where fires started there from causes other than the earthquake, the Fire Department was overworked by reason of the earthquake fires, they claim, hence the losses from these fires the companies will not pay.

The companies state that there are many disputed questions, such as the area of the territory of districts where there was available water, and in all such disputed cases the companies, if their terms are not accepted, "will not pay and the cases may go to suit."

The final paragraph states that the companies' representatives will meet claimants personally, but claimants acting through attorneys will not be met by them, but are referred to the companies' counsel.

Fourteen weeks ago in these columns we remarked that about thirty of the American companies were weak and might not pay; about half of these were insolvent and could not pay; but that, in our opinion, all of the British companies doing business in California were solvent, could pay but would not pay unless they were obliged to. A few of them have been paying claims "as adjusted," and others have been holding off waiting for the action of this group of great companies. The action just taken will inevitably have its effect upon the other British companies, and will make them less liberal toward policy-holders. It will also give heart of grace to the few American companies who have earthquake clauses, but who have been afraid to apply them. It will likewise tone up the sauerkraut companies, all of which have been desirous of enforcing the earthquake clause, but lacked the courage.

Altogether the action of these British companies is calculated to diminish the hopes of policy-holders for speedy payment of anything like the face value of their claims.

Labor Situation in San Francisco.

The labor situation in San Francisco at present has become more than serious. In addition to the continual strikes which are chronicled from day to day, it seems impossible to secure even common laborers in sufficient numbers to do the work which is absolutely necessary. Outside of the city there is great demand all over the coast for laborers. The Western Pacific could employ ten thousand more men and must have seven thousand; the Southern Pacific wants two thousand men; the United Railroads of San Francisco wants two thousand men; the electric lines building in various parts of the State want over two thousand men. All of these demands are entirely outside of the need for skilled workmen. Over twenty thousand houses must be built in San Francisco immediately, but the workmen necessary to construct them cannot be had. Fifteen thousand laborers could find work at once in clearing away the debris, excavating, and preparing the ground for skilled workmen to follow them. These laborers are not to be had. Something like five hundred millions of dollars must be spent in San Francisco in the next few years to put it even measurably in condition to be called a city again. At least forty thousand additional workmen, skilled and unskilled, are needed, but they cannot be had.

It is not a question of wages, for the highest wages ever known in the history of the world are now being paid in San Francisco. A minimum wage for laborers on railroad work and in warehouses is now $2.25 a day. Cement workers get $5.00, hod-carriers $4.00, cabinet-makers $3.50, millmen $3.50, plasterers $6.00, stonecutters $4.75, carpenters lathers $6.00, shinglers $4.00, painters $4.00, fresco painters $5.00, paper-hangers $4.00, plumbers $5.00, machinists $3.75, tanners $4.00, sheet metal workers $4.00, glaziers $4.00, stationary engineers $4.00. There is a very strong demand at high wages for teamsters and electricians.

It may be added that this union rate of wage is not a fair statement of what the men receive. Merchants or real estate owners are so anxious to make their stocks of goods or their lands productive of income that they are paying large premiums to workmen. In some cases skilled mechanics receive as high as fifteen dollars a day, and more than that for working on Sundays.

It would seem to us that it would assist the situation if the fact were made generally known throughout the United States and Europe that there is such a great demand for workmen and that such high wages are being paid. If any responsible body, mercantile or official, were to print in the leading newspapers throughout the country and in the large cities of the Old World the simple facts in the case, and append their signatures, there would speedily be brought in this direction skilled workmen of all kinds and laborers by the thousands. To publish widely in such countries as South Germany and Italy the fact that bricklayers receive eight dollars a day for an eight-hour day—32 marks—40 lire—would scarcely be believed by workmen, were it not attested by official signatures.

It would seem to us that it might assist inviting such a host hither, to make adequate preparation for them. As it is now, there is not house room or even shelter in San Francisco for the comparatively limited number of workmen engaged in trying to rebuild the city. It seems to us the first duty of the Citizens' Relief Committee is to provide house room for workmen in sufficient numbers to undertake the reconstruction of the city. At present it is impossible, and as long as there is delay in providing accommodations for the workmen, so much longer will be the delay in beginning the reconstruction of the city.

Merchants Banquet in the Ruins.

On Wednesday, July 25th, the Merchants' Association held a banquet in the white and gold room of the St. Francis Hotel. Aside from clearing away the debris and sweeping the floor, the wrecked room was left very much as it was after the fire. With the exception of brilliant electric lights the banquet hall was a ruin. The table equipments were Spartan in their simplicity and the banqueters sat on benches.

A significant episode in the banquet was the appearance of Mayor Schmitz. It is only a few months—but it seems like many years—since the Mayor electrified the Merchants' Association by declining to attend their banquet at the Palace Hotel. This event was shortly after the election of last year, when a number of prominent officials of the Merchants' Association campaigned most vigorously against Mayor Schmitz's re-election. The Mayor believed and said with great frankness that they were responsible for the numerous personal attacks on him in the press of the city, and that therefore he could not with self respect sit down to dine with them. The incident caused not a little feeling at the time, but like others of our tea-pot tempests it was all wiped out by the calamitous events of last April.

The Mayor was very cordially greeted at last week's banquet, and his speech was received with much applause. He was introduced by F. J. Symmes, the chairman, who touched upon differences in the past between the Executive and the Merchants' Association. But he said that the members and the Mayor during the past three months had become much better acquainted than ever before, and on behalf of the Association he therefore welcomed the Mayor as a particular and honored guest.

In his speech the Mayor said: "Your chairman has intimated that there may have been differences between the Merchants' Association and the municipal authorities. I do not desire to make any comment on that subject. But I do wish to make the days of the late fire a memorable period. I want harmony and patriotism in our new town. When I retire from office I expect to be loyal to the city's administration. I want loyalty to the present administration. For too long a time there have been knocking and knockers in San Francisco. The earthquake seemed to be an aggregated collection of all our local knocks. It gave us the biggest knock of all." Concerning the present situation, labor and other, the Mayor said: "There is comment about certain elements in our city being banded together to sell their labor at an increased price. On the other hand, rents are being increased and the prices of all kinds of material are being raised. Thus it is not surprising that labor should be higher than before the fire. In the next few months, however, supply and demand may have their effect, and let us hope that the spirit of tolerance and fair play may benefit our good town." The Mayor was received throughout his speech with much appreciation, and seemed to be the most popular man at the banquet.

R. B. Hale also made a successful speech. He urged the return of the retailers to their old location, and called the attention of landlords to the fact that merchants now are much freer than before to move around, and that it would be wise not to put their rents too high. Mr. Hale also advocated a belt railroad with spur tracks to the large business establishments and a salt water system for fire protection.

H. A. Law spoke in an optimistic strain pointing out that the situation of San Francisco and the resources of the State will lead to rapid rehabilitation; that San Francisco always had more business than she could take care of, and even now "the people are standing five deep in the retail stores." He said, "This was a rich man fire. We lost a great deal, but we were able to lose it. We have sent $21,000,000 to New York since the fire to lend at two per cent."

F. K. Lane, the newly appointed Interstate Commerce Commissioner, spoke of the labor troubles, and warned his listeners that the present strikes would inevitably cause great disaster if they were not prevented. He advocated arbitration before a court of arbitrators, a board of Supreme Justices, or Bishops, or other men not personally interested in either labor or capital.

In the annual report of the Merchants' Association a number of suggestions are made concerning the building of the new city. It is recommended that the business district be laid out in zones, with warehouses, factories, coal and lumber yards and similar establishments along the waterfront with the members of each branch grouped together; the strictly wholesale houses in the second zone; in the third zone manufacturers' agents and brokers and corporations offices; in the fourth zone the present banking location, with real estate offices, insurance companies, and stock exchanges; in the fifth zone the great retail district; in the sixth zone the apartment boarding houses and the family hotels. Beyond this would come the strictly residential section. In its report the Association p dicts that the permanent retail business will be re-established in the downtown districts, and the directors say that they "are of the opinion that considerable haste was shown in locating temporary stores uptown."

This is doubtless true, but the directors should not forget that if the merchants had located downtown with the temperature then existing in the ruins, more haste would have been shown in getting out of downtown than they showed in locating uptown.

Freight Blockade in San Francisco.

Another difficulty has settled over the unfortunate city of San Francisco. In addition to the high price of structural material, the high price of labor, the continual strikes of the labor unions, and the difficulty of getting freight handled, trans-shipped, and delivered, there now has come a complete congestion of freight in San Francisco. So serious is the situation that Julius Kruttschnitt, Vice-President and Manager of the Southern Pacific Company, came out from the East to examine into the matter. As a result he decided that the Southern Pacific Company would refuse all lumber shipments for San Francisco, and if the freight yards were not speedily cleared, that all freight for San Francisco would be refused. At the present writing there are some ten thousand loaded cars standing on the tracks in and around San Francisco waiting to be unloaded, and they are pouring into the city at the rate of 500 a day.

Part of this congestion is due to the labor question. The freight handlers are continually striking, and it is with difficulty that crews in the freight yards can be retained. The scarcity of workmen in the building trades, the very high rate of wages, and the strikes and threatened strikes among them, cause a great delay in erecting new buildings. The most embarrassing feature of the problem is that most of the consignees can not receive the freight because they have no place to put it. As soon as the great fire of last April was over the San Francisco merchants sent to the East large orders for goods of all kinds. The merchants made their orders believing that in a few weeks they would be in a condition to receive their freight in temporary quarters. Some of the large houses sent orders practically duplicating their entire lost stock; for example, a business house which previously had occupied a six-story store would order goods to fill it. Now such a house finds itself in a wooden shed of a single story, and it is utterly impossible to find room in it for the goods ordered. Another phase of the situation is the financial one; many merchants ordered goods on the supposition that their insurance money would be paid in a few weeks. But they are finding that the insurance companies are not only very slow in paying, but many of them will not pay at all. Thus the money which these merchants expected to have with which to meet their bills is not at hand, and they are unable to receive their freight.

The situation has clogged the tracks of the railway companies for many miles. In addition to the enormous bulk of freight cars in the San Francisco yards, there are nearly three thousand loaded cars in the Southern Pacific freight yards around Oakland and Berkeley, while small lots and on every siding in that vicinity. In fact, the sidings are clogged north, east and south for many hundreds of miles. Far out in the desert there stand on the sidings long lines of freight cars loaded with freight for San Francisco. These trains cannot be forwarded, as there is absolutely no room around San Francisco for the cars.

This is the most serious situation which has confronted San Francisco since the great disaster. If the merchants cannot receive their freight—and it would seem that it is impossible for them to do so—the railway companies will be forced to declare an embargo on San Francisco. Nearly a quarter of their freight cars are now tied up in the San Francisco congestion, and if they do not put a stop to the situation they will be forced themselves to cease operations on much of their mileage. Therefore, it would seem as if the Southern Pacific, Union Pacific, the Santa Fe, and their connecting lines will be forced to refuse receiving freight for San Francisco. They have already refused to receive lumber, lime, cement, structural materials and hay. It looks like a hopeless deadlock.

Money Here and Elsewhere.

Although San Francisco is going through very hard times as far as the fire, the insurance situation, the labor situation, the freight situation, and the supply of building materials are concerned, money matters on the face of them seem most encouraging. The San Francisco bank clearances last week were, 1905, $33,500,750.99; 1906, $38,073,172.36; and balances, 1905, $3,944,716.99; 1906, $4,302,304.19; showing that we are several millions ahead of the clearances of a year ago. It is amazing that in the face of all the difficulties under which San Francisco is laboring, the money market should be apparently so unperturbed.

This is not the case elsewhere. The condition of the stock market in New York has been causing anxiety to speculators and some disturbances to those who are not speculators. There are not wanting pessimists who prophesy trouble in the money market during the coming autumn. They say that the rates for money on call four or five months ago led to the April deficit in the New York Bank reserves, the first time a deficit has occurred at that season in over twenty years. Further they point out that owing to various causes money is now tied up more tightly than has been known for years. They point also to the enormous destruction of property in the San Francisco fire, which must be replaced by a flowing westward of insurance capital, largely American. We might interject here to the "prophets of gloom" that some of us would like to see some more of this insurance capital get as far as San Francisco. They next dwell upon the disturbed money markets in Europe, owing to Russia's political revolution. Lastly, they point with alarm to the approaching Congressional elections, which they fear will hinge largely on the Trusts and the abuses of crooked capital.

On the other hand, large over-subscription to the Panama two per cent bonds would seem to point to the existence of plenty of money for investment, if not for speculation. These bonds were for thirty million dollars, and brought an average price of 103.95. This is the first popular loan offered since the war bonds of 1898. Many journals seem to believe that these bonds, by reason of their low interest, do not appeal to general investors, but that they were subscribed for chiefly by National Banks as collateral for public deposits and circulation. The refunding two per cents, however, were taken largely by the public, 4-9 by popular subscription and 5-9 by the banks, to be exact. While this thirty million Panama loan seems to have been taken largely by the banks, it is probably due to the fact that the public was ignorant of the impending issue. In 1898 two hundred millions of three per cent bonds were sold at par to nearly a quarter of a million of subscribers, and they at once jumped to a premium. The present issue was sold, as above indicated, at nearly 104. Ours is the only country in the world where such high figures can be obtained for such low interest. The mighty Imperial Government of Great Britain pays two and one-half per cent on its Consols, but they sell down in the 80s. France's bonds pay three and three and one-half per cent interest, but they too are selling below par.

As for Russia, the low price of Russian securities has not a little to do with the present disturbed condition of the money markets in the Old World. When the new Russian loan was issued, some months ago, the old four per cent Russians were held at 86¼. Last week they fell to 74. This is lower than the lowest price during the war with Japan. When Russia placed last April nearly half a billion of dollars in bonds at five per cent, they sold at 89, but have since fallen nearly eight points. Russia's troubles over the Duma, and the peasant revolt, is causing much apprehension in the money markets of France, Austria and Germany, the principal purchasers of Russian bonds. Even British Consols have fallen five points in the last three months. There was a time when a drop of a quarter was considered as a grave financial disturbance. Although England took only about sixty million dollars of the Russian loan, she looks with much apprehension on the condition in Russia. True, the Czar has dissolved the Duma, but he will have to call another legislative body, and its members are certain to come imbued with the same ideas concerning the expropriation of private lands and their distribution to the peasants. This leaven set working in Europe at the present may shake the foundations on which all national finances rest.

Altogether the financial situation in New York—although to the hyper-sensitive speculator of Wall Street it seems disturbed—is beatific compared with the situation of the great money marts abroad.

Proximate Causes and "Passing It Up."

Several times since the great disaster we have had occasion to comment on the multi-form phases of "passing the buck" and The Other Fellow in his variety. He has occupied an unusually prominent position in our city during the past three months. For example, it was the unanimous belief of the entire city that the Burnham plans of beautifying San Francisco should be carried out. This involved running boulevards, creating new parks and squares, terracing hillsides, and widening streets. Not a voice was raised against this plan of beautification until it came to details. Then it seems that we all remained unanimous in regard to the desirability of widening streets, but we did not want our own particular street widened. We wanted the widening done on The Other Fellow's Street. A man who owned a corner lot twenty feet on Sansome by sixty feet on Commercial was strenuously opposed to widening Commercial twenty feet. He greatly preferred that they widen Some Other Fellow's Street.

So widespread has become the belief that it is The Other Fellow's Street on which changes should be made, that the Burnham project is semi-moribund. The unanimity with which the city praised it a couple of months ago in the abstract, entirely disappeared when it was presented in the concrete. In short, the Burnham plan was "passed up"; it seems to be laid away in that limbo where are placed lovers' perjuries, politicians' promises, the old moons, and other things at which Jove laughs.

But if one hears of the Burnham project only its death rattle, not so The Other Fellow. He is still very much alive. Likewise our municipal officials, our relief commissioners, and our citizens at large continue to "pass the buck." During the past six weeks there has been much rancor excited over certain changes in the business districts of San Francisco. About the end of April, when the Argonaut ventured to hint that such changes were inevitable, we received not a little slang-whanging for our pains. All the same we seem to observe that these changes are going on. About the only district which seems established hard and fast is the financial district. All the banks own their property; all of them still retain their vaults intact; all of them still possess funds in abundance; and all of them intend to rebuild where they are. Therefore, that district will remain unchanged. But as for the warehouse district, the factory district, the downtown wholesale district, the apartment-house district, and even the Tenderloin—where these quarters of the city are going to be located permanently, who can tell? Not even the real estate agents, not even the newest, the youngest, the most infallible among them.

A few months ago those individuals who owned real property on Market Street between Sansome and Powell, on Montgomery between Market and Sutter, on Kearny and Grant Avenue between Market and Post, on Stockton and on Powell Streets between Market and Union Square, were looked upon as the uptown magnates of the city. Property had sold on Market Street in that vicinity for over six thousand dollars a front foot. On Kearny Street it had sold for five thousand dollars a front foot. Therefore, when these landlords, after the great fire, saw their former tenants taking flight for such distant residential streets as Fillmore, their feelings may be imagined. The Fillmore Street landowners were jubilant, but so avaricious did they grow in their scale of rentals that soon there was revolt among their tenants. The richer and more influential among the retail dealers organized an association, seceded from Fillmore Street, and at once created a new shopping quarter on Van Ness Avenue. The writer is not a seventh son of a seventh son, but he will venture to predict that Van Ness Avenue will remain a fine shopping street as long as there is any San Francisco. It may be that in time there will again be a downtown retail district near where the old one was, but there will always remain a shopping quarter on Van Ness Avenue.

Naturally, the owners of property in and around the former retail district grew much disturbed over their tenants' flight. They held a meeting recently to concoct means for bringing back the retail birds of passage. But the ex-landlords did not agree. In the course of their discussion and dissension it developed that some of them had already provided temporary quarters, but in the opinion of their neighboring landowners they were charging such high rents as to kill off all hope of a general return of the tenants. Those who had no tenants wrestled with those who had, urging them to lower their rentals. But those who had tenants stoutly resisted the overtures of their tenantless neighbors, maintaining that "rent is purely a question of demand and supply."

So it is. That is a comfortable and comforting conclusion for a landlord. Furthermore, the statement is true. Still there is not a little criticism at present of those landowners who are exacting high rents, and they are denounced as "gougers."

It has occurred to us, however, that there is a better defense to be made by landlords who are making tenants pay high rentals. As the insurance companies insist on going behind the fire record for the cause of the recent calamity, and insisting that the earthquake is not a remote but a proximate cause of the destruction of all houses and buildings, so let the landlords seek for a proximate cause of their high rents. What bids fair to become a leading case in San Francisco is known as the "ham and egg fire"; in this an elderly lady at North Beach, on the morning of the fire, overturned a coal-oil stove, set fire to her house, by which fire was communicated not only to the entire block in which her house was located, but eventually to the greater part of the North Beach district. This was one of the many independent and separate fires which raged during the three dreadful days of last April. It might be thought that a clear-cut case like this—for all these facts are readily to be proved by many witnesses—might shake the ingenious theory of the insurance companies as to the earthquake being the proximate cause. Not so. The insurance companies will perhaps admit that the ham and egg fire did not result directly from the earthquake, or from buildings ignited by fires resulting directly from the earthquake; but they will allege that the earthquake got on the old lady's nerves to such an extent that her hand shook; that she dropped the ham and eggs; that thus she overturned the coal-oil stove; and thus she destroyed over one hundred and fifty million dollars' worth of property, for which the insurance companies refuse to pay, although they agreed to do so, because the fire was "indirectly" the result of the earthquake, via the old lady's shaking hand and ham and eggs.

Correspondingly, to return to the landowners, their tenants and their high rents. Let them seek, like the insurance companies, for a proximate cause. The following strikes us as being a pleasing and ingenious explanation, calculated to soothe the jealousy of neighboring landowners, and possibly to placate tenants who have been thrown out in favor of those paying a higher rental:

First, it is not the landlord who is responsible for raising the rental; it is the tenant. Tenant Doe comes and offers Landlord Stokes a higher rental than he is at present receiving from Tenant Roe; he is quite justified in ejecting Tenant Roe and replacing him with Tenant Doe. Even if he thus deprives his friend and neighbor, Landlord Nokes, of Tenant Doe, it is not the fault of Landlord Stokes. It is the fault of Tenant Doe. He is the proximate cause.

Following the same logical path as the insurance companies, we might push our reasoning further, and say it is only partially the fault of Tenant Doe for paying too much, but mainly the fault of Tenant Roe for not paying enough. By the same line of reasoning, the fire was not due to the ham and eggs, or the old lady, or the coal-oil stove, but to the earthquake, which shook the house, which rattled the nerves, which made shaky the hand, which spilt the ham, which scrambled the eggs, which capsized the coal-oil stove, which set fire to the house the old lady built, and burned down San Francisco. Thus the earthquake became a proximate cause of the city's destruction. And the danger to the retail district now is not due to the avarice of landlords, but to the spendthrift folly of tenants in paying more rent than they ought to. The landlords, like the insurance companies, are not responsible. It is the earthquake and the tenants.

Those mournful prophets who accuse the landlords of holding up the New San Francisco by charging high rents can thus be proved to be mistaken; it is the tenants who are to blame for offering the landlords high rents. In short, they can pass it up to The Other Fellow.

Those pessimists who accuse the labor unions of disloyal greed in seizing the present unhappy situation as a favorable time for charging exorbitant wages are mistaken (according to the Examiner). That journal repudiates with indignation these slanders on the trades unions and prints long and mysterious explanations of these demands, from which it seems it is not the labor unions nor the workmen comprising them who make these demands for exorbitant wages, but some mysterious agency which forces the employer to give and the workmen to accept these high wages, without either knowing why.

It must be The Other Fellow.

San Francisco's City Hall.

Among the many photographs which the crooked insurance companies are circulating throughout the United States in order to show that San Francisco was destroyed by earthquake instead of fire, is one of the City Hall. It is true that that building was badly wrecked before the fire came to complete the earthquake's work, but it must not be forgotten that it was built by the municipality of San Francisco. The crooked insurance companies are not circulating any photographs of the United States Mint (a few hundred yards away), which is practically undamaged, or of the Postoffice (a short distance to the west), which is only slightly damaged, or of the Appraiser's building (downtown in the heart of the burned district), which is scarcely damaged at all. The explanation is that these buildings were constructed by the federal and not by the municipal government.

Badly, however, as the City Hall appeared to be wrecked, it is apparently not so hopeless as was supposed. Supervisor Nicholas, chairman of the building committee, recently reported officially that the City Hall, the Hall of Records, and the Hall of Justice had been injured beyond repair, and he was quoted in the newspapers as saying that "It would be unfair to the citizens of San Francisco to require them to imperil their lives by going inside the ruined City Hall to transact business." This statement surprised and startled the citizens of San Francisco, for they were certain that the foundations at least were uninjured, and these cost something like a million dollars. Now the Supervisors as a body have con-to believe in the municipal buildings having at least a certain value, for they have passed resolutions stating that "at least 60 per cent of the City Hall and Hall of Justice buildings has been saved"; "that said buildings can be completely and economically restored"; that "within three months enough of the city buildings can be restored and made ready for temporary use by the officials of the city"; that "the basements, first floor, and courts of said buildings are almost unimpaired, and that they be made ready for temporary occupancy by the City and County officials"; further, "that the Hall of Records be immediately put in good condition for the Recorder's use."

These resolutions were passed by the Board unanimously—with the exception of Supervisor Nicholas.

Another Crooked "Cause."

Now another insurance gang, the Transatlantic, deny liability and pass up a new cause. The crooked cockney companies hide themselves merely behind "earthquake" as a proximate cause. But this crooked sauerkraut company is more devout; it ascribes the cause of the fire to "an overwhelming catastrophe due to a visitation of Providence." When the cause of our disaster is passed up to the Lord, the only thing left for us to do is to pass out of the insurance game. For that matter, are not the men who have never insured at all ahead at present? The rest of us have been paying premiums for many years, and now we are going to be buncoed out of our insurance money. Besides, we are broke. The men who have never insured are also broke, it is true, but at least they are ahead of us just the amount we paid for premiums. Think what a lot of fun they must have had with the money they did not pay for premiums! Think also what a lot of fun the insurance men must have had with the money we did pay for premiums!

The Crooked Cockney Companies.

A meeting of the policy holders of the Commercial Union, Alliance, Palatine, Norwich Union, and Indemnity Companies was held on July 30th. There were evidently some emissaries of the companies present, for a number of adroit attempts were made to puzzle the policy holders. For example, it was given out semi-officially that the crooked cockney companies "believe the North Beach fire to be due to the act of an incendiary, consequently all losses in that section must be paid." Further, another rumor permeated the meeting to the effect that the crooked cockney companies believe that "the Hayes Valley fire was caused by a defective chimney flue, and the companies will therefore offer to compromise claims in this section." Concerning other claims, the policy holders were assured that the involved and ambiguous statement issued by the companies' attorneys was "merely a bugaboo to satisfy the English stockholders," and after scaring the policy holders nearly to death, the companies, we are told, "intend to act fairly and squarely by them."

These varying rumors caused much indecision in the minds of the policy holders, and as a result they did not form an incorporation. However, we can inform them that the crooked cockney companies will not pay a penny more than they are forced to pay. They will fight every claim, whether it is for a North Beach fire or a Hayes Valley fire, if they think they have a chance to "compromise." Furthermore, if the policy holders permit themselves to be bamboozled by these reports, they will only cause delay which will do them no good, but only harm. If they want to get anything out of the crooked cockney companies they will have to get it by fighting. They are in an entirely different situation from the holders of policies in non-earthquake companies. Their situation is a desperate one, and they will have to fight desperately to get anything at all.

In our opinion their most useful weapon is publicity. The crooked cockney companies have written many millions in policies in England, in Ireland, in Scotland, in Wales, in the United States of America, in the Dominion of Canada, in Australia, and in New Zealand, not to speak of the colonies and crown colonies of Great Britain all over the world, and in many foreign countries as well. If the San Francisco policy holders in the crooked cockney companies will spend a few thousand dollars in warning other people holding policies in these corporations of the danger to which they are exposed, the local policy holders will, in our opinion, force the companies to some sort of a settlement. When we say "danger" we mean it. There is no part of the world where earthquakes have not occurred and there is no part in which they may not occur again. There was one in Wales a few weeks ago, and one of the most destructive ever known occurred in the Mississippi Valley of the United States. There may be one in London next week. Every policy holder ought to know of his danger from earthquake clauses as well as from earthquakes and fire.

Anyway, it is not probable that these crooked cockney companies are willing to have their policy holders throughout the world know what their attitude is. If their directors are honest—and we will admit purely for purposes of argument that they are—they should not only be unreluctant but more than willing to impress thoroughly on the minds of all their policy holders throughout the world that they will not pay any fire losses when an earthquake has occurred within 72 hours of the time of the fire. Still, we do not think they will circulate these facts freely. Therefore, why not let their policy holders here circulate the facts for them—not only freely, but free?

Optimism, Insurance and Wine.

One of the first San Francisco policy holders to get its loss adjusted was the California Wine Association, which carried $1,062,000 of insurance in 74 different companies. This loss was adjusted a number of weeks ago. In the meantime the semi-annual dividend of the association has become due, which has been "temporarily" postponed until the company receives all of its insurance money." President P. T. Morgan is thus quoted in the daily press: "I think we shall eventually get the $1,062,000 as recommended by the local adjuster." No one can accuse President Morgan of pessimism. In fact, he is a persistent optimist. Perhaps it is dealing in wine, which maketh glad the heart of man, that makes him so hopeful. When the California Wine Association again erects its big building on Third Street near Townsend "as soon as the company receives all of its insurance money," we recommend that they secure cunning sculptors to design two statues to stand on either side of the great portal. Let the statue on the left be that of Mark Tapley; let the statue on the right be that of Wilkins Micawber, Esq. Crowning the arch over the portal, standing on the keystone, with eyes uplifted, with hands extended, with a beatific and expectant smile, we recommend the installation of a life-size statue of the optimistic president, Mr. Morgan, waiting "until the company receives all of its insurance money."

He will stand there until Gabriel blows his horn.

The Relief Fund and Its Troubles.

The three commissioners appointed by the Finance Committee and the Mayor a month ago to administer the Relief Fund met with enthusiastic disapproval from the people, the press, and the refugees. They are, we believe, all honest and well-meaning men, but they had an impossible task. So all of them resigned, and the work has been taken up again by a corporation composed of the members of the Citizen's Finance Committee. This was duly incorporated, adding to it the Governor of the State and the Mayor of San Francisco. All of the members of this incorporation are prominent citizens and men of wealth, all of them serve without salary, and all of them are working from the best and most unselfish motives. This we believe, but we also believe that they will find it impossible to administer the Relief Fund without a vast amount of criticism, some of it well-meaning and some of it malicious.

In the first place, it is impossible to satisfy thousands of people living under the conditions to which the refugees have been exposed for three months. If they were given the best of food, the best of shelter, and the best of care, they would still be dissatisfied. On the other hand, they have suffered many hardships—from the inelastic workings of the Relief Commissioner's Bureau, from a failure to supply such absolutely necessary articles as clothing and bedding, and from red tape. They have hence grown so rancorous that when this week a banquet was tendered to Dr. Devine of the National Red Cross—who has given his services most unselfishly and without salary for three months to San Francisco's destitute—the refugees organized a procession to march to the hotel where the banquet was given, in order to denounce him.

It has been impossible to settle the food question in the camps satisfactorily. At first the refugees were given unecooked rations by the army officials. Many abuses resulted; for example, a Palo Alto paper recently remarked that a number of families were living there on relief supplies which they had accumulated in San Francisco three months ago. We do not know whether this is true or not, but it is not improbable. The army officials found that some families of the poorest class, consisting of say five members, would make application at five different relief stations for supplies enough for five persons, twenty-five in all, thus making an "endless chain." They would thereby get food in quantities enough to start small grocery stores.

As a result, the army officials concluded to shut down on the unecooked rations, and they installed camp kitchens instead, where hot food was served to the refugees. There were two sets of tables at these places. At one, the meals were served free; at the other, the meals cost fifteen cents. Thus those who were unwilling to accept cooked food as alms could pay for it if they chose. This plan has resulted in intense dissatisfaction among the refugees. They claim that it breaks up family life completely and that it is degrading. The camp inspectors of the new corporation have been requested to pass upon this question first, in order to decide whether these camp kitchens shall be retained or the old system of uncooked rations be resumed. Oddly enough, all of the inspectors were opposed to the camp kitchens when they began their task, but after investigation they reported that in their opinion it was impossible to serve the refugees otherwise, although all of them condemned the manner in which the kitchens have been run.

Major Gaston, an army officer who has remained General Superintendent of the Camps, has reported against the uncooked rations. He says that the kitchens are a necessity; but that they can be improved. He discusses the suggestion that thirty cents be given to each refugee to buy his food for the day, and condemns it. His experience shows, he says, that owing to the frailty of human nature this sum would often be spent for improper purposes, leaving many refugees begging for food. He also points out that if uncooked rations be issued for thirty days, many receiving them will give them away, or waste them, or lose them by being robbed in their tents, which of course have no safeguards; thus again, he says, the spectacle will be presented of refugees begging for food in the camps. But his most invincible argument is that there are no stoves or other cooking utensils in the camps, and, even if there were, many of the refugees do not know how to cook. There would also be great danger of fire from so many kitchens, and the bad sanitary condition of the camps would intensify, owing to garbage from the individual kitchens.

What Major Gaston says about the inability of the refugees to cook is very true. In mining camps there is an old joke about the inability of many men to "cook water without burning it." Most of these poor refugees are even more helpless than the men of the frontier.

Aid for Hospitals.

In the great disaster of last April San Francisco lost nine of its hospitals, and those that remain are so crippled that at least one of them will have to be torn down. The Medical Faculty of the University of California is trying to start a hospital and free clinic in one of the Affiliated College Buildings south of Golden Gate Park in San Francisco. Those dwellers throughout the State who are friends of the afflicted, of the State University, and of medical education, might be willing to assist in raising the amount of money necessary to reconstruct and furnish this building. Such a hospital would be a benefit to the entire State. There are many medical problems peculiarly interesting on this coast which can be solved only by means of such a hospital. Many tropical diseases will inevitably result from the presence in this State of thousands of returned soldiers from the Philippines. There are also certain indigenous diseases, some of them fatal, which medical experts in California are now studying with much interest. Eighteen such cases have been discovered recently in San Francisco among laboring men. There is a tendency to early arterial degeneration on this coast which is a subject well worthy of careful study. We have also an unusually high percentage of insanity in California. This State is somewhat overburdened with tuberculous cases from elsewhere, and we must take heed lest, like the Riviera, that which was originally a resort for health seekers shall not become a plague spot to those born of the soil. All of these problems require careful study, and such a hospital as we speak of with a free clinic can bring about this much to be desired result. It will take about fifty thousand dollars to begin this work. It is so difficult now to raise money in San Francisco that the friends of the project appeal for help to the State at large. Funds should be sent to Dr. A. A. D'Ancona, Dean of the Medical Faculty, Affiliated Colleges Building, San Francisco.

War, Horrid War.

A few days ago war threatened to break out among the Republics of Guatemala, Salvador and Honduras. Those people who believe that President Roosevelt is not in favor of peace must revise their opinions. The President made haste to send a Peace Commission aboard the United States cruiser, Marblehead, to attempt to adjust matters. The ship lay to off the stormy Guatemalan coast, where the water is usually so rough that it is difficult to make a landing. The cruiser lay some five miles off shore, and the Commissioners of the three republics were brought out in boats and then hoisted in steel cages to the ship's deck. There they met the members of the American legations accredited to the three republics. Rumor says that when the San Salvadoreno, the Guatemalteco, and the Hondureno Commissioners were hoisted up and then lifted out of their cages, they were at once carried below where they remained for many hours, a prey to internal dissensions of the most violent character, each man remaining in his own cabin. After they had stood it as long as they could, the Commissioners concluded to declare peace and signed the protocol with trembling hands. Then the greenish yellow dagoes were again hoisted in their steel cages, put into their boats, and taken ashore. Thus was war averted. Who can accuse President Roosevelt of being lacking in diplomacy? Who would ever have thought of sea-sickness as an expediter of peace negotiations? As the jolly young waterman of Oyster Bay pulls for the shore and Sagamore Hill, he meditatively winks the other eye.

Marshall Field's executors will be asked to pay taxes on $180,000,000, amounting to about $2,800,000. This will be by far the greatest tax ever levied upon the property of an individual taxpayer. The larger portion of the assessment against the Field estate is for seven years' back taxes on personal property upon which the late Mr. Field is held by the Chicago Board of Review to have avoided paying taxes.

Taking advantage of the fact that no deposit was required of bidders for Panama Canal bonds, owing to the peculiar condition of the money market, Samuel Beyerley, an express company clerk, put in four bids and was awarded $5,800,000 worth of bonds. By selling his option he cleaned up over $20,000 without putting up a cent save for the postage stamp which carried his bid to Washington.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

"Champagne Out of a Beer Glass."

Yokohama United Club, No. 4 Bund, July 7, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Just came down from Vladivostok, and as soon as I arrived here I looked for the Argonaut, and was tickled to find it, even if it was in rags or wood pulp rather. It's almost like drinking champagne out of a beer glass—but I was very glad indeed to see the familiar headline. I was in Vladivostok when the fierce news came. It's all too bad, too awful to believe! Our offices, of course, were burnt down, but I got a cable, "All well, ready for business"—that's California for you! I regret your losses exceedingly, but congratulate you upon the uninterrupted appearance of The Argonaut. Sincerely yours,
R. E. Haas.

A Complete Argonaut File for Sale.

McNeill Bros., Printers, 788 McAllister St.,
San Francisco, July 25, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Most people read the Argonaut, and all respect it. Once in a while a fellow will come along and express a vague wish that he had a complete file of it. Once in say five or twenty years a C. C. (coupon cutter) wants a file real badly, and in its own columns the Argonaut once practically offered $500 for a complete file. [If so we withdraw the offer for the time being, at least.—Ed.] As the small boy says, "Now listen!" I have a complete bound (1-2 Roan) file of the Argonaut from Vol. 1, No. 1, to 1900 inclusive. It takes in the late lamented Fred A. Somers and Frank M. Pixley. It is its own inimitable self all the way down the line, from "Them Asses of the Sand Lot" to that Catholic controversy where Pixley got madly licked, and through varying vicissitudes up to and including Cleveland's second term and a part of McKinley's—peace to his ashes.

But I am digressing. Do you know of anybody with sufficient love of the Argonaut, and of ancient history—and with more money than he knows what to do with, who wishes to recoup me on some of my late fire losses to the extent of going right down into his pockets—a coupon will do—and paying me handsomely for my file? For a few days after the fire—while I belonged to the bread line and a dollar was as big as a cart-wheel—most any old sum would have parted us. But like all other commodities in this city, except printing, Argonaut files are now up. I am again a "boss"—see letter head—and as a cold speculation, sufficient remuneration (how's that?) might assuage the pains of parting and I might be tempted to relinquish my grip. There is this to say, however, like old wine these Argonauts will improve with age, and who knows but what another fire, elsewhere, might make them priceless? How much am I offered for them? Don't all speak at once. Plenty of time. "All things come to him who waits." Very truly yours,

A. B. McNeill.

An Editor Misses the Argonaut.

Office of Washington Mirror,
821 Colorado Building, Washington, D. C.,
July 20, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: We have not received our exchange copy of your brilliant paper since the fire. We understand that you did not cease publication, and presume that the non-receipt of the paper is due to the fact that your lists were destroyed.

We have not had an opportunity before to express to you our deep sympathy, and trust that with the well-known energy of you Californians your temporary crippling will act but as a breathing space, and you have by now resumed your place among the foremost weeklies in this country. With best wishes, very truly,
F. D. Mullen.

Another Editor Misses the Argonaut.

Lompoc, Cal., July 27, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: I notice that the Argonaut is not coming among my favorite "exchanges," and as it has been a welcome visitor to me for over ten years I write this to know if you will favor me with it again. I have seen a few copies of the Argonaut since the "wreck" and read it with even greater interest than before, and I congratulate you in getting from under the wreck and putting up such an excellent paper under such trying conditions. With the exception of the make-up, it is the same, only better. With best wishes, very truly yours,
W. E. Miscall.

Argonaut Insurance Not Settled.

American Newspaper Union,
Birmingham, Ala., July 26, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: Thinking it possible that your mailing lists might have been destroyed, we are writing you at this time to make sure we will not be overlooked when well under way again.

I do not believe we fully appreciated the Argonaut until we missed it. We always realized its worth, but we did not realize how much it meant to us. We assure you that we will welcome, indeed, the first issue we receive.

Trusting everything is coming smoothly with you, and that you have been successful in obtaining a settlement from the insurance people, with best wishes we remain, very truly yours,

American Newspaper Union,
Jas. H. Mogford, Manager.

Our Views on Insurance Affairs.

New York, July 10, 1906.

Dear Argonaut: Your provisional issues of last April have been especially bound for preservation in my library of "Americana."

I rejoice with your many readers that your issues continue to reach us, and I wish you years and years of prosperity and continued usefulness. Your position in regard to fire insurance affairs is both just and fair—to insurers and insured—and it is a great pity that a few Eastern journals do not take up your brave and independent lead.

The port of San Francisco—therein rests the great future of this country. The greatest port of white civilization next to the world's most important markets. It is my firm belief that the port of San Francisco will eventually rank equal to those of Hamburg, Liverpool, New York and New Orleans. In your new and well-built city will be established markets in which commercial operations of the widest scope will be conducted. With such a future, the losses of the past will soon be regained and the sufferings of the present era forgotten. I am daily associated with the merchants of this city—engaged in the export trade—and I am quite sure I voice their sentiments.

By the way, it is the general opinion that the golden house of Rothschild needed the drubbing you recently administered. Eastern journals are, as usual, skulking and silent on this point. Very truly yours, Telamon S. Cuyler.

From a Mountain Rancho.

Tokayano Rancho, Colfax, Cal., July 22, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: I enclose clipping sent to me from Paris relating to an imaginary condition supposed to have existed in Chinatown before the fire. Judging from the print and the paper, I think it was published in La Liberté, one of the leading and conservative evening papers of the French capital. Knowing that you read French, I did not take the trouble to translate it.

Reading your valuable paper every week is one of the things that make life worth living.

W. C. Spencer.

Earthquakes and Short Crops.

Office of J. and I. Blum, Vacaville, Cal., July 18, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: We enclose Chicago dispatch which gives you an idea what some of the Eastern people know about earthquakes and fruit crops. It reads: "The scarcity of fruit is attributed to the recent earthquake in California and to the cool weather prevailing this spring." How is that for earthquake lore and weather wisdom?
Yours truly,
Milt W. Blum.

Being Swindled While You Wait.

Berkeley, July 25, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: While I was at the Williamsburg Insurance Company rooms being swindled a young clerk came to the head of the office asking for postage stamps. The portly gentleman replied, "We can't discount Uncle Sam, can we?" and handed him the stamps. I don't know whether this is a joke or not, but it is a fact. The confidence game they played on me is another story.

A Relief Suggestion From Honolulu.

Kapiolani Building, Honolulu, July 16, 1906.

Editor Argonaut: The tone of the San Francisco press seems to indicate that the City Relief Committee and the whole business is in a muddle; that there are 50,000 destitute, with $6,000,000 in sight and 8,000 barrels of flour on hand; yet the fifty thousand sufferers are getting barely a subsistence out of it and no chance of anything better.

Now, $6,000,000, divided among 50,000 people means $125 each. The food supply on hand is probably sufficient to keep them some time. Suppose you were to divide the money up, say one-half of it pro rata and the other supplies pro rata, on condition that the recipients take their portion, get out and become self-sustaining. Every one going would relieve you of a burden, and undoubtedly most of them would go. Such as would not go, but were able-bodied, could be set to work and kept at work. Of course the relief fund belongs to the destitute, but it loses so much in getting to them that there is only a little left when it gets there.

If you had a man among you with the force and executive ability of old Brigham Young, he would take San Francisco's sufferers and their supplies and relief fund, go out in the hills on a piece of desert land, and make them self-sustaining ere one-half of the fund was gone.

I do not see what is to hinder you from dividing their relief moneys among them as fast as you can and sending them away where they have a chance to be self-supporting. You certainly cannot improve their condition by holding them there together, destitute, with nothing to do and nothing to go it with, and keeping the relief fund under the fingers of the commission.
An Outsider.

The Sailor's Consolation.

One night came on a hurricane,
The sea was mountains rolling,
When Barney Buntline turned his quid,
And said to Billy Bowline:
"A strong nor-wester's blowing, Bill;
Hark! don't you hear it roar now?
Lord help 'em, how I pities all Unhappy folks on shore now!"

"Foolhardy chaps who live in town,
What danger they are all in,
And now are quaking in their beds,
For fear the roof should fall in;
Poor creatures, how they envy us,
And wishes, I've a notion,
For our good luck, in such a storm,
To be upon the ocean."

"But as for them who're out all day,
On business from their houses,
And late at night are coming home,
To cheer the babes and spouses;
While you and I, Bill, on the deck,
Are comfortably lying,
My eyes! what tiles and chimney-pots
About their heads are flying!"

"And very often have we heard
How men are killed and undone,
By overturns of carriages,
By thieves, and fires in London.
We know what risks all landmen run,
From noblemen to tailors;
Then, Bill, let us thank Providence
That you and I are sailors!"

—William Pitt.

President Roosevelt makes every minute count. He is even busy when he is being shaved. A deft-fingered negro brings in towels, soap, and razors, and waits quietly until the President is ready. The President comes in from his office, takes off his glasses and seats himself in a chair. Very frequently some cabinet officer or favored newspaper correspondent is shown in during the process, or asked to stay before it has begun. Secretary Loeb may come in from the adjoining room with a fountain pen and a document for the President to sign. For a moment the shaving is suspended and the President, undisturbed by lather, leans forward to affix his name. The story is told in Washington of a Governor of one of our insular possessions, who, several times, went to the White House to explain a certain complicated matter, and each time he was prevented from so doing because the President monopolized the conversation. Finally the Governor happened to arrive one day just at the time the President was being shaved. The Governor was shown right in, and as soon as the manipulations of the razor gave a momentary opening he seized and never let go until he had explained his whole case.

Mercantile circles in the East are much interested in the recent incorporation of Sears-Roebuck & Co. under the laws of New York State, with a capitalization of $40,000,000. This is a Chicago mail-order concern. It is stated for the company that its sales in 1905 amounted to $38,700,000, and for the first five months of the present year to over $20,000,000. The company does business only on the "cash before delivery" basis; it receives an average of some 75,000 letters each day; and its customers are said to number upwards of 6,000,000. Its newly built stores or store-houses in Chicago cover some 37 acres of ground. It deals in various classes of commodities—dry goods, clothing, house-furnishings, hardware, jewelry and silverware, vehicles, musical goods, drugs and surgical instruments, paints, books, sporting goods, groceries, wallpapers, and so on.

William Jennings Bryan, who was introduced by Ambassador Reid, has been received in private audience by King Edward at Buckingham Palace. The visit was paid at the king's special request, his majesty having notified Mr. Reid that he desired to meet Mr. Bryan. The interview was quite informal. Only the king, Mr. Reid and Mr. Bryan were present. The conversation largely turned on the subject of peace and the conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union.

FLOTSAM AND JETSAM.

Dr. D. D. Stevens, an eminent New York physician, says scrap tobacco is a menace to health. He declares that in an extreme southern State and in Cuba he found that nearly fifty per cent of the cigarmakers were afflicted with tuberculosis or other transmittable diseases and that what particularly disgusted him was the habit the cigarmakers have of putting the end of the cigar in the mouth when forming a tip.

Chauffeur Carsughe, whom Thomas E. Stillman brought from New York, was sun-struck while he was driving the Stillman automobile thirty miles an hour last week on the road to Dives-sur-Mer. Naturally the half-senseless chauffeur could not steer the big touring car, and at its top speed it crashed sideways into a heavy truck driven by one Troughard, a miller. The automobilists and Troughard were hurled to the ground, car and truck being demolished. All of the occupants were injured, Mr. Stillman seriously. The accident near Lisieux is the third within a week to American automobilists in Europe.

A negro was hired in New York recently to pose as the victim for a moving picture of a Southern lynching bee. Just as he was strung up by a ferocious stage mob, which was firing blank cartridges and acting in a devilish manner generally, and a camera was getting into action, a young woman witness of the scene informed the police a lynching was in progress. The police came in on the run, and scattered the lynchers, knocking three of them senseless. Some time later they remembered the negro was still hanging, and they cut him down. He was so nearly dead he could not speak.

In the harbor of Yokohama the liner Doric's officers witnessed a collision between the Canadian Pacific steamer Athenian and the oil-carrying steamer Appalachee, the latter striking the Athenian on the port side aft of amidships and cutting her to the water-line. The Doric was delayed several hours waiting for four passengers from the Athenian who desired to take passage on the liner. In boarding the Doric from a launch, one of them dropped her purse into the sea, and as it contained not only her ticket, but all the money she had in her possession, along with jewels worth several thousand dollars, she was compelled to return to shore to communicate with her husband, Dr. Moore Graham of Shanghai.

As a circus was leaving Rumford, Me., the elephant man and two villagers became involved in a quarrel. The countrymen called for a policeman. The driver of the elephants was ready for him. He said in an undertone to his animals, "Tails!" The big creatures quickly closed around him in a circle which could not be easily penetrated. Then to the biggest elephant, the driver said, "Look out for that man," and the anger of the elephant being kindled, he charged on the officer, who was only too glad to take to his heels. The mischievous driver let the animal pursue the fleeing officer, to the great amusement of the crowd, until he saw that the man's breath began to fail him, then he called a halt, and the cavalcade proceeded to the station.

The craze for picture postcards led to extraordinary rioting in the streets of Tokio, when the picture postcards issued by the government in commemoration of the war with Russia were placed on sale at the postoffices. Double files of people a mile long were waiting outside most of the offices as soon as they opened. At one place the police lost control of the crowd, which began a desperate struggle to gain admittance. The fence round the postoffice was trampled down and the people climbed up the walls onto the roofs and fought their way in through the windows. Under the weight of people part of the roof fell in, while the walls were damaged and the windows were smashed. Those who could not get near threw stones at the building. To quell the disturbance soldiers were called out. They charged the crowd with fixed bayonets and the fire brigade played streams of water on them.

THE CITY THAT WAS.

A Picture of the Old San Francisco.
The Striking Study Made by Will Irwin.

Will Irwin, who left San Francisco not long ago to take a position on the New York press, recently accomplished quite a master stroke by writing in a day an article of many columns for the Sun shortly after the news of the San Francisco disaster arrived. It so much impressed some of the writers on the Sun that they advised Irwin to print it in book form. The legends of the local room say that he wrote it at one burst in a single sitting with the copy boy tearing the sheets off his typewriter almost before he finished them. Whether he did or not it is good stuff. He has reprinted it under the title, "The City That Was, A Requiem of Old San Francisco, and he frankly says in his introductory note, "For the title I am indebted to Franklin Matthews."

The hypercritical might say that Irwin's history is at times a little too recent; that his geography is not quite exact; that Denis Kearney never made speeches in Portsmouth Square; that the genuine Sand Lot was up near the City Hall. But what does all that matter? No man writing such a "tour de force" can carry so many dates and facts in his head, and if he had revised it he might have revised all of the spirit out of it, and it certainly would have lost the tenderness and the pathos with which now it is so strongly tinged. Thus the book begins:

The City That Was.

The old San Francisco is dead. The gayest, lightest hearted, most pleasure loving city of the western continent, and in many ways the most interesting and romantic, is a horde of refugees living among ruins. It may rebuild; it probably will; but those who have known that peculiar city by the Golden Gate, have caught its flavor of the Arabian Nights, feel that it can never be the same. It is as though a pretty, frivolous woman had passed through a great tragedy. She survives, but she is sobered and different. If it rises out of the ashes it must be a modern city, much like other cities and without its old atmosphere.

And it was a city of romance and a gateway to adventure. It opened out on the mysterious Pacific, the untamed ocean; and through the Golden Gate entered China, Japan, the South Sea Islands, Lower California, the west coast of Central America, Australia. There was a sprinkling, too, of Alaska and Siberia. From his windows on Russian Hill one saw always something strange and suggestive creeping through the mists of the bay. It would be a South Sea Island brig, bringing in copra, to take out cottons and idols; a Chinese junk after sharks' livers; an old whaler, which seemed to drip oil, home from a year of cruising in the Arctic. Even the tramp wind-jammers were deep-chested craft, capable of rounding the Horn or of circumnavigating the globe; and they came in streaked and picturesque from their long voyaging.

In the orange colored dawn which always comes through the mists of that bay, the fishing fleet would crawl in under triangular lateen sails; for the fishermen of San Francisco Bay are all Neapolitans who have brought their customs and sail with lateen rigs stained an orange brown and shaped, when the wind fills them, like the ear of a horse.

Along the Water Front.

Along the waterfront the people of these craft met. "The smelting pot of the races," Stevenson called it; and this was always the city of his soul. There were black Gilbert Islanders, almost indistinguishable from negroes; lighter Kanakas from Hawaii or Samoa; Lascars in turbans; thickset Russian sailors; wild Chinese with unbraided hair; Italian fishermen in tam o' shanters, loud shirts and blue sashes; Greeks, Alaska Indians, little bay Spanish-Americans, together with men of all the European races. These came in and out from among the queer craft, to lose themselves in the disreputable, tumble-down, but always mysterious shanties and small saloons. In the back rooms of these saloons, South Sea Island traders and captains, fresh from the lands of romance, whaling masters, people who were trying to get up treasure expeditions, filibusters, Alaskan miners, used to meet and trade adventures.

There was another element, less picturesque and equally characteristic, along the waterfront. San Francisco was the back eddy of European civilization—one end of the world. The drifters came there and stopped, lingered a while to live by their wits in a country where living after a fashion has always been marvellously cheap. These people haunted the waterfront and the Barbary Coast by night, and lay by day on the grass in Portsmouth Square.

The square, the old plaza about which the city was built, Spanish fashion, had seen many things. There in the first burst of the early days the vigilance committee used to hold its hangings. There, in the time of the sand lot troubles, Denis Kearney, who nearly pulled the town down about his ears, used to make his orations which set the unruly to rioting. In later years Chinatown lay on one side of it and the Latin quarter and "Barbary Coast" on the other.

On this square the drifters lay all day long and told strange yarns. Stevenson lounged there with them in his time and learned the things which he wove into "The Wrecker" and his South Sea stories; and now in the centre of the square there stands the beautiful Stevenson monument. In later years the authorities put up a municipal building on one side of this square and prevented the loungers, for decency's sake, from lying on the grass. Since then some of the peculiar character of the old plaza has gone.

The Barbary Coast.

The Barbary Coast was a loud bit of bell. No one knows who coined the name. The place was simply three blocks of solid dance halls, there for the delight of the sailors of the world. On a fine busy night every door blared loud dance music from orchestras, steam pianos and gramophones, and the cumulative effect of the sound which reached the street was chaos and pandemonium. Almost anything might be happening behind the swinging doors. For a fine and picturesque bundle of names characteristic of the place, a police story of three or four years ago is typical. It all broke out in the Eye Wink Dance Hall. The trouble was started by a sailor known as Kanaka Pete, who lived in the What Cheer House, over a woman known as Iodoform Kate. Kanaka Pete chased the man he had marked to the Little Silver Dollar, where he halted and punctured him. The by-product of his gun made some holes in the front of the Eye Wink, which were proudly kept as souvenirs, and were probably there until it went out in the fire. This was low life, the lowest of the low.

Until the last decade almost anything except the commonplace and the expected might happen to a man on the waterfront. The cheerful industry of shanghaiing was reduced to a science. A citizen taking a drink in one of the saloons which hung out over the water might be dropped through the floor into a boat, or he might drink with a stranger and wake in the forecastle of a whaler bound for the Arctic. Such an incident is the basis of Frank Norris's novel, "Moran of the Lady Letty," and although the novel draws it pretty strong, it is not exaggerated. Ten years ago the police, the Sailors' Union, and the foreign consuls, working together, stopped all this.

Kearney street, a wilder and stranger Bowery, was the main thoroughfare of these people. An exiled Californian mourning over the city of his heart, has said:

"In a half an hour of Kearney street I could raise a dozen men for any wild adventure, from pulling down a statue to searching for the Cocos Island treasure." This is hardly an exaggeration. It was the Rialto of the desperate, Street of the Adventurers.

These are a few of the elements which made the city strange and gave it the glamour of romance, which has so strongly attracted such men as Stevenson, Frank Norris and Kipling. This life of the floating population lay apart from the regular life of the city, which was distinctive in itself.

California Men and Women.

The Californian is the second generation of a picked and mixed ancestry. The merry, the adventurous, often the desperate, always the brave, deserted the South and New England in 1849 to rush around the Horn or to try the perils of the plains. They found there a land already grown old in the hands of the Spaniards—younger sons of hidalgos and many of them of the best blood of Spain. To a great extent the pioneers intermarried with Spanish women; in fact, except for a proud little colony here and there, the old, aristocratic Spanish blood is sunk in that of the conquering race. Then there was an influx of intellectual French people, largely overlooked in the histories of the early days; and this Latin heaven has had its influence.

Brought up in a bountiful country, where no one really has to work very hard to live, nurtured on adventure, scion of a free and merry stock, the real, native Californian is a distinctive type; as far from the Easterner in psychology as the extreme Southerner is from the Yankee. He is easy going, witty, hospitable, lovable, inclined to be unmoral rather than immoral in his personal habits, and easy to meet and to know.

Above all there is an art sense all through the populace which sets it off from any other population of the country. This sense is almost Latin in its strength, and the Californian owes it to the haven of Latin blood. The true Californian lingers in the north; for southern California has been built up by "lungers" from the East and Middle West and is Eastern in character and feeling.

Almost has the Californian developed a racial physiology. He tends to size, to smooth symmetry of limb and trunk, to an erect, free carriage; and the beauty of his women is not a myth. The pioneers were all men of good body; they had to be to live and leave descendants. The bones of the weaklings who started for El Dorado in 1849 lie on the plains or in the hill-cemeteries of the mining camps. Heredity began it; climate has carried it on. All things that grow in California tend to become large, plump, luscious. Fruit trees, grown from cuttings of Eastern stock, produce fruit larger and finer, if coarser in flavor, than that of the parent tree. As the fruits grow, so the children grow. A normal, healthy, Californian woman plays out-of-doors from babyhood to old age. The mixed stock has given her that regularity of features which goes with a blend of bloods; the climate has perfected and rounded her figure; out-of-door exercise from earliest youth has given her a deep bosom; the cosmetic mists have made her complexion soft and brilliant. At the University of California, where the student body is nearly all native, the gymnasium measurements show that the girls are a little more than two inches taller than their sisters of Vassar and Michigan.

San Francisco's Beauty Show.

The greatest beauty-show on the continent was the Saturday afternoon matinee parade in San Francisco. Women in so-called "society" took no part in this function. It belonged to the middle class, but the "upper classes" have no monopoly of beauty anywhere in the world. It had grown to be independent of the matinees. From two o'clock to half-past five, a solid procession of Dianas, Hebes and Junos passed and repassed along the five blocks between Market and Powell and Sutter and Kearney—the "line" of San Francisco slang. Along the open-front cigar stores, characteristic of the town, gilded youth of the cocktail route gathered in knots to watch them. There was something Latin in the spirit of this ceremony—it resembled church parade in Buenos Ayres. Latin, too, were the gay costumes of the women, who dressed brightly in accord with the city and the climate. This gaiety of costume was the first thing which the Eastern woman noticed—and disapproved. Give her a year, and she, too, would be caught by the infection of daring dress.

In the parade of tall, deep bosomed, gleaming women, one caught the type and longed, sometimes for the sight of a more ethereal beauty—for the suggestion of soul within which belongs to a New England woman on whom a hard soil has bestowed a grudging beauty—for the mobility, the fire, which belongs to the Frenchwoman. The second generation of France was in this crowd, it is true; but climate and exercise had grown above their spiritual charm a cover of brilliant flesh. It was the beauty of Greece.

With such people, life was always gay. If the fairly Parisian gaiety did not display itself on the streets, except in the matinee parade, it was because the winds made open-air cafes disagreeable at all seasons of the year. The life careless went on indoors or in the hundreds of pretty estates—"ranches" the Californians called them—which fringe the city.

Famous Old Restaurants.

San Francisco was famous for its restaurants and cafes. Probably they were lacking at the top; probably the very best, for people who do not care how they spend their money, was not to be had. But they gave the best fare on earth, for the price, at a dollar, seventy-five cents, a half a dollar, or even fifteen cents.

If one should tell exactly what could be had at Coppa's for fifty cents or at the Fashion for, say thirty-five cents, no New Yorker who has not been there would believe it. The San Francisco French dinner and the San Francisco free lunch were as the Public Library to Boston or the stock yards to Chicago. A number of causes contributed to this. The country all about produced everything that a cook needs and that in abundance—the bay was an almost untapped fishing pond, the fruit farms came up to the very edge of the town, and the surrounding country produced in abundance fine meats, game, all cereals and all vegetables.

But the chefs who came from France in the early days and stayed because they liked this land of plenty were the head and front of it. They passed on their art to other Frenchmen or to the clever Chinese. Most of the French chefs at the biggest restaurants were born in Canton, China. Later the Italians, learning of this country where good food is appreciated, came and brought their own style. Householders always dined out one or two nights of the week, and boarding houses were scarce, for the unattached preferred the restaurants.

The eating was usually better than the surroundings. Meals that were marvels were served in tumble-down little hotels. Most famous of all the restaurants was the Poodle Dog. There have been no less than four establishments of this name, beginning with a frame shanty where, in the early days, a prince of French cooks used to exchange ragouts for gold dust. Each succeeding restaurant of the name has moved further downtown; and the recent Poodle Dog stands—stands or stood; one mixes his tenses queerly in writing of this city which is and yet is no more—on the edge of the Tenderloin in a modern five-story building. And it typified a certain spirit that there was in San Francisco.

For on the ground floor was a public restaurant where there was served the best dollar dinner on earth. At least, if not the best it ranked with the best, and the others were in San Francisco. There, especially on Sunday night, almost everyone went to vary the monotony of home cooking. Everyone who was anyone in the town could be seen there off and on. It was perfectly respectable. A man might take his wife and daughter to the Poodle Dog.

On the second floor there were private dining rooms, and to dine there, with one or more of the opposite sex, was risqué but not especially terrible. But the third floor—and the fourth floor—and the fifth! The elevator man of the Poodle Dog, who has held the job for many years and who never spoke unless spoken to, wore diamonds and was a heavy investor in real estate. There were others as famous in their way—the Zinkand, where, at one time, every one went after the theatre, and Tate's, which has lately bitten into that trade; the Palace Grill, much like the grills of Eastern hotels, except for the price; Delmonico's, which ran the Poodle Dog neck and neck to its own line; and many others, humbler but great at the price.

The Hotel De France.

Listen! O ye starved amidst plenty, to the tale of the Hotel de France. This restaurant stood on California street, just east of Old St. Mary's Church. One could throw a biscuit from its back windows into Chinatown. It occupied a big ramshackle house, which had been a mansion of the gold days. Louis, the proprietor, was a Frenchman of the Bas Pyrenees; and his accent was as thick as his peasant soups. The patrons were Frenchmen of the poorer class, or young and poor clerks and journalists who had discovered the delights of his roastery. The place exuded a genial gaiety, of which Louis, throwing out familiar jokes to right and left as he mixed salads and carried dishes, was the head and front.

First on the bill of fare was the soup mentioned before—thick and clean and good. Next, one of Louis' three cherubic little sons brought on a course of fish—sole, rock cod, flounders or smelt—with a good French sauce. The third course was meat. This came on en bloc; the waiter dropped in the center of each table a hot roast or boiled joint together with mustard pot and two big dishes of vegetables. Each guest manned the carving knife in turn and helped himself to his satisfaction. After that, Louis, with an air of ceremony, brought on a big bowl of excellent salad which he had mixed himself. For beverage, there stood by each plate a perfectly cylindrical pint glass filled with new watered claret. The meal closed with "fruit in season"—all that the guest cared to eat. I have lived a startling fact to close the paragraph—the price was fifteen cents!

If one wanted black coffee he paid five cents extra, and Louis brought on a beer glass full of it. Why he threw wine and charged extra for afternoon coffee was one of Louis' professional secrets.

Adulterated food at that price? Not a bit of it! The olive oil in the salad is pure, California product—why adulterate when he could get it so cheaply? The wine, too, was above reproach, for Louis made it himself. Every autumn he bought tons and tons of cheap Mission grapes, set up a press in his backyard, and had a little, festival vintage of his own. The fruit was small and inferior, but fresh, and Louis himself, in speaking of his business, said that he wished his guests would eat nothing but fruit, it came so cheap.

Hospitality and Club Life.

Hospitality was nearly a vice. As in the early mining days, if they liked the stranger the people took him in. At the first meeting the San Francisco man had him put up at the club; at the second, he invited him home to dinner. As long as the stranger stayed he was being invited to week end parties at ranches, to little dinners in this or that restaurant and to the houses of his new acquaintances, until his engagements grew beyond hope of fulfillment. Perhaps there was rather too much of this kind of thing. At the end of a fortnight a visitor with a pleasant smile and a good story left the place a wreck. This tendency ran through all grades of society—except, perhaps, the sporting people who kept the tracks and the fighting game alive. These also met the stranger—and also took him in.

Centres of man hospitality were the clubs, especially the famous Bohemian and the Family. The latter was an offshoot of the Bohemian; and it had been growing fast and vying with the older organization for the honor of entertaining pleasing and distinguished visitors.

The Bohemian Club, whose real founder is said to have been the late Henry George, was formed in the '70s by newspaper writers and men working in the arts or interested in them. It had grown to a membership of 750. It still kept for its nucleus painters, writers, musicians and actors, amateur and professional. They were a gay group of men, and hospitality was their avocation. Yet the thing which set this club off from all others in the world was the midsummer High Jinks.

The club owns a fine tract of redwood forest fifty miles north of San Francisco on the Russian River. There are two varieties of big trees in California: the Sequoia gigantea and the Sequoia sempervirens. The great trees of the Mariposa grove belong to the gigantea species. The sempervirens, however, reaches the diameter of 16 feet, and some of the greatest trees of this species are in the Bohemian Club grove. It lies in a cleft of the mountains: and up one hillside there runs a natural out of doors stage of remarkable acoustic properties.

In August the whole Bohemian Club, or such as could get away from business, went up to this grove and camped out for two weeks. On the last night they put on the Jinks proper, a great spectacle in praise of the forest with poetic words, music and effects done by the club. In late years this has been practically a masque or an opera. It cost about $10,000. It took the spare time of scores of men for weeks; yet these 750 business men, professional men, artists, newspaper workers, struggled for the honor of helping out on the Jinks; and the whole thing was done naturally and with reverence. It would not be possible anywhere else in this country; the thing which made it possible was the art spirit which is in the Californian. It runs in the blood.

The bonny, merry city—the good, gray city—O that one who has mingled the wine of her bounding life with the wine of his youth should live to write the obituary of Old San Francisco!

There are many ponderous tomes about San Francisco in the libraries of San Francisco, or rather there were, but there are few that will be remembered as long as the little book written by Will Irwin on "The City That Was." Let us hope that the preterit definite tense may be more indefinite than it was in the case of Ilium.

LATE VERSE.

My Lioness.

One night we were together, you and I,
And had unsown Assyria for a lair
Before the walls of Babylon rose in air.

Low, languid hills were heaped against the sky,
And white bones marked the walls of alkali,
When suddenly down the lion-path a sound,

The wild man-odor—then a crouch,
a bound,
And the frail thing fell quivering with a cry.

Your yellow eyes burned beautiful with light;
The dead man lay there open-eyed and white;

I roared one triumph over the desert wide,
Then stretched out, glad of the sands and satisfied;
And through the long, star-stilled Assyrian night,
I felt your body breathing by my side.

—Edwin Markham in August Cosmopolitan.

The Children.

Mother of many children I—sprung of my heart and my brain—
And some have been born in gladness and some have been born in pain.
But one has gone singing from out my door,
Never to come again.

Content and Ease and Comfort—they abide with me day by day;
They smooth my couch and place my chair as dutiful children may,
And Success and Power, my strong-limbed sons,
Stand ever to clear my way.

And these be the prudent children, the careful children and wise,
There was one, and only one, with a reckless dream in his eyes.
He who was one with the wind of the dawn,
And kin to the wood and the skies.

Faithful and fond are my children, and they tend me well, in sooth;
Success and Content and Power, good proof is mine of their truth,
But the name of him that I lost was Joy,
Yes, my first-born Joy of Youth.

'Well do my children guard me, jealous of this their right;
Carefully, soberly, ever by daylight and candlelight,
But, oh, for my prodigal Joy of Youth,
Somewhere out in the night.
—Theodosia Garrison in June Smart Set.

VANITY FAIR.

Cupid has been working overtime in San Francisco since the fire. Never has he reaped such a harvest as has come to his bow in the last three months. One of the surprising things following the earthquake was the unusual extraordinary increase in marriages. In fact, weddings by the score occurred hurriedly during the dread days while the fire was sweeping over the city. They were accounted for by the fact that many young women, contemplating matrimony, found themselves without protectors on account of the earthquake and fire. Their chivalrous swains called in the minister at once.

It was thought these marriages would cease as soon as affairs settled down to the normal. But the weddings increased. Young, middle-aged, and sometimes even juvenile couples, besieged the clerk, who issued marriage licenses for permits to wed until that official became the most overworked man in San Francisco.

In June, 1905, he thought he had made a record for San Francisco by issuing 398 licenses. But this year during the same month he wrote out 574, an increase of about 50 per cent. The fact, too, must be remembered that San Francisco's population is at least 35 per cent less than it was in June of last year.

July, too, shows an encouraging record, one that would greatly please President Roosevelt. For the first twenty days of the month there were issued 266 licenses, as against 172 during the same period of time last year.

Cupid is not confining his mischievous operations to San Francisco alone. He is working hard across the bay, and in Oakland has achieved even greater results than he has in this city. There during June he so enmeshed in the tangles of love 405 young couples that there was nothing for it but to go and get married. Last year he could induce only 175 pairs of boys and girls to embark on the dangerous sea of matrimony during June.

During July, also, the Oakland record for marriages kept up. For the first twenty days there were issued 236 licenses, as against 147 for a corresponding time last year.

Henry James, when he was last in this country, talked very frankly with his friend, Julian Hawthorne. Mr. James does not like the modernity of America, its confusion, its bigness. "I'm not accustomed to the extensive scale of things here," he said, "especially the extensive scale of the disagreeable things!" He spoke of the telephone with humorous disgust:

"These telephones—they pursue one everywhere. At the slightest pretext, one flies to the telephone, or no pretext—for the mere purpose of chatter! The English system of postal telegraphs, with its silent and sufficient promptness, is much preferable. But this morning, for instance, when I had just got out of bed, and was in the midst of my toilet, the bell of my telephone rang in my room—in my bedroom! It is regarded as a convenience, a luxury, and one is charged extra for it! It was a communication from a lady, who, at that hour, wished to tell me how she admired my books!"

Mr. James, one suspects, has little sympathy with the President:

"He seems to be a very good creature! He was very kind to me, invited me to tea, and so on. But I wasn't attracted to him. I had had some prejudice against him since the Cuban War—which I hated—in which he took such a prominent part. And his books—those dreadful books! And the way he has of talking to the people, his preachings to them, those platitudes, they seem so queer in a man in his position."

The very curious life which is led in Vanity Fair, the remarkable ideas prevailing there concerning law, the strange recoveries from mortal diseases among Vanity Fair's heroines, and the dreadful mortality among its villains as set forth by Vanity Fair's novelists, are thus summed up by Punch:

There is a murdered Baron in every country-house library.

A colonel (British) is a melancholy man with a Past; but when he smiles his rare smile the young widow may begin to hope.

A colonel (foreign) is a worthless adventurer.

A solicitor is a fatherly, white-haired man, who makes a decent income by sorting out changelings. He subsists chiefly on hasty cold collations, served in the libraries of noble clients.

To qualify for hospital work in the slums a newly married lady of title needs only (a) believe on rather shadowy evidence that her husband loves another, (b) attire herself in simple mourning, and (c) pack a few necessities in a small black bag. N. B.: Some authorities have it that she should in addition leave her rings on her dressing table, with the exception of a plain gold band hung by a string from her neck; but this qualification is probably optional.

Brain fever (a complaint unknown to your doctor or mine, but the usual accompaniment of domestic trouble in the mansions of the great) will invariably baffle the skill of an ordinary practitioner; but a medical baronet, arriving by special train, can cure it by coughing dryly and endorsing the treatment prescribed by the local talent.

A villain, if of good family, will eventually die a hero's death in Africa (or wherever copper-colored people happen to be giving trouble at the time of his tardy repentance).

A peer (newly married) is an unfortunate but faultlessly dressed individual who spends six months in the year hunting for his wife with the aid of incompetent detectives.

The proletariat consists solely of French maids and policemen.

To have the marriage ceremony performed in France declarations and innumerable documents have to be drawn up and signed. Even an elderly fiancé of sixty has to gain the consent of the head of his family before he is able to appear at the Mairie of his neighborhood with his bride.

Here is a list of the documents which the two young people must produce before they marry. The young man:

1. His birth certificate.
2. The consent of his father.
3. The consent of his mother.
4. His military certificate.
5. A certificate of the banns, with the name of the place of publication.
6. The names of the places where his and her parents live.

The girl must bring (supposing she is an orphan):

1. Her birth certificate.
2. A death certificate of her father.

Is it any wonder that a wholesale cause of immorality in France is a growing tendency of men and women to live together without the formality of the wedding ceremony, rather than go to the enormous trouble of collecting all the various documents which are now necessary to satisfy officialdom?

The Outlook's "Spectator," who is certainly not an unkindly critic, has been relieving his mind about new York's bad manners. He tells of a lady who returned to New York after a number of years' absence:

She had known New York well in the sixties and seventies, and believed it was about the best place in the world in which to be comfortable. But in the nineties she found the place very much changed, of course. Two or three days after her arrival she went out shopping, using the streetcars to go from place to place. After a few hours she returned to the friends she was visiting, very much flustered and filled with hot indignation. "Well," she said, "I have been insulted and treated with rudeness all the morning. I have had enough of New York. It is no home for me. I have been mauled and hauled about by crowds, and every conductor yelled at me, 'Step lively, step lively, lady,' and some even caught hold of me and jerked me on the car and then pushed me into the struggling crowd of passengers inside. 'Step lively,' indeed! 'Good old New York' is what we used to say in what we called the 'God-forsaken West,' but if this is what New York has come to I shall go to the West, where there is consideration, or to Washington, where there is courtesy." She cut her visit short in the great city and never returned.

The "Spectator" then comments on her attitude:

The lady's complaint was not entirely unreasonable. This everlasting "Step lively" does not expedite matters in the slightest degree. It flusters the timid and uncertain and angers those who desire to be courteously treated. There is no doubt in the world that New York has the reputation, deservedly or not, of being a fearfully rude place. Politeness is lower perhaps than in very many other places, notably in the West and South. The Spectator knows full well that when he stays abroad or in the country for a long time and gets back to New York he finds the shoving and hustling are intolerable.

The latest discovery in Germany is—camping! R. Julien writes about it in the Berlin Tageblatt as "die neueste Sommer-Romantik."

"Like so many new things," he says, "the camping summer amusement comes to us from the Far West by way of France. American youths it was, pupils, students, who first introduced it." The Americans, he goes on to inform his countrymen, convinced that the comforts of life in cities tend toward effeminacy, make a regular sport of camping. Not only during the summer vacation, but often over Sunday they go—alone, in couples, in families, in clubs—to forest or shore. Sleeping in the open air steels their nerves, while rod and rifle provide additional recreation. Mr. Julien suspects that "Trapper romantik" and inherited ancestral love of adventure throw light on this American specialty. Possibly, he adds, the paucity of inns has something to do with it. A German never takes a walk or excursion that does not end at a tavern or a beer garden. Supply follows the demand, and inns are so abundant, even in out-of-the-way places, that tenting seems a superfluity, if not an absurdity. For students, who, most of all, might feel inclined to "rough it" under canvas, dozens of special inns have actually been built in the mountainous regions of Germany.

American life insurance originated in England, at a breakfast party. The notable guests were Robert Browning, Elizabeth Barrett, Miss Mitford and Barry Cornwall. The host was John Kenyon, the poet. There was present, also, Eliza Wright, an American who had recently landed in England in the humble guise of a book agent. A discussion on life insurance was begun by Barry Cornwall, who pronounced it "the greatest humbug in Christendom," and Wright came back to America to correct abuses. He succeeded here, after great labor, and became the real founder of American life insurance. There be San Franciscans who would breathe a fervent "amen" to Cornwall's remark if he included fire insurance in his pronouncement.

"A marvelous man, President Roosevelt," said an enthusiastic American to John Morley. "I hardly know how one would describe him." "It is difficult," mused the distinguished statesman. "Perhaps he might be called a cross between St. George and St. Vitus."

STAGE GOSSIP.

Blanche Bates is to reappear in New York, August 6th, in David Belasco's play, "The Girl of the Golden West."

When H. B. Irving comes to America next fall he will have in his repertoire the following: "Mauricetto," "Paolo and Francesca" and "The Sin of David," three new plays. Also three of his father's great successes, "Charles I," "The Bells" and "The Lyons Mail."

Olga Nethersole is to make a tour of the Pacific Coast in the early part of the coming season.

The new Astor Theater at Broadway and Forty-fifth street, New York, will be opened on Thursday, August 30th. The house will be opened by Miss Annie Russell, who will appear for the first time as Puck in "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

Edna Wallace Hopper is to appear as leading woman with Lew Fields when the new company at his Herald Square Theater, New York, is established. To accept the position Mrs. Hopper has cancelled a forty weeks' audiville tour.

Rosenthal, Gabrilovitch, Lhevinne and Paderewski will come from Europe, and to them will be added the Americans, Joseffy, Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler and Olga Samaro. Because of this competition Gadowsky, Achman, Josef Hofmann and Haroldauer have postponed their next American tours another year. Three great violinists will appear—Kubelik, Saye and Caesar Thompson; and Leacavallo will come with the famous Scala Orchestra from Milan.

Russo, the famous Italian tenor, is singing in Portland, Oregon, at "popular prices."

After a four weeks' engagement in New York, beginning September 7th, David Warfield will make a tour of the United States in "The Music Master."

Ferris Hartman, the comic opera comedian, formerly of the San Francisco Tivoli, now singing at Idora Park, Oakland, is about to retire from the stage to engage in business in San Rafael.

Katherine Grey, has been appearing at the Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, as Mary Quayle in "The Christian," with Franklin Underwood as John Storm.

The stock company at Morosco's Los Angeles Theater is appearing in "Romeo and Juliet."

"When Johnny Comes Marching Home," the military comic opera, has made a great hit at Idora Park, Oakland.

Martin Harvey is to revive "The Corsican Brothers" in London.

Beerbohm Tree is to make an elaborate revival of "Macbeth" in London.

"The Student King," De Koven's new opera, was recently presented at the Studebaker Theater, Chicago. Theaters pronounce it a big success.

Grace George's play for next season has been rechristened "Dolly Dresses." "The Richest Girl in the World" was thought by Mr. Brady to be too much of a financial flavor, as he believes the public is becoming tired of plays about money.

The new Alcazar Theater, class A and fireproof, to be erected by Messrs. Lasco & Mayer on the southwest corner of Sutter and Steiner streets, will cost $150,000. The seating capacity will be 1,500 without crowding. The exterior is designed in old Spanish style and the interior ornamentation will be Moorish. White Whittlesey will own the playhouse in the latter part of October.

Frank Pixley's new musical play, "The Great Mogul," which the librettist completed in Japan, will be produced next November.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

The new queen of Spain has been baptized three times, once as an infant, when she was taken into the Presbyterian church, a second time when she was made a member of the church of England and lastly a few weeks ago when she was baptized as a member of the Roman Catholic church.

Mistral, the famous Provencale poet, is engaged in building his own tomb. A great deal of time and much care are being spent on its construction, for in the poet's own words, "Our tomb is the dwelling in which we abide the longest and it should be as beautiful as possible."

Geronimo, the famous Apache outlaw and chief, has spent the last two years in dictating his autobiography. S. M. Barrett, Superintendent of Schools at Lawton, Oklahoma, has been the medium through which the chief, now seventy-seven years of age, has told the story of his life and that of his people.

Lady Curzon, wife of the former Viceroy of India, is dead. Lady Curzon was Miss Mary Leiter, daughter of the late Levi Z. Leiter, of Chicago. She was married in London in 1895. Daisy Leiter, one of the sisters of Lady Curzon, is married to the Earl of Suffolk and Berkshire. Nancy Leiter, another sister, is married to Major C. P. Campbell of the British Army. Lady Curzon was in her own right the possessor of $3,000,000.

Russell Sage died suddenly July 22 at his country home at Lawrence, L. I. He would have celebrated his ninetieth birthday on August 4. The veteran financier left a fortune exceeding $100,000,000. He had never contributed to charity, but it is reported that he has willed a large sum for philanthropic purposes. In the 40's and 50's Sage was active in politics, serving two terms in Congress as a Whig. The bulk of his vast fortune was made in loans on negotiable securities and in railroad investments.

With last week's issue of the Nation, Wendell Phillips Garrison lays down its editorship. His own announcement of his retirement is as follows: "The need of a prolonged rest after forty-one years of unrelaxed application in the service of the Nation constrains me, from the present date, to relinquish the editorial direction of this journal. With extreme reluctance, and with far profounder feelings, I take a grateful leave of my readers and of all my cherished and indispensable associates." Mr. Garrison's successor is Hammond Lamont, formerly of the faculty at Harvard and Brown, and for the past six years managing editor of the Evening Post. With him will be associated Paul Elmer More, literary editor of the Evening Post.

Colonel Picquart, the man who above all others is responsible for Dreyfus' vindication, will return to the French army as a brigadier general. Picquart, then a lieutenant colonel, was chief of the secret intelligence bureau of the French army from 1894 to 1897, or at the time Dreyfus was watched, arrested and convicted. He was a firm believer in the guilt of the ex-artillery officer until the late summer of 1897. Then he unexpectedly discovered that the bordereau, on which Dreyfus had been convicted, had in reality been written by Esterhazy. He laid the matter before General Billot, then minister of war, and suddenly was transferred to Tunis. He continued his efforts in Dreyfus' behalf, however, and was arrested for showing army papers tending to establish the latter's innocence to members of the French senate. He was convicted by court martial, sentenced to solitary confinement in a prison and finally publicly degraded and dismissed from the army. With Dreyfus he will now return to military service with advanced rank.

One of the greatest problems that now faces the San Francisco Postoffice authorities is the distribution of the mails to the right place. Before the fire every clerk in the office had the routes on which the large firms were situated well in mind, and as soon as a letter came for one of the well-known houses it went into the proper pigeon-hole with unerring accuracy. Now all that is changed. Those firms that were formerly neighbors are far apart, and the whole system has to be learned anew, which is slow work.

A distinct novelty is promised at the Orpheum this week. The juvenile comedian, Edward Clark, and his "Six Winning Widows," will present a miniature racing musical comedy. The only Billy Van will be on the program. He promises many amusing songs and anecdotes. Carter and Blufford will make their first appearance in this city. They are accomplished singers and carry a wealth of costumes and scenery. The Lucania trio Cuban acrobats, direct from the New York Hippodrome, will present their equilibristic combination act. They are marvels of agility, suppleness and daring. The Basque quartet, French operatic vocalists, will change their selections. The Hickman Brothers, dancing and talking comedians, will vary their specialty and Ida O'Day, the singing comedienne and banjoist, will be heard in new numbers. The Marco Twins and the Orpheum Motion Pictures will complete the program.

LITERARY NOTES.

The Election of Senators.

How do men come to membership in the United States Senate, the dominant branch of Congress? What considerations led the framers of the Constitution to place the election of Senators in the hands of the State Legislatures? What are the causes that have brought about the recent movement for popular election of Senators? George H. Haynes, Ph. D., in "The Election of Senators," answers these questions in a handsome volume of 300 odd pages. Cartoonists, special writers and socialists who sneeringly call the Senate a millionaires' club are reminded that that is exactly what the Convention of 1787, in selecting our present method of electing Senators, hoped it would be. As the author of the original motion put it, legislatures having "more sense of character" than the people at large, would select men distinguished for their rank in life and their weight in property, and forming a body bearing as strong a resemblance to the British House of Lords as possible. Roger Sherman, who seconded the original motion, declared: "The people immediately should have as little to do as may be about the government." This was the spirit of the convention. Professor Haynes gives at length the arguments for and against direct vote. The question is of pressing interest, as thirty-one States have made formal application to Congress for the submission of an amendment to secure popular election of Senators, and an interstate convention to further the same object may be held this year. The State of Oregon has hit upon a plan which, if generally adopted, would obviate the necessity of a constitutional amendment. Briefly, the voters indicate their preference for Senator at the primary election, thus leaving the legislature no choice in the matter.

Local Government.

"Local Government in Counties, Towns and Villages," by John A. Fairlie, Ph.D., is to be commended. While the author shows the process of development of local institutions, he is more concerned with present conditions. The variations of administration in the different States compels encyclopedic treatment, but the subjects are given comprehensive consideration. Professor Fairlie believes rural communities have too many elective officers, and that the most important problem in our State government today is that of organizing the mass of minor offices into a definite system.

"The Heart of a Rose."

The author of "The Heart of a Rose," William Marabell, tells us confidently that it is his ambition to have the story staged, therefore its sub-title, "a narrative drama." There are doubtless managers who will attempt the production if Mr. Marabell uses the means he probably employed in publishing the book—pay all the bills. "The Heart of a Rose" is a wishy-washy, milk-and-waterish tale, written in a very proper, young-lady-like manner.

Published by The Klebold Press; $1.00.

A Poem with a Purpose.

Nathan Haskell Dole in "The Building of the Organ" has attempted that scarcely understandable task—the poem with a purpose. Mr. Dole believes his work to be a prototype; may it remain the first, and last, of its kind. Slavery in Russia was abolished by the stroke of a pen, he argues, wherefore, then, may not the poet twang the lyre until the nations consent to go no more to war. If they could compel the war-makers to read all their peace-poems, perhaps, after all, it would be an effective means. They would consent to anything to escape the ordeal.

"YOU SABE ME."

(By Wallace Irwin.)

Based on a True Story of the San Francisco Fire.

I.

Believe in Chinese exclusion?
Well, maybe I did before
The day of the great confusion
When the quake in its wrath upthrew
The roots of the town, and the Reaper
Mowed us with flame—then I saw
The faith of a race that's deeper Than any Exclusion law.

Yes, I took in the politicians'
Rhetoric, buncomb air;
Who, from their fat positions,
Mentioned "the white man's share,"
The white man's right to bully
The race with the braided queue—
Kick 'em from boat to alley,
Cheat 'em in bench, in pew.

Bong was the name of our coolie;
Long-fingered, Canton boy—
When at his job with a truly
Pagan sort of joy,
Serving-man, cook and waiter,
Roust-about, general slob—
That's what the Chinese hater
Calls "taking a white man's job."

We lived in the Rincon section,
Alice, the kid and I.
Bong was the home protection,
And held his position high.
Gentle he was with the baby—
Never was cross or grim,
Used to explain "Oh, maybe
I catchem 'll gal like him!"

When I left for the office early
In the era before the Wreck,
After I'd kissed my girlie
And the kid hung close to my neck,
Then I'd chuckle to Bong, "You
Chinker,
Take care of 'em both, d'ye see?"
So the coolie would grin like a tinker
And answer "You sabe me!"

Bong, though his head was level,
His conscience ironed to a gloss,
Rather worshipped the Devil
And sneered at the "Christian joss."
He learned from the heathen sages
A budget of useful lore,
And I found him investing his wages
In a Chinese general store.

Those years that I spent with Alice
On the hills of our merriment!
Every man's house was his palace,
(We're living now in a tent)
By the sweet bay we slumbered,
From the gay height looked down—
Who thought that our days were numbered,
And hell was beneath the town?

II.

I was away in Seattle;
The earthquake rumbled through
Like the jar of a mighty battle—
Then the news of the horror grew.
"San Francisco is shaken—
Half of the buildings down—
Dead from the ruins taken—
Fire is sweeping the town!"

How I tore to the station,
Drunk with a man's despair;
Chaos was on creation—
My wife and my child out there!
We squeezed in the trains like cattle
Packed in the slaughter-stall;
And when we pulled out of Seattle
The night was beginning to fall.

Traveling men and sailors,
Millionaires, merchants, sports,
Two-penny clerks and tailors,
Touts from the Coast resorts,
Spoke of their homes like brothers
Bonded in grief—and when I prayed, "God pity the mothers!"
A gambler whispered, "Amen!"

Oakland! A pall of terror
Blinded the sun on high;
The bay, like a broken mirror,
Glared to the smoking sky.
Tattered and smoke-bereft Crowds upon crowds poured through,
Limping, insane, disheveled—
And the glare of the city grew.

III.

Day was short. And the darkness
Out of the smoke-cloids fell.
The ferry spire stood black in the fire
Like a crag at the mouth of hell.
All night long swung the ferries,
Listed and cramped and crammed,
And all night long came the fleeing throng
Like the hosts of the haunted damned.

Twenty-four hours at the ferries
I searched the mad throng through.
Haggard and wan I looked upon,
But never a face I knew.
Beggars, burdened with riches,
Muttered and toiled ahead—
I called aloud in the face of the crowd
Who looked with the eyes of the dead.

Then some one spoke from the clamor
With a voice that I seemed to know,
"They are safe back there on Port-mouth Square—
I saw them an hour ago.
They were warm under cover.
Close to the Monument,
It wasn't so bad, for the Chinatown lad
Had stretched up a sheet like a tent.

"He had brought them food from the ruins,
And seemed to be keeping house.
Squat on his heels he was cocking their meals—
The Kid was wrapped in his blouse.
Bong's face was black from the burning,
But his grin it was good to see,
When I called from the throng. Take care of 'em, Bong!"
And he answered, "You sabe me!"

This was my neighbor's story.
And well you may understand How I could not speak till the tears from my cheek
Splashed over his outstretched hand;
And of all the pure Christian blessings
Which pulpit and church employ,
I hope one sped to the pig-tailed head
Of my heathen coolie-boy!

IV.

One night more at the ferry.
I could see her, heaven be blessed;
Out of the mob she came with a sob
And fainted away on my breast.
Bong sat near with the baby
Fast asleep on his knee,
And he said as he smiled and looked at the child,
"I fetchum—you sabe me!"

Scotsmen are celebrating the fourth centenary of the birth of George Buchanan, scholar, historian, controver-sialist and the best Latin poet of his age. Buchanan was tutor to Mary Queen of Scots and to her son James, afterward James I of England. One day he caused himself to be made king of Scotland, and this was the way of it: Having observed in James a tendency to too ready acquiescence, he drew up a paper for the royal pupil to sign. James did so at once without having read it. The document happened to be a transfer of the royal authority to Buchanan for fifteen days, and no sooner had the poet got it into his possession than he began to play the monarch, even before the king himself. James thought the man a lunatic until the instrument was produced by which he had signed away his sovereignty. This incident was used by the worthy preceptor to illustrate the day's lesson on the responsibilities of monarchs.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A teacher in one of the country schools, says Lippincott's, had a class of young children in mathematics before her. The examples were in addition, and she propounded this question: "Now, children, if I lay four eggs on the desk, and Sam," pointing to a reckless-face boy at the head of the class, "should lay three, how many would there be?"

The bad boy, who was at the foot of the class, had been listening intently, and shouted out, "Go on, Sam, make her up. She can't do it."

Colonel A. A. Pope, says the Sun, builder of automobiles, was in San Francisco during the earthquake period. Driven from his hotel, he sought other quarters, and finding an auto standing in the street asked its lone occupant to drive him to another hotel. "Machine's busted," was the hauffeur's laconic remark. "Oh, I now all about automobiles," said Colonel Pope affably, "let me see—." "You do, hey?" said a gruff voice at his elbow. Colonel Pope turned to regard a burly sergeant of infantry with a squad of leather-faced soldiers at his back. "We need men like you," continued the sergeant, "so you'll have to come with us. Step lively." Colonel Pope stepped and spent the next six days repairing automobiles for the military authorities.

A young German saved a girl from drowning. When he brought her shore her father said: "Noble-minded youth, we owe you a debt of gratitude. A hundred thousand marks or your daughter's hand—choose! Which shall it be?"

The youth, who was no less wise than brave, thought to himself that if he took the daughter he would some day get the money also and accordingly without a moment's hesitation he answered: "I choose your daughter." "A wise choice," said the old father. "I could not have given you the 100,000 marks, for I am only a poor cobbler, but you shall have the girl, and that gladly. Join hands, dear children, and receive my blessing."

A San Francisco writer tells this incident of the fire: "I happened upon one of the victims of the fire sitting at the site of his old home, his hat pulled over his eyes, loafing and looking down over the miles of ghastly ruins where in spots the fire still smoldered. The horror was hardly more than a week old, yet presently this man fetched a deep yawn, stretching his arms abroad. 'Gee whiz!' he exclaimed, 'I wish something would happen. This is getting tedious.'"

A huckster, coming out of a patron's house one day, saw a little boy feeding apples to his horse. Pleased at seeing the animal getting an excellent meal at no cost to himself, the man patted the boy on the head and said:

"That's right; always be good to animals. And where did you buy those pretty apples?"

"I didn't buy them," the boy answered. "I took them out of your wagon."

A Philadelphia pastor was noted for the dryness of his discourse. One Sunday morning the old gentleman preached a sermon so amazingly long and dull that the congregation diminished one by one until only the janitor and himself were left. But the clergyman, apparently unconscious of all this, kept right on until the janitor, seeing no prospect of relief, finally came in also and, handing the keys to the minister, said: "I'm off. You can lock up the church when you're through."

Once there was a dying man who was too cautious even to make his peace with Providence.

"Do you renounce the devil and all his works?" the minister said to the man.

And the dying man replied in a weak, hesitating voice:

"Please don't ask me that. I'm going to a strange country and I don't want to make myself enemies."

A traveler in Pennsylvania arrived late one night at a small village hotel and asked for a room. He was told that the only vacant one was next to that of a very nervous man whom he must be careful not to disturb. After going to his room the newcomer thoughtlessly let fall one of his shoes; then, recalling the warning he had received, placed the other very carefully on the floor. He had put out the light and retired when there was a knock on his door. Opening it, he faced the nervous occupant of the adjoining room, who demanded excitedly:

"Why in thunder don't you take off that other shoe?"

When the late Senator Wolcott first went to Colorado he and his brother opened a law office at Idaho Springs under the firm name of "Ed. Wolcott & Bro." Later the partnership was dissolved. The future Senator packed his few assets, including the sign that had hung outside of his office, upon a burro and started for Georgetown, a mining town farther up in the hills. Upon his arrival he was greeted by a crowd of miners who critically surveyed him and his outfit. One of them looking first at the sign that hung over the pack, then at Wolcott, and finally at the donkey, ventured:

"Say, stranger, which of you is Ed?"

An absent minded woman one Sunday morning walked into church, took a front seat and joined in the service vigorously. Then the collection basket was passed to her, and, putting a coin into it, she looked about. She cast glances in every direction, her mind cleared, and an expression of amazement overspread her face. She got up. She hurried down the aisle. She overtook the man with the collection basket. "I'm in the wrong church," she whispered, and, taking out the coin she had put in, she hurried forth.

Miss Clara Clemens, Mark Twain's daughter, was talking at Atlantic City about entertaining. "Tact," she said, "is essential to good entertaining. I once dined at a house where the hostess had no tact. Opposite me sat a modest, quiet man. This man suddenly turned as red as a lobster and fell into a fit of confusion on hearing his hostess say to her husband: 'How inattentive you are, Joe. You must look after Mr. Blank better. He's helping himself to everything.'"

William James Connors, the Buffalo newspaper proprietor and freight contractor, has a beautiful home out on the edge of the city. His house is surrounded by many acres of lawn. A year or two ago his gardener planted foliage plants on a slope on the lawn in great letters that spelled "William James Connors." "Dear me," said one of the social leaders of the town as she was driving by, peering through her lorgnette, "the poor man must think he is a railway station."

The late Governor Robinson was examining a witness, and the question arose as to the true definition of a miracle. Endeavoring to get an answer by illustration, Governor Robinson said: "If a man should fall from a three-story window, striking his head on a brick sidewalk, then get up and walk away, what would that be?"

"That would be an accident," quietly replied the witness.

"Well, if the same man should fall the next day from the same window, striking his head again on the brick sidewalk, and walk away unhurt, what would that be?"

"That would be a coincidence," said the witness.

The lawyer smiled, and then said, with the complacency of one sure of his victory: "And if the third day the same man should fall from the same three-story window on the same brick sidewalk and strike his head, and then rise and walk off, what would you call that?"

"The same man?"

"Yes."

"The same window?"

"Yes."

"And fall on the same sidewalk?"

"Yes."

"I should call it a habit."

The Soane Museum in England contains a cork model of the Colosseum. The late keeper, Mr. Birch, was showing a party of American visitors over the museum, and mentioned that this was "made in cork."

"That is curious," said one of the ladies, "we are just going to visit some friends there."

"I mean, madam," he explained, "that this model was made out of cork."

"That is still more curious," she replied; "our friends live just a little way out of Cork."

Messrs. Henry Kahn & Co., The Ocularium, formerly located under the Chronicle building, have pleasure in informing their patrons and the public in general that they have secured convenient and well-equipped premises at No. 1309 Van Ness avenue (between Bush and Sutter streets). The filling of oculist's prescriptions will be made a specialty in the Ocularium's new premises, where the daintiest and most practical of framed and frameless spectacles and eyeglasses will be fitted by expert opticians. In their new establishment, Messrs. Henry Kahn & Co. will continue to stock all kinds of scientific instruments, together with an extensive variety of photographic cameras, supplies and novelties. As was the case in the old premises, at the Ocularium will be found every desirable requisite for the beginner or advanced amateur in photography, and that necessary characteristic of photographic stocks, freshness, will be emphasized.

SHOPPING IN SAN FRANCISCO.

Although San Francisco has the appearance of a mining camp, San Franciscans are not demanding calancty goods from the merchants, but are huying the best. It took the local merchants hut a few days to feel the pulse of the disorganized community. Their first surprise was to find the people waiting at their doors before they could open them for business. The next surprise in trade when men and women objected to low-grade stuff. Clothiers, like all others in trade, have a cheerful story to tell. An astonishing number of high-grade ready-made suits for men are being sold. Not all the tailors have re-established in business as yet, and the men who formerly were entirely in the hands of them are now customers for smart ready-made clothing, to the enthusiastic delight of the men who have it for sale. This is the time for those who decry the high and higher heels that a majority of women have been wearing to sleep well o' nights. The shoemen say that there never was such a demand for common-sense footwear. A pilgrimage of a mile or two, or several of them, on wiggling two or three inch heels is not a pretty spectacle. The very pain that is the penalty of this foolishness sends the vainest woman to the nearest shoe shop. Quite naturally, those who have shoes to sell are as sure of patronage as those who hake bread, and are in consequence reaping an unusual harvest. To a man the shoe dealers say their coming orders will include plenty of high-priced stock, because there is the demand for it. Milliners are coming into their own. Re-establishing their business has been a little slow, as every one of the best known dealers in this line was hurned out, wholesale and retail, and hundreds of the smaller ones as well, so that the problem getting fresh stock was not so easily solved. The demand for hats was perhaps not so insistent as for other commodities.

Army and Navy.

General James Buchanan, U. S. A., who has been in command of the department of Visayas, Philippine Islands, and who was retired on May 31st, came in last Saturday on the Transport Logan, and left in a few days for Washington, D. C.

General Arthur MacArthur, U. S. A., returned on the liner Manchuria, on Thursday, from the Orient, where he went in February, 1905, as an observer of the Russo-Japanese war. Since the close of the war, General MacArthur accompanied by Mrs. MacArthur and their son, Lieutenant Douglas MacArthur, U. S. A., aide-camp, has been traveling in India and China. General MacArthur will re-assume command of the Pacific Division and General Greely, U. S. A., temporarily in command, since the retirement of General Samuel Sumner, U. S. A., will be on leave at once, taking up his leave which was interrupted by his return here at the time of the fire. At the expiration of his leave, General Greely will go to St. Louis to assume command of the Northern Division, vice General Henry C. Corbin, U. S. A., who retires on September 9th of this year.

General A. D. Greely, U. S. A., Mrs. Greely and Captain Frank L. Vinn, U. S. A., acting aide-de-camp, returned on Monday last from a ten days' trip to the north, General Greely having made a tour of inspection of the Department of the Columbia.

Colonel John C. Dent, U. S. A., formerly Lieutenant Colonel of the Twenty-fourth Infantry, arrived on the transport Logan last week, and found on reaching here that his promotion awaited him. He will take the vacancy left as Colonel of the Fourteenth Infantry by General Jocelyn's promotion.

Major Samson L. Faison, U. S. A., whose promotion dates from June 30, as been assigned to the Twenty-fourth Infantry, U. S. A., stationed in the Philippines. Major Faison will remain on duty in the quartermaster general's office until December 31, when he will join the regiment to which he is assigned.

Major John W. Ruckman, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., who has recently been promoted to his present rank, has been ordered to the Presidio of San Francisco for duty as one of the fire commissioners. He is now at Fort DuPont, Delaware, and will arrive here in about a fortnight.

Major Philip Wales, Medical Department, U. S. A., who has been surgeon of the post at Fort William McKinley, near Manila, arrived on the transport Logan on Saturday on four months' leave.

Major J. A. Gaston, First Cavalry, U. S. A., Captain John F. Madden, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., Captain Julius N. Kilian, Commissary, U. S. A., Lieutenant Henry R. Richmond, First Cavalry, U. S. A., Lieutenant Henry H. Scott, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Lieutenant Hugh S. Johnson, First Cavalry, U. S. A., have been granted six months' leave by the War Department to engage in relief work in San Francisco.

Captain John Conklin, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., came from the Philippines on the transport Logan to prepare for his examination for promotion.

Captain George A. Nugent, U. S. A., quartermaster of the Presidio of San Francisco, has been granted fifteen days leave of absence, to take effect August 10th.

Captain Eugene T. Wilson, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., who is so well known here, has been ordered, upon the completion of the course of instruction at the School of Submarine Defense, Fort Totten, New York, to repair to Washington, D. C., to report to the Chief of Artillery for assignment to temporary duty in his office.

Captain Charles P. George, Sixteenth Infantry, U. S. A., who arrived in charge of the guard prisoners on the transport Logan last week, will remain in this country to spend his leave.

Captain Guy T. Scott, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., is transferred from the 85th Co. Coast Artillery, stationed at Fort Casey, Washington, to the 44th Co., Coast Artillery, stationed at Fort Washington, Maryland. He will join his company about October 15th. Captain Scott's wife was formerly Miss Leila Voorhies, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Alfred Hunter Voorhies of this city.

Captain Henry O. Bisset, U. S. M. C., who has been at the Mare Island Naval Hospital, is now at Fort Bayard, New Mexico, for further treatment.

Captain Edmund D. Shortlidge, assistant surgeon, U. S. A., has been relieved from duty at Camp Overton, Mindanao, P. I., and ordered to proceed to Jolo, P. I.

Lieutenant Edmund L. Zane, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., now in camp near Three Rivers, California, is detailed for duty in connection with the "Progressive Military Map" of the United States.

Lieutenant Rollo F. Anderson, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., has been detailed for duty in connection with the "Progressive Military map of the United States."

Mrs. L. H. Bash (formerly Miss Bertha Runkle), wife of Captain Bash, Seventh Infantry, U. S. A., is at present the guest of her mother, Mrs. L. L. Runkle, at the latter's home in the Catskills. Mrs. Bash will rejoin her husband in the Philippines during the fall and will, en route, visit San Francisco.

SAN FRANCISCO.
April 18, 1906.

O fateful dawn, destruction in thy train,
O fearful day, when nature drew the key
That set the elemental furies free;
O might of death, come thou not thus again!
A little while ago, and she did reign
The hill-throned Empress of the Western Sea;
Her sceptre now is fallen; misery
Her mantle, and her cruel crown is pain.

Ye strange Titanic forces past control
Shall we bow down in fear, a weakling race?
Well can the earthquake from its hut-tress'd place
A fortress hurl; but not the human soul:
And unto them who staunchly suffer.
Fate
Shall not avail to bar life's Golden Gate.

The temporary St. Francis Hotel, in Union Square Park, across the street from the hotel is open for business. C. C. Loomis of Los Angeles has the honor of being the first guest to register. When the Palace was first opened in the seventies the late Senator Leland Stanford was its first registered guest, while in the old St. Francis William H. Crocker was the first person to register. The temporary St. Francis has accommodations for 200 guests. The guests will get their meals across the street in the basement of the old hotel.

H. P. Flannery, who had the Richelieu saloon at the gore lot at Market, Geary and Kearny streets before the fire, has leased the property and will erect on the lot a seven-story Class A building. Ten years ago the New York Life Insurance Company offered $300,000 for the property. Two or three years later the Equitable Life offered $400,000. The Mutual Savings Bank, a few months later, was willing to give $450,000. When their offer was rejected they built their bank structure on the adjoining lot.

The San Francisco Savings Union is now installed in the old Parrott building at the corner of California and Montgomery streets. This old stone structure, one of the few landmarks now in San Francisco which dates back to the fifties, escaped with little damage from the earthquake and fire. It housed the Wells-Fargo Company in the picturesque days and was for many years the home of the Pacific Union Club. The stones of which it is built were brought from China.

Next Sunday Go to Byron Hot Springs.—You can leave Friday afternoon or Saturday morning, returning Sunday afternoon or Monday morning. Two days at the springs, and the entire expense of the trip is $7.50. This includes the railway fare, transportation from railway station to hotel and return, a delightful ride of two and a half miles, accommodations at the beautiful Byron Hot Springs Hotel, and use of the wonderful mineral baths, all for $7.50. Try it.

Cockney Mercy and Crocodile Tears.

The non-liability manifesto of the crooked cockney companies last week did not meet with the reception which their managers evidently anticipated. It not only produced no consternation, but seemed to be considered in the light of a bluff. After waiting a decent interval, the cockney companies therefore supplemented their manifesto with another, in which, while liability is not acknowledged, they mercifully offer to be charitable to the poorer ones among their policyholders. In this the crooked cockney companies resemble one of the crooked sauerkraut companies, the Rhine and Moselle. This concern owes several million dollars to its policyholders; it also refuses to pay its debts, but qualifies its refusal by feelingly promising to "make them a present" if they will be good and not bring suit. Up to date the policyholders of the sauerkraut companies have refused with indignation these Teutonic alms.

In Manifesto Two the cockney companies say that they have a number of policyholders whose claims will not exceed five hundred dollars, and add: "As to such claimants, and also in those cases in which fire did not start upon the premises as a result of the earthquake, and in which the property was not destroyed or seriously damaged by the earthquake, the companies have concluded to waive the earthquake clause and to adjust and settle such losses." To account for this remarkable move, the companies apologetically say: "It is their desire to relieve the possible necessities of their small policyholders." They add: "The companies are justified in paying their policyholders what would otherwise be eaten up in attorneys' fees, court costs, and other legal expenses."

It is quite evident that these companies are somewhat alarmed at the reception of their repudiation of liability. They see little prospect for compromise, and that they are going to have a fight on their hands. Such being the case, they have determined to sow dissension and division in the ranks of the policyholders, by alluring those whose property had little or no earthquake damage to hope for a settlement without a suit.

As for those policyholders "whose claims do not exceed five hundred dollars," we would advise them to settle under the terms of this magnanimous offer. They have nothing to lose by it, and everything to gain. As for all others, we advise them not to be affected by this hypocritical pretense of charity, or to be lulled with the false hope that the companies will enlarge the scope of their offer of settlement. They will not do so unless they are forced to. Still, as they are already showing signs of cowardice, it is quite evident that a good hammering will make them back down. We therefore advise the policyholders of the crooked cockney companies not to be dazzled by this very little gold brick, but to go on and perfect their incorporation. When they do so, and when they take steps to publish throughout the world the manner in which these companies have repudiated their liabilities, we think that the repudiating companies will issue another manifesto largely extending the number of policyholders with whom they desire to compromise on something like an honest basis.

We may add that so long a time now has elapsed since the great calamity of April that the people have got over the love-feast snap. We are all of us now down to cases and some of us to hard-pan. We do not want charity; we want our due. We do not want hot air; we want coin. We do not want sympathy; we want our policies paid. When these crooked cockney corporations and these crooked sauerkraut companies, which have been thriving on our good money, come over here and inform us that they will not pay their honest debts, but that they will give us a little money in charity, they are going rather too far. All we ask of these cockney gentry and these sauerkraut freiherrns is not to pity us, but to pay us.

Give us our money and get out!

The Coming Congressional Campaign.

Even the most enthusiastic Republican organs in the East speak guardedly of the coming Congressional fight. The independent Republican papers speak somewhat apprehensively. The independent Democratic papers, if they may be called so—such as the Springfield Republican and the Nation—draw dark horoscopes for the Republican candidates. They fear that Hearst is going to carry New York; they say the Republican machine in Pennsylvania is smashed; that there is a hopeless split in the Republican ranks in Iowa; that the American Federation of Labor is attempting to defeat some of the most prominent Congressmen, including Speaker Cannon; and that the next House is going to be Democratic.

What is the truth of the matter? We might as well admit candidly that the Congressional fight is going to be much closer than two years ago. New York has 26 Republican and 11 Democratic Congressmen. It is universally admitted in New York that every Democratic Congressional District will again go Democratic. But more than 12 of the 26 Republican seats are doubtful. Pennsylvania has 31 Republican Congressmen and a single Democratic one; the Pennsylvania Democrats claim that they will give him plenty of company in the next Congress. Iowa has 11 members of Congress, all Republican, but the Democrats are claiming that the dissensions over the tariff and the Cummins and anti-Cummins fight will enable them to take away at least half of them. Wisconsin has 10 Republican Congressmen and only 1 Democrat; faction fights there last year came near retiring Babcock, chairman of the Republican Congressional Committee for ten years. This year the Democrats say they will retire him and a number of others. Ohio has 20 Republicans in Congress and 1 Democrat. Last year, however, Ohio elected a Democratic Governor, and the Democrats are claiming something like half of the Congressional delegation.

This year it is not going to be a walk-over for us as it was two years ago. Therefore it will be well for the Republican campaign leaders to take heed. President Roosevelt does not want to have a Democratic House on his hands for the last two years of his term. We may add parenthetically that neither does the Republican party want him to have a Democratic House. They might "get together" on the tariff. But if the Republican leaders desire to insure success, they can easily do so by making positive promises of tariff revision. But if they refuse to revise the tariff the Democrats may do it for them.

Letters from Eastern Insurers.

The Argonaut is continually in receipt of letters from Eastern policyholders who are desirous of being informed concerning the insurance situation in San Francisco. In almost every case they request that their names be treated as "not for publication." We shall, of course, comply with their wishes. We take from this morning's mail a couple of letters which may be considered as typical of all, and print them without the names. The first comes from a mining superintendent in Colorado. He writes:

Dear Sir: May I trouble you to give me some information regarding the _____ Fire Insurance Company of _____? Are they paying the claims of their policyholders promptly in California? or have they joined the defaulting concerns? We have our office buildings and annexes insured in this company, and thus are interested in learning the stand which they may take. Noticing the amount of space and the attention you are giving to the insurance situation there, we have thought that you might be disposed to give us some information concerning this company. Will you do so? If so, you would confer a very great favor upon us. Thanking you in advance for your trouble, I remain

Yours very truly,
_____, Superintendent.

Another letter from a very large concern in Chicago runs as follows:

Dear Sir: I have been carefully reading the Argonaut's articles concerning the stand taken by the unfair insurance companies in San Francisco. I would be very much obliged if you could let me have a list of the companies which are not acting fairly by their policyholders. I am now carrying, on our offices and plant, nearly eight hundred thousand dollars in a number of insurance companies. I have no desire to run the risk of not collecting same in case of fire, as I understand from your articles is the experience of many of my fellow business men in San Francisco. Although you do not know me personally, I have read the Argonaut for many years, and I am convinced that your articles are intended to be of assistance to your readers under these trying conditions. Therefore, if it is not too much trouble for you to prepare and then forward to me such a list, I greatly wish you will do so. If you do, I will take your assurance as to its correctness and will immediately cut out all such companies from our list at once and cancel the policies. I will tell them why I do so, although I will not quote you in the matter. If this is not too much trouble, you will greatly oblige an old Argonaut reader, if you will forward the list I desire.

Very truly yours,

In these strenuous times there are very few of us who have leisure to spare on other people's business. The merchants and other business men in San Francisco know that full well. Many of them who are overwhelmed with the burden of their own affairs are yet attempting to assist in the work of municipal government, in the work of charitable associations organized for many years back, and in the abnormal charitable work thrust upon us by the great calamity. Some of these men are toiling sixteen hours out of the twenty-four. Many of them are neglecting their own business and neglecting the adjustment of their own insurance losses to attend to matters such as those of which we speak.

The editor of the Argonaut certainly has enough to occupy his attention at present in his immediate surroundings without going far afield. But he has not hesitated, in the case of any application like those above, to reply at once and to furnish all the information that he could give. Where he could obtain official information he secured it. Where he could not obtain official information he has forwarded such as was to be had. There is no lack of such information, for there are many hundreds of policyholders who are by no means reluctant to speak of their experiences with the unfair, crooked, and defaulting companies. It is our observation that the crooked companies have been endeavoring to browbeat and bulldoze their small policyholders first, as they are poor and obscure, postponing and evading settlement of the larger claims of the rich and influential. As a matter of policy some of them have settled squarely with certain large policyholders who might create a scandal and a stench.

We found that forwarding the facts concerning the doings of the insurance companies had a marked effect on the Eastern policyholders who wrote us. In one case, where an Argonaut subscriber asked about a certain company in which he held a policy, we replied in substance as follows: That this company was aligned with the dollar-for-dollar companies; that ostensibly it purported to be paying its losses squarely; that in reality it was indulging in all manner of paltry expedients to intimidate its small policyholders, while at the same time we knew it had settled with one large policyholder to the tune of two hundred thousand dollars without a discount. We added that we had nothing to say against the solvency of the company, but that we had an ineffable contempt for its meanness, and enclosed a newspaper clipping of a suit brought against it where it was attempting to evade a liability to a poor widow, who had lost her husband in the recent great fire, on the technical pretense of a "transfer of interest" in a gift deed from one spouse to the other. By return of mail there promptly came back this notification from our Eastern correspondent:

Your favor received. At first your opinion concerning the solidity and solvency of the _____ Company impelled us to leave our policy alone. But when we read the item about their conduct toward the widow we were so disgusted that we at once informed their agent here that we desired our policy canceled at once.

We shall continue to furnish all the information in our power to those of our readers and subscribers who reside at distant points. We shall therefore be glad to hear of any cases of crooked dealing which policyholders here may have suffered. We shall treat their letters as we treat those of the Eastern policyholders—as confidential.

Banking and Militarism.

During the troubled days following the great disaster of April 18th there were many complaints of the bad conduct of "soldiers" in San Francisco. There were many charges made of "soldiers" having wantonly shot down civilians. General Greely and General Funston denied that any such charges could be proved against the men in their command.

As to the conduct of the National Guard, there was much recrimination and counter-recrimination at the time. Many charges were made against its members, and in one case a number of National Guardsmen stationed at Oakland were put under arrest at San Francisco for looting in the ruins of Chinatown. Governor Pardee vigorously defended the National Guard, but he was forced to disband Company F, of the Seventh Infantry, N. G. C., for insubordination.

But Company F of the Seventh refuses to be disbanded. They claim that the State still owes them $46 each for their services, and they refuse to lay aside their battle-scarred uniforms until they receive this sum. When an officer representing the Adjutant General recently visited their armory with the order for their discharge, each man formally presented to him a bill first demanding pay for his services. There is something more commercial than military in this latter procedure. In the old days mutinous legionaries made prisoners of their officers, and held them as hostages till the pay was forthcoming. In these piping times of peace they render a statement of account.

As there will be no money in the State Treasury until July, 1907, for the payment of these militiamen, the bankers in the various cities have loaned the lacking money to the Adjutant General. For example, the San Francisco bankers loaned him $100,000 to pay off the San Francisco militiamen. Similar action has been taken in Long Beach, San Diego, Fresno, Riverside, San Bernardino, and is about to be taken in Redlands and Pasadena. For some strange reason, however, the bankers of Los Angeles have shown a curious reluctance to loaning to the Adjutant General the $15,000 necessary to pay off Company F of the Seventh Infantry, N. G. C. Therefore these warriors still stoutly refuse to disband, and are holding the fortress until they get their $46 per. They are reported in the Los Angeles papers as "looking toward General Robert Wankowski, who is a banker." We fear that their hope of aid from General Wankowski is only a forlorn hope. The name sounds military; it sounds Polish; it brings recollections of Dombrowski, of Walewski, of sabers and spurs, of frogs and epaulettes, of pelisses and whiskers. But General Wankowski is in a commercial country, and one which is in a condition of ignoble peace and not at war. When it comes to digging up that $15,000, we think that General Wankowski will lay aside his plumed hat and his sabre, and will look at the matter in a mild and financial fashion over the gilded grill and through the keen spectacles of Banker Wankowski.

Plan of the Policyholders' League.

Several weeks have passed since the organization of the San Francisco Policyholders' League, with but little to report. It is not difficult to understand the silence of this body, however, when the importance of its operations are considered. The magnitude of the policies it represents, some fifty millions of dollars, and the tangle of interests involved, demand deliberate action. Furthermore, the men composing it, and particularly the officers, are overwhelmed with public and private business.

Its directors have finally formulated a plan of action, reporting to the League as a whole its contemplated operations, as follows:

To induce the insurance companies to make prompt adjustment;

To organize incorporations or trusteeships empowered to collect its policyholders' claims in court;

To ascertain whether companies really require time in which to pay in full—if so, to arrange for such payment;

To secure from insolvent companies, by suit or otherwise, the best possible results;

To give public indorsement to all insurance companies that treat San Francisco fairly;

To induce solvent and fair-dealing companies to do business in California, and to endeavor to secure reasonable rates, fair to insurer and insured;

To co-operate with the municipality, the fire department, and the insurance underwriters for the best fire protection;

To suggest insurance legislation, fair both to the insurance company and the policyholder;

To secure the adoption of a uniform form of fire insurance policy that will be clear and fair.

Every holder of a fire-insurance policy in San Francisco is eligible to membership on depositing one per cent of the face value of his policies. If said one per cent shall not be expended, all surplus shall be returned to those who contribute it when the League has terminated its existence. Members may withdraw their policies from the League at any time, the League retaining the one per cent subscribed. The by-laws make the usual provisions for the election of Trustees, Executive Committee, etc. Application for membership must be made within thirty days from the 1st of August.

Since the Argonaut first suggested the advisability of this organization, unlooked-for strength has been added to it. Although the League already represented over fifty millions in insurance policies, within the last fortnight there has joined with it the Clearing House Association, which represents all the commercial banks in San Francisco. This has been followed by the adhesion of the savings banks, which represent thousands of insurance policies on the property of small landowners who have mortgaged it to the banks. As the commercial banks possess the power of throwing out the policies of all unfair insurance companies when submitted as collateral, and as the savings banks possess the power of refusing to loan on property when it is insured with a company which has been held by this League to be unfair, it may readily be seen what enormous power is held by the Policyholders' League of San Francisco. We earnestly urge every reader of the Argonaut who is unfortunate enough to hold a policy in an insolvent company, a weak company, or a shuffling company, to apply at once for membership in the League.

Kipling's Latest Poem.

When Rudyard Kipling writes a political "poem" nowadays, it is cabled over the Seven Seas. We are not of those who believe that politics can be transmogrified into poems—as well might sermons be set to ballet music, and expressed in pantomime by short-skirted young ladies in pink fleshings. But Mr. Kipling's admirers hang upon his burning words as devoutly when he poetizes about preferential tariffs as when he sings of love and war. Here is his latest wooing of the Tory muse:

The shame of a Majuba Hill
Lies heavy on our line,
But there is shame completer still,
And England makes no sign.
Unchallenged in the market place
Of Freedom's chosen land,
Our rulers pass our rule and race
Into the stranger's hand.

At a great price you loosed the yoke
'Neath which our brethren lay;
(Your dead that perished ere 'twas broke
Are scarcely dust today).
Think you ye freed them at that price?
Wake, or your toil is vain;
Our rulers jugglingly devise
To sell them back again.

Back to the ancient bitterness
Ye ended once for all—
Back to oppression none may guess
Who have not borne its thrall—
Back to the slough of their despond;
Helots anew held fast
By England's "seal upon the bond"
As helots to the last.

What is their sin that they are made
Rebillion's lawful prey?
This is their sin—that, oft betrayed,
They did not oft betray;
That to their hurt they kept their vows;
That for their faith they died;
God help thee, children of our house,
Whom England hath denied.

But we—what God shall turn our doom,
What blessing dare we claim,
Who slay a nation in the womb
To crown a trickster's game?
Who come before amazed mankind
Forsworn in party feud,
And search the forms of law to bind
Our blood to servitude?

Now, even now, before men learn
How near we broke our trust—
Now, even now, ere we return
Dominion to the dust—
Now, ere the gates of Mercy close
Forever 'gainst the line
That sells its sons to serve its foes—
Will England make no sign?

What may this remarkable outburst mean? This is probably the explanation: When the Boers laid down their arms one of the conditions was self-government in South Africa for Briton and Boer. Lord Kitchener acceded to the terms, and they were confirmed by the Conservative government then in power. But the promise was not kept, and the Conservative government also outraged both Britons and Boers in the Transvaal by importing Chinese coolies at the behest of the great mining lords of the Rand. This outraged both Briton and Boer. Yet Balfour, the Conservative premier, excused this coolie degradation of labor, and refused to keep the Conservatives' solemn promise to give the Transvaal self-government.

Now Campbell-Bannerman, the Liberal premier, is about to carry out the pledge the Conservatives broke. A government bill is before Parliament giving the Transvaal self-government and manhood suffrage, as well as prohibiting the importation of coolie labor. The bill is bitterly opposed by Balfour in the Commons, by Milner in the Lords, and by Kipling in the press. Yet it is only what the Conservatives promised to perform at the close of the Boer War. The bill, we are glad to say, is expected to carry by a vote of about 300 to 100.

Does Mr. Kipling really think that such matters lend themselves to treatment as "poems"? It would not be fair or courteous to ask whether his mind is working as clearly as of yore. But he is certainly losing his sense of humor.

Fireman's Fund and Home Insurance Companies.

Insurance Commissioner Wolf has notified the president and directors of the Fireman's Fund Insurance Company and the Home Fire and Marine Insurance Company, both of San Francisco, that they must make good the deficiencies in their assets inside of four weeks, failing which Attorney General Webb will file a complaint in the name of the People of the State of California to have them declared insolvent and to have their business wound up under the supervision of the court. Both the Insurance Commissioner and the Attorney General agree that the provisions of Sections 600 and 601 of the Code, under which these proceedings will be taken, are mandatory. These sections provide that when the Insurance Commissioner learns that an incorporation is insolvent, or that its capital is impaired, or that the liabilities exceed the assets, he must take certain proceedings specified by these sections. Deputy Attorney General Sturtevant states that the court has no power to appoint a receiver for insolvent companies in the first instance. When judgment has been either confessed by or obtained against the companies, the court must allow the Directors to wind up the company's affairs. Only on complaint of a stockholder or creditor, or on a showing being made that the affairs of a corporation are not being administered properly, can the court order a receiver to take charge. The law differs from that concerning banking corporations, where receivers are sometimes appointed in the first instance.

Insurance Commissioner Wolf, on August 2, sent an expert accountant to the offices of the Fireman's Fund and the Home Insurance companies to make formal demand for the inspection of the books. As the books are burned, no inspection can be made. William J. Dutton is president of both the Fireman's Fund and the Home Insurance companies. Bernard Faymonville and J. R. Levison are vice presidents of the Fireman's Fund company, and Lewis Weinmann is secretary. Stephen D. Ives is vice president and Franklin Bangs secretary of the Home Insurance company. The Home company, which was originally organized in 1864, was purchased by the Fireman's Fund company. The Home company has a capital stock of $300,000, and its assets, according to its last report, were $1,822,952. The Fireman's Fund, according to its last report, had a capital stock of $1,000,000, of which sum $500,000 is paid in, and assets of some $6,000,000. It was organized in 1863. After the great fire of last April the Fireman's Fund directors assumed that the Home Insurance company would be able, with assistance, to continue business, and therefore loaned it $600,000. But as the situation grew worse for both companies, the Fireman's Fund reinsured its risks in force to the amount of $372,584,750 with a new company styled "The Fireman's Fund Insurance Corporation," which company has the same officers and directors as the Fireman's Fund Insurance Company. It is stated that the loan, the reinsurance, and the new incorporation have all been done in good faith, without evasion, and without intention of fraud.

President Dutton is quoted over his signature in the daily papers as saying: "Commissioner Wolf has advised us that he proposes to serve notice upon us to levy an assessment to make good the capital of the old Fireman's Fund Insurance Company. This is his duty under the law and the course which the Code provides. Section 600 of the Code authorizes the Insurance Commissioner to require assessment of an amount sufficient to restore the entire paid-up capital or one million dollars over and above all liabilities. But we are in liquidation, and not intending to continue business, nor to restore our capital, but only to pay our debts. Until August 18th, when the time for filing claims ends, we cannot tell how much our liabilities are. We have no desire to evade any of our obligations, and are busy now turning assets into cash to make a partial distribution among our claimants during the present month. This will be followed by a call upon our stockholders for the share of each toward making up the deficit. But an assessment upon stockholders for a sum which will be largely paid from the sale of securities already in hand, and further to restore the capital of a retiring company which does not intend to use it, is not reasonable."

The Organized Policyholders' Association, through its attorney, Charles C. Boynton, who represents a number of claimants against the Fireman's and Home Insurance companies, made a formal demand on August 3d for an assessment to be levied on the stock to meet the deficit. President Dutton in reply read to Attorney Boynton a communication from the two companies' attorneys advising that an assessment be not levied. This opinion is said to hold that any assessment levied by the two corporations would be met by insolvency proceedings instigated by a large number of stockholders; that after the assessment was collected and the attendant expenses had been paid, the net proceeds would be insufficient; that another assessment would have to be levied, and so on, with the result, say the companies' attorneys, that the richer stockholders would have to pay the entire liability of the companies, instead of merely their proportionate share. Therefore, according to the daily papers, President Dutton stated that for these reasons the Fireman's Fund will refuse to levy an assessment on its stockholders to meet its liabilities.

Concerning President Dutton's refusal, Attorney Boynton, for the policyholders, is quoted in an interview as saying: "This move of the Fireman's Fund attorneys will damage both the stockholders and the policyholders. The stockholders must eventually settle with the policyholders. This can be accomplished by individual suits by the policyholders against the corporation and its individual stockholders. This course would be expensive and long continued. On the other hand, the corporation, acting on behalf of its policyholders, could collect the necessary amounts from its stockholders in one simple proceeding by assessment. No one denies the speed and economy of this course, but it is alleged that under it some wealthy stockholder may be compelled to pay more than his share. I do not believe this is possible. The proposed assessment is to pay the debts and not to continue business. The stockholder's liability is definitely established by statute."

In his statement President Dutton is quoted as saying: "The Fireman's Fund Insurance Company in its management has always enjoyed a high reputation for integrity, and we propose to maintain it."

All Californians will hope that the views as to the action of the Fireman's Fund, so handsomely expressed by President Dutton, may be indorsed by the action of its stockholders. It is very disagreeable to lose money. Many thousands of us have learned that within the last few months, even if we did not know it before. But if it is disagreeable to lose money honorably, it is more disagreeable to lose money and lose honor too. Let us hope that such may not be the case with any of our California corporations and their stockholders.

Another local insurance corporation is treading the same fiery path as the Fireman's Fund and the Home companies. This is the California Fire Insurance Company, which has levied its second assessment of $40 per share to pay its policyholders' claims, which it is meeting in full. The third assessment is on August 8th, and two others it is expected will follow shortly. The par value of the California stock is $40 a share divided into six thousand shares and the directors expect to call for $200 per share from the stockholders to pay off the claims, which amount to about $1,250,000. The California Insurance Company has only been in business since June, 1905. Hence its present ill fortune comes all the harder. When the enormously rich insurance corporations of Great Britain, Germany, Austria, and the Eastern States are dodging, shuffling and welching, we are glad to see this little California company manfully meeting its obligations. We hope that its elder and stronger sisters, the Fireman's Fund and the Home companies, may also induce their shareholders to raise the money to meet their liabilities.

Governor Pardee and the Los Angeles Water Plan.

When Governor Pardee visited Los Angeles last week he was closely questioned by the reporters as to his position on the Los Angeles plan for bringing water from the Owen River country. The Governor requested to be quoted correctly, and the reporters say he said this: "The water question is the future great question for the whole State. Los Angeles, owing to her unprecedentedly rapid development, is confronted with the most serious aspects of the matter a little in advance of other communities, but that is the only difference. San Francisco, Oakland and other bay and inland cities will presently find their supplies inadequate, and will be compelled to bring in mountain water from long distances and at heavy expense, as Los Angeles is now proposing to do. So I say it is a State question, and not merely one in which Los Angeles is concerned."

The Governor then goes on to praise Los Angeles for her pluck and enterprise in undertaking a public work costing over twenty millions of dollars, and he adds: "The State Legislature ought, and I believe will, enact whatever legislation may be necessary. Nothing will be withheld which will not constitute an invasion of the rights of other communities."

Since last spring the Los Angelenos have been hammering the Governor because he opposed their consolidation scheme. This is an unfair attack, for the people in and around Los Angeles are not themselves unanimously in support of that scheme, and the suburban towns seemed to be opposed to consolidation with Los Angeles. Therefore the Governor and the legislature could scarcely coerce them. The federal government may of course try and bulldoze New Mexico and Arizona into consolidation, but that is different. California is still a commonwealth of self-governing people, and we admire and applaud Governor Pardee for his stand in refusing to force these suburban towns to consolidate with a larger city against their will.

The pith of the Governor's remarks, however, lies in the last sentence, concerning "invasions of the rights of other communities." What he says concerning San Francisco, Oakland, and other bay cities and their future water supplies is also strictly true. There is going to be a great deal of trouble in this State when the coast cities, rapidly increasing in size, find their water supply inadequate. They will attempt to bring it from the foothill and mountain districts, and they will find the dwellers there resisting them. For years San Francisco has been taking her water supply from the counties of San Mateo, Santa Clara, and Alameda. Now these counties need their own water; yet various San Francisco power, water and electric light companies are trying to take more. This question is now pending in the courts, and it is a burning one.

Query—If Los Angeles, a large city, may take away the water from the Owens River District, a sparsely settled farming country, is that all right? Most people would reply, "Yes."

If the Owens River country were a thickly settled farming district, would it then be all right? Most people would hesitate.

If the Owens River District were a thickly settled farming country containing several prosperous towns, would it then be all right? Most people would say, "No."

The counties of San Mateo, Santa Clara, and Alameda are among our most populous, prosperous and oldest-settled counties, and in them are found some of the largest towns and cities of the State. Is it all right for San Francisco corporations to take additional water from them when San Francisco is already taking more than they can spare? What do people say to that?

This is neither a court of equity nor a court of law, and therefore it cannot hand down judicial decisions. But it would like very much to know who owns water, the riparian owner or the fellow in the next town, the foothill farmer or the electric light and power company, the poor village or the rich city? And it would also like to know where the courts are going to draw the dividing line between sparsely settled and thickly settled districts? And when the courts have drawn the line and have decided that the big coast cities may have all the water they want from the interior, what are the courts going to do when interior cities grow big and there is no more water for them to claim?

All of the above is said without prejudice as to any rights we may have, either in city or country. We only want to know, you know.

Suits Against the German Companies.

The Transatlantic Company of Hamburg has repudiated all liability, and its policyholders are discussing means of getting judgments against the company. At a meeting of the policyholders Attorney W. H. Linforth advised them to begin suits in Germany as soon as possible, and not wait for judgments here. He proposes on behalf of his own clients to bring suit at once in Germany, where the company's assets are, and to attach its property. There are over 3,300 claimants in San Francisco, and he does not think they could be led to act with sufficient promptness as a body. Therefore he intends to act for his own clients at once. About 200 policyholders, with claims amounting to over $2,000,000, have put down their names in favor of forming an association. Attorney Linforth believes that the German courts will not recognize judgments obtained here, and therefore believes in bringing suit in Germany. He thinks that whenever a suit is begun an attachment can be levied on the property of the company or of the stockholders. The other policyholders present were in favor of an incorporation. It seems there are a number of Chinese policyholders whose claims aggregate some five hundred thousand dollars. They desire to act with the white policyholders, but wish the latter to start the corporation. It is believed that several hundred at least of the policyholders will form an incorporation and then put their claims in such shape as to minimize the number of suits.

We believe that Attorney Linforth's views are sound concerning the non-validity of judgments obtained here. There is no international "law" that we know of. What is so called consists merely of what one nation is willing to do regarding its relations toward another nation. As for the courts, those of one country do not recognize the writs and attachments of those of another country. This may be disputed, but it is true. If any California policyholder desires to get a judgment against a defaulting insurance company and make it a fruitful one, he had better bring suit in the country where the company has its property. We will go further—even in this country, where the courts of the different States are supposed to recognize each other's jurisdiction, we advise any wronged policyholder to bring suit in the State where the crooked company is located, where it has its property, and where the stockholders have theirs. He may not get judgment, or if he gets judgment he may not get satisfaction even there, but he certainly will get none if he brings suit in California and attempts to have his California judgment recognized in foreign countries, or even in other States of his own country.

Who Will Be New York's Governor?

The campaign rumors of New York State seem to show that both the old parties fear the chances of Hearst's election. To such an extent does this feeling go that the Republican and Democratic machines are talking of combining to fight the Independence League ticket, which will be headed by Hearst. The New York Evening Post is probably the most bitter opponent of Mr. Hearst in the newspaper world. Yet its accounts of the campaign show very plainly that he is a factor to be reckoned with. In a news article of July 31st it quoted three editors of "up-State" Republican newspapers in New York, all of whom, when interviewed, said that there is general dissatisfaction in New York State with the Republican machine, and one added: "A great many Republicans will vote for Hearst." Other Republican voters, when interviewed, said that there are thousands of voters in the State who are tired of both machines, and are anxious to smash them.

There seem to be many adherents of Mr. Hearst in the ranks of both the Republican and the Democratic parties. Ex-Senator W. F. Mackey, the Democratic candidate for Lieutenant Governor in 1900, has deserted the regular organization and joined the Hearst ranks. So jubilant are the Hearst henchmen that they are now scornfully refusing a possible deal with the Democrats by which it was proposed that Hearst should head the Democratic State ticket and the Democratic machine get the legislative nominations. Ex-Senator Ford says: "The straight Independence League ticket and no deal with the Democratic machine are what I stand for."

The Evening Post also says that Steuben county will instruct its delegates for Hearst. R. R. Lyons, a prominent lawyer, heads the Hearst movement, and, although the so-called "safe and sane" Democracy are very strong there, the delegates will go to the convention shouting for Hearst. The Republicans in that and the adjacent counties, to use the Post's language, "look on the Hearst movement as dangerous." So much fear is felt, in fact, that the Post's correspondent speaks somewhat hopelessly of the situation. He says: "Jerome might still save the Democratic day, for the situation is not hopeless, it is only becoming so. But Jerome is silent, while Hearst and his agents are busy."

Altogether, taking this journal, Hearst's bitterest enemy, as an authority, his chances in New York State for the governorship would seem to be much better than we out here had supposed.

The Earthquake-Clause Companies.

The more one examines the statements issued by the crooked cockney companies—in which they endeavor to hide behind the earthquake clause—the more crooked and shuffling they appear. In one sentence they say that it can be proved absolutely that the fire was either directly or indirectly caused by the earthquake, hence they are advised by their counsel that they are not liable. In another sentence they say that their legal liability is doubtful. In another statement they announce that they will pay fire claims where the amount is not over five or six hundred dollars.

Why these three varying statements? If their liability was even doubtful, they would not pay a cockney penny to the holders of five-hundred-dollar claims, which must aggregate many thousands of dollars. If, on the other hand, their policies are void, and they are "not liable," as advised by their counsel, why should they pay five-hundred-dollar or any other claims for which they do not owe? This can scarcely be set down to charity or generosity, for we have all of us lately come to know that these emotions are not attributes of insurance companies. Those of us who never expected such qualities from them would be satisfied if they showed common honesty.

The crooked cockney companies go on to say that they are prepared to "meet claimants personally," but will not meet claimants' counsel to adjust losses. If they are "not liable," there is nothing to adjust. Why, then, do they offer to adjust?

The explanation of these inconsistencies is plain. The crooked cockney companies fear that their attitude will not be sustained by the courts, and they are endeavoring, before litigation begins, to "compromise" with the largest number of their policyholders—that is to say, those who have the smallest claims. But we very much doubt whether they will be able to establish their contention of non-liability. All of the policies we have examined containing the earthquake clause seem to us to have a perfectly clear meaning, to wit, that the companies are liable for damage by fire, but are not liable for damage by earthquake. In some policies the clause, by a great deal of hair-splitting, might possibly be construed to mean that where fire was caused by earthquake, "directly or indirectly," the company was not liable. But all of the clauses are written in such words as to prove plainly that in the minds of the men who drew them there was but one thought, that the companies were not liable for damage from earthquake. No one of these clauses which we have read expresses plainly the other thought which the companies are now trying to force into them, that they are not liable for damage from fire when caused by earthquake. In short, the meaning of these policies is unmistakable when the intent is considered; they mean liability for fire damage, non-liability for earthquake damage.

If the men drawing up these clauses had intended to make it perfectly clear that the companies are not responsible for fire when it is caused by earthquake, that meaning would be quite apparent, as it is easy to convey such a meaning in simple and direct English; but no such meaning is apparent in most of them, and in many the clause is so curiously worded that it actually makes the company responsible for fire when caused by earthquake and not for other earthquake damage. This seems extraordinary, but it is quite true.

If a court of law could take into consideration that the execution of these insurance contracts brought the minds of the insurer and the insured together on this basis—that these earthquake clauses meant liability for fire damage, non-liability for earthquake damage—it would simplify matters, for that such was the case no man can truthfully deny. If these crooked cockney companies intended to make clear their non-liability for fire resulting from earthquake, they did it very clumsily; yet in all the other negative clauses of policies, their non-liability is made clear.

Further to prove their non-liability, the crooked cockney companies claim that San Francisco was left without water supply on April 18th as a result of the earthquake shock, and hence they are not liable to their policyholders. We fancy that it would be difficult for them to prove either this premise or this deduction. In some parts of San Francisco the Spring Valley water continued to flow freely; in other parts of San Francisco there were artesian wells; in some places there were elaborate systems of private water supply and fire protection. There were in the city nearly threescore cisterns, some of which were filled with water, others dry, and some dismantled and filled up with earth. Yet this old cistern system was still a part of the municipal water protection system. Therefore, the crooked cockney companies allege falsely when they say that there was no water supply, for there was an imperfect one, and they are in error when they say that they are not liable because of its injury by the earthquake. What have the individual policyholders to do with the water supply of San Francisco?—either that of the Spring Valley company or that of any other company, or that of the municipality, or that of private citizens? The policyholder as an individual is not responsible for the city's water supply. The aggregated fire insurance companies, through their board of underwriters, have all to do with it, and the policyholders have nothing to do with it at all. The fire underwriters are supposed to know all about the local system of water supply, although the facts show that they knew nothing. They apparently knew nothing about the old cisterns which had been neglected by the municipal authorities, and they apparently did not know that nearly all of San Francisco's protection from fire depended on a single Spring Valley main running through swampy ground, which was ruptured at the first earthquake shock. If the fire underwriters did not attend to their insurance business any better than this would show, they had better go down into the Valencia-street sewers and clean out the old and ruptured water-main, while the horny-handed gentlemen toiling down there in odoriferous rubber boots take possession of the underwriters' comfortable chairs. The sewer-cleaners might do no better work for the companies than the board of underwriters have done; they certainly could do no worse.

But we ask again, how does all that concern the policyholder? Did not the crooked cockney companies and all the other insurance companies begin writing business in San Francisco with their eyes open? Did they not know the source of the water supply? Had they not, through their underwriters' board, repeatedly gone over the system with the municipal authorities and the Spring Valley Water Company's officials? Did they not sleep and snore and drink and get fat while the municipal authorities allowed the old cisterns to become wrecked and filled up? And if by their laches they thus allowed the city of San Francisco to be destroyed by fire, and if they thus permitted their stockholders to lose scores of millions of dollars, why do they now look to the unfortunate policyholders to pay the losses which they by their negligence and their gross stupidity permitted to occur?

A policy is a contract. But is there anything in these insurance policies stipulating that the policyholders shall furnish a water supply to San Francisco? Not a word. And is there anything in these policies stipulating that if the policyholders do not furnish, maintain, and keep in repair a perfect water supply, the insurance companies shall go free? Not a word. Therefore, their claim of non-liability because their policyholders did not perform an act which their contract did not require them to perform, is utterly without any basis in law or equity.

McKee vs. National Fire Co.

Recently the Argonaut commented at some length on a suit reported to have been brought by Miss Jane McKee against the National Fire Insurance Company of Hartford for $12,000 fire damages, under a policy which that company denied liability for, on the ground that the authorities had destroyed the buildings insured, with back-firing or dynamite. The Examiner of August 6th says this claim has been settled, and adds:

The National Fire Insurance Company of Hartford has paid a claim. It was for $12,000, and a check for that amount was sent to Miss Jane McKee. Payment was made, however, only after Miss McKee, as administratrix of the estate and representative of the heirs of Mary McKee, had brought suit against the company for the face of the policy. Attorney Percy V. Long, who instituted the action, said yesterday:

"We have just been notified by our client that the claim has been paid. The company sent the check to her. The policy was on a residence and household goods on Van Ness Avenue. It has been the contention of the company that the building was dynamited."

Argonauts for Our Files.

In response to the Argonaut's request for loose and unconnected copies of the Argonaut which we would be glad to have in order to build up complete files, we have received packages of papers from a number of our readers. Among the many who have very kindly sent us papers and to whom we extend our thanks are the following:

THRIFTY RUSSELL SAGE.

He Dies Leaving Many Millions, Widely Lamented and Much Loved.

Wall Street teems with anecdotes of Russell Sage. His thriftiness became a byword all over the country. Daily for years Sage used to go from his Wall Street office to the Western Union Building on Broadway to partake of the free lunch that was served to the company by its directors. He was a great lover of horses. He had a team of good ones that he loved to drive at a brisk gait and was successful in swapping. He never smoked, and drank little, and there were no holidays in his life. A few years ago a story came from the West that Sage had exacted a mortgage on his brother's property at 6 per cent for a loan of $50. Sage denied it. He said the money was lent to a nephew. Sage only once got the worst of a bargain. In 1884 the failure of Grant & Ward showed that for once his usual good judgment had failed him. He lost $6,000,000, but he paid all demands and recovered the sum within a year.

His name is identified with the system of "puts and calls," which he introduced in 1870 and stuck to. In his office on December 4, 1891, when Henry L. Norcross threw a dynamite bomb at him, Sage was cut by pieces of the bomb and by flying glass in forty-seven places, but none of the wounds was serious. Norcross himself was blown to pieces. Norcross was a Boston broker who had gone mad. He demanded $1,200,000 of Sage, and, failing to get the money, threw the bomb. Among those in the office at that time was William R. Laidlaw. He sued Sage for $100,000 damages, asserting that Sage had used him as a shield. In the lower courts he won a large verdict, but this was reversed. Sage often carried large sums of cash in his pockets, not for use, but because he liked to have the money where he could actually feel it. Sage's hair was always cut by Charlie, his coachman. In eighty-five years it is estimated that the financier thus saved $510, which, with interest added and compounded, would amount now to perhaps $1,500. He always favored paying the manager of any company in which he was a stockholder or director a good salary, enough to keep him honest, his employees used to say, and then he expected the manager to hire lesser clerks at extremely low salaries.

It is said that Dr. Charles P. Munn, who acted as Mr. Sage's medical adviser for many years, never charged the financier any fee. Dr. Munn, as one of the executors of the will, will now receive about $300,000, it is said. Foxy Munn!

Not long ago Sage cashed a check for four cents, and as he did so it is said that he remarked: "It was just like finding money." The check came in a letter from a theatrical firm calling his attention to their new play then running at the theater and enclosing this check to pay for the time used in reading the letter. Such letters were sent to many wealthy New Yorkers, but it is said that Sage was the only one who cashed the check.

At one time a man went in Sage's office to extend a loan. As the clerk looked over his bundle, which may have contained a half-million dollars' worth of securities, the envelope which held them began to tear at the corner. As he noticed this the clerk said to the debtor: "I think you had better send me around a new envelope, or Mr. Sage will have to call that loan." Think of that! Asking for a new five-cent envelope on a transaction that probably brought in interest at the rate of $25,000 a year.

Lord Leigh, writing to the London Times, states that a large portion of the lofty tower of the old priory of Maxstoke, in Warwickshire, England, fell on April 18th. Allowing for the difference in time, this would coincide with the first shock of the earthquake in San Francisco.

FIRE AND EARTHQUAKE PROOF.

Some Architect's Suggestions on the Factors of Safety in Rebuilding San Francisco.

The journals devoted to architecture and building are giving much space lately to the problems that confront San Francisco. In a recent periodical, Donn Barber, a well-known New York architect, thus wrote:

"Investigation of the effects of the earthquake upon the buildings of San Francisco is difficult, and the results are unsatisfactory. The testimony of eye witnesses is most unreliable, owing to the state of panic and the need of self-preservation which existed at the time. No cool-headed and scientific observation was possible. We shall, therefore, probably be forced to depend upon the silent testimony of the relics of the disaster; and here again we, as architects and engineers, are hampered and obstructed in our researches by the complications due to the subsequent action of fire and dynamite. Even if the effects of this particular earthquake could be clearly read, it would not be safe to conclude that the action of those in the future will be the same, so different are they in their movements of upheaval, sliding or rotation. It would seem, therefore, that we are forced back upon theory to determine what class of buildings will best withstand the shock and the unequal settlement or upheaval of their foundations.

A few facts, however, seem to stand clear of the mass of uncertainty. The great destruction by fire has once more shown us that the fireproof buildings cannot resist the concentrated heat of a surrounding mass of burning buildings. We have advanced, sufficiently in the science of fireproof construction to make our buildings safe from any fire which may originate within their walls, but we have not yet reached the point where we can construct buildings which will not succumb to the terrific heat of burning buildings on all sides. This has been demonstrated again and again. It is too much to expect that the entire city, or even any one great section of the new San Francisco, will be of fireproof construction, but it is to be hoped that the city will, at least, be divided into many sections by lines of fireproof buildings separating the areas given over to inflammable or slow-burning buildings, each from the others. This would prevent the irresistible sweep of the flames; while the sections in which fires originated might be totally destroyed, the neighboring sections would not be affected.

The great danger to life in an earthquake is from the falling of parts of buildings, and, while it is probably not within the bounds of human effort to prevent all loss of life, it is certainly possible to lessen the loss. It would seem, therefore, that the following very general precautions should be taken in the rebuilding of both the residential and the business sections of the city:

Any system of construction adopted should be sufficiently flexible or elastic to permit the building to adjust itself, within reasonable limits, to an unequal settlement of its foundations and to sliding or vibratory motions of its parts. To this end steel would seem to be the ideal material, for it is possible to construct a building of steel which will withstand almost any strain and adapt itself to all manner of deformation. The steel frame of a building should not be rigid; the columns should be as few and as far apart as possible, so that in the case of unequal settlement the angle of distortion will be less than in shorter spans; and the connections and joints of the columns, beams, etc., should be flexible instead of rigid. All bracing should be curved instead of straight, so as to add to the elasticity of the structure. In other words, the building should be no stiffer than is necessary to withstand the wind pressure. The floor beams should be as close together as possible and should be connected by closely placed tie rods. The floor arches should be reinforced in such a way as to guard against cracking and falling. Steel should everywhere be fireproofed with cement on wire lath.

Stairs should be built of wrought iron, steel, or very heavily armored concrete, and should be located if practicable, on an outside wall and as near the exit as possible. Projections of masonry over the street, such as cornices, balconies, etc., should be avoided, and if used at all, should be supported on a steel skeleton securely attached to the frame of the building.

Water and gas pipes, both interior and exterior, should be placed in ample ducts and should be furnished with expansion joints, or loops, to avoid rupture. All exterior pipes and conduits should be kept as far from the columns as possible.

Walls should be as thin as the structural condition will allow, should be supported at every story on girders or beams, and in every case should be anchored to the frame work.

Reinforced concrete will probably be very largely used, but should be employed with caution because it is in an evolutionary and experimental stage of development. Large monolithic slabs of whatever material used should be avoided on account of the possible cracking and crumbling under great shock.

In other words, the fire units and the units of construction should both be kept as small as possible.

A strange accident happened on one of the highways leading out of Walla Walla, Wash., recently, that resulted in the destruction of a motor-car. Heavy, coarse straw had been placed on the road for the purpose of keeping down the dust. As the car passed over this the straw became entangled in the rear axle to such an extent that the rear wheels were lifted clear of the ground, making it impossible to move the car forward or backward. The car had been running a long distance without a stop, and the muffler was so hot that the straw, which was closely packed between the floor of the car and the ground, became ignited. As the rear wheels were clear of the ground it was impossible to move the car from its dangerous position.

Referring to the fact that the making of money out of quackery has become a great source of revenue to many periodicals, the Lancet remarks that it looks forward to "the time when traffic with the rampant charlatan will be regarded as an infamy—an infamy comparable to the maintenance of a brothel."

Ice is regarded with superstitious reverence in Italy, France and England. Common waiters are not allowed to touch the precious product. Instead, the head waiter hands it out in infinitesimal fragments with a pair of sugar tongs.

Completed plans have been filed in the Building Department of New York for the new Singer Building, with its 41-story tower. The tower will be 625 feet high, the highest commercial building ever known and higher than any church spire in the United States.

The new census statistics of the newspaper business are staggering, even to those who make, or help make, newspapers. In 1900 there were 19,624,757 copies printed daily in the United States, and there are doubtless many more printed today.

If the cold feet of the men ahead of the game in all of the poker seances in Chicago on an average night were to be collected it would give a frigidity equal to that of 91,715,400 pounds of ice.

Significant of France's weariness of top-heavy militarism is the growing demand of Radicals and Socialists that the term of military service be shortened from three to two years.

Three American ladies touring Japan were arrested in Iyo province and released after their cameras were destroyed, because they made photographs of Japanese ladies bathing at a public bathhouse.

POLITICO-PERSONAL.

Nicholas Longworth may be made chairman of the Ohio Republican State Convention, as the first move toward the nomination of the President's son-in-law for Governor next year.

Mr. William Jennings Bryan is one year four months and twenty-two days younger than President Roosevelt. He was thirty-eight when he first ran for President. He also is in his way strenuous.

Mr. Gompers' attitude toward Speaker Cannon is one of the bitterest opposition. "Joe Cannon," said Mr. Gompers to an audience in New York City last week, "has more devilry in his nature toward organized labor than any other man I know of."

Senator Joseph H. Millard has received an invitation to accompany the Presidential party to Panama next November. Secretary Taft will be one of the party. Senator Millard is chairman of the Senate committee which has investigated the affairs of the Panama Canal.

A very unusual, indeed a unique, distinction was given to William Jennings Bryan when John Burns was showing him over the House of Lords. Three strangers, however eminent, have always been rigorously confined to the gallery set apart for them, but Mr. Bryan was taken within the rail space around the steps of the throne, heretofore sacred by immutable prescription to the eldest sons of peers and members of the Privy Council.

Speaker Cannon is to go to Illinois at once. The new primary system is to be tried in his district and as he has not attended one of his nominating conventions for twenty years, it is his intention to be present on the 19th of August, when he expects a renomination. He will go to Maine in September to lend his aid to the early campaign in that State and especially in the Second District, where Representative Littlefield is being fought by organized labor.

James H. Blount, former Judge Advocate General of the Philippines, has been elected a vice president of the Anti-Imperialist League. "Information from the Islands," says the Springfield Republican, "is to the effect that industrial and political conditions are steadily growing worse. The favor which President Roosevelt has shown for the policy of neutralization of the islands is said to have been withdrawn on account of the opposition of Secretary Taft, who is preparing to be in the islands next year, presumably to do what he can for peace. Recent accounts represent the sentiment regarding Taft as having changed so much that he is the most unpopular man in the islands."

Under the easy rule of Vice President Fairbanks the Senate drifted into a somewhat leisurely way of doing business. The dignified body was treated to a shock one day. Senator Frye was in the chair. His rulings are more prompt than are those of the Vice President. At one time a vote on an amendment was put so suddenly that Senators who wanted to speak were left standing open mouthed and nonplussed. "I don't think an amendment should be railroaded through like that, Mr. President," protested Mr. Lodge. "The chair put the vote distinctly," replied Mr. Frye, "and Senators had opportunity to be recognized." "But we are not used to such quick work, Mr. President," said the Bay State Senator in a tone of crushed tragedy, and dropped despairingly into his chair.

The Western Pacific Railway Company, it appears from the text of its new mortgage securing its $50,000,000 bonds, agrees that it will complete and equip its main line before September 2, 1908, with adequate terminals at Oakland, San Francisco and Salt Lake.

THE THREE DAYS OF FIRE.

A Graphic Description by One Who Viewed It from Many Points.

A brochure just from the press is "San Francisco Through Earthquake and Fire," by Charles Keeler. The writer acted as an assistant and messenger to the Citizens' Relief Committee during the three dreadful days, and hence covered the city in automobiles many times. He sets forth his experiences most graphically. He has divided his account into epochs, and it is the first attempt we have seen to present an orderly narrative of the great conflagration. Later a more extended and comprehensive account will doubtless be made by some writer who will divide the time into hours as well as days, so that we may follow it closely, as we would the account of a great battle.

Mr. Keeler lived in Berkeley, and after describing his experiences on the East shore of San Francisco Bay on the morning of April 18th, he says:

The First Day.

I hurried cityward on one of the early boats. From the deck we could see licking tongues of flame all along the water-front beneath the great folds of smoke-cloud mounting high in heaven. On nearer approach the scene was one of unforgettable terror. Over the whole city rose this cloud pillar, spreading above like a colossal mushroom. Just back of the ferry tower and the stately rigging of the ships the flames were running riot along the shore. The mast on the ferry tower was bent, stone had fallen from its walls, and the great clock pointed silently the hour of fate—quarter past five.

The big ferry bumped into its slip and we hurried through the dark stone building to the foot of Market Street. Up and down the water-front the flimsy rookeries were roaring and crackling. Wellman-Peck's big modern grocery house a block north was enveloped in a perfect whirlwind of flame. The new Terminus Hotel on the north of Market was just igniting, while Smith's Cash Store opposite was burning furiously. In the open street about the Ferry Building were crowds of dazed people, many with bundles of clothes or traveling-bags. They seemed bewildered rather than excited. When, at quarter past eight, another rather sharp earthquake occurred, people rushed screaming from the walls, but in an instant the shock was over, and the crowds lapsed into their state of dazed stupor. Many took the ferry for Oakland, but others believed the east shore was in ruins, and feared to leave the terrors around them for unknown perils beyond.

I hurried north along the docks, hat against face as screen from the scorching heat. Up in the Latin Quarter saloons had already been looted, and people were making ready to leave—bargaining with extortionate expressions, throwing clothes and furniture out of windows, and dragging trunks, children's express wagons, loaded baby buggies, or, in fact, anything on wheels or casters. Others, incredulous that the fire would reach them, sat impassively on their doorsteps.

Doubling on my tracks I turned down Montgomery Street into the heart of the business district. Troops of regulars were swinging down the pavement, passing the surging throng of dumbfounded people. Here and there plate-glass windows had been broken, leaving stores exposed, and in front of all such, paced sentries. A company of infantry was drawn up before the Sub-Treasury Building. There was no confusion or disorder at any point, the immensity of the peril casting a spell of solemn quiet over the crowds.

Looking down the narrow alleyways toward the wholesale district, I saw dead horses and demolished wagons amid piles of brick. A two-story brick building stood divested of its front wall, showing all the secrets of its interior to the curious crowd.

But houses thus injured were rare exceptions. All modern buildings of good construction stood practically intact.

Meeting Weather Forecaster McArdie on the street, he pointed up at Old Glory fluttering proudly from the signal station atop the Mills Building.

"I put it at half-mast first," he said, "but soon after raised it to cheer people." Then he told how San Francisco was cut off from telegraphic communication with the world, and of how he was trying to reach Washington by Manila cable.

The Mutual Life Insurance Building—a modern structure of terra cotta, on California and Sansome Streets, was blazing fiercely, but no one appeared to heed it. At the corner of Montgomery and Market Streets, the heart of the business district, buildings showed little trace of damage. The Call building, like a peerless white sentinel, watched over the burning city. The lofty new red-brick Chronicle tower was intact, the Palace Hotel seemed undamaged, and the Crocker Building held its gore defiantly. On crossing Market Street I was stopped and turned back by soldiers. Behind the Palace Hotel angry smoke-clouds rolled up, and there was a burst of flame leaping amid the buildings to the rear of San Francisco's world-famed landmark. Far up the street on the southern side another dark column lowered, and down toward the ferries was a continuous wall of fire.

"The city is doomed," was heard on every lip. The ominous boom of dynamiting sounded intermittently. A company of cavalry clattered down Market Street from the direction of the smoke-cloud, driving the crowds off into the side streets.

From the windows of the Call Building, faint wisps of smoke were floating. Then in a flash, high and low, flames burst out of the shattered windows of the stately tower, and a mighty smoke-cloud rolled in one mass high into the heavens. The Examiner Building opposite became a terrific furnace, its floors collapsed, its festive Spanish front crumbled, and only a fragment of its walls marked the spot. Regulars with cases of dynamite on their shoulders ran to the unfinished Monadnock Building, but neither earthquake, blasting nor fire seemed to make much impression on this structure. Its upper floors contained no inflammable matter and the fire might have been stayed at this point had not another conflagration been moving from the rear upon the Grand and Palace Hotels. How the flames invaded that historic landmark—"The Palace," with its great court and hospitable banquet halls! How they raged through its multitude of rooms, licking off its bow windows, bellowing through its corridors and chambers, while the floor crashed on floor!

So the fire traveled from building to building, from block to block, from street to street, smoke-clouds belching from roofs and windows, granite cracking and crumbling, plate glass shattered to fragments, or melted as by a blowpipe, steel plates bending and twisting, impotent to withstand the advancing holocaust. Automobiles rushed madly back and forth with artillery officers carrying loads of dynamite. In vain they blasted building after building, for out of the very ruins sprang the hungry flames to continue the work of devastation.

Many were the deeds of heroism enacted amid that cataclysmic sweep of flame. Surrounded on all sides by the burning city, hemmed in by a roaring sea of fire, a devoted band of employees of the United States Mint, aided by a guard of regular soldiers, fought against the overwhelming odds. For seven hours were they besieged in that fearful oven, choked with smoke, faint with the heat and exertion, yet undismayed. Nearly two hundred million dollars were in their keeping. With a hand-pump forcing water from the basement well through an inch hose, they wet down the roof and upper story, but despite their heroic stand the fire burst through the windows and they were forced to the lower floor, where iron shutters stayed the flame. The whirlwind of destruction swept by, and again they rushed to the top story and the roof where the woodwork was burning. By 4 o'clock in the afternoon the fire was extinguished and the Mint was saved; the soldiers standing guard over its treasure, the building intact, and round about a far-spread ruin.

By similar efforts of small devoted bands of employees, firemen and soldiers, fighting with bucket brigades, wet blankets and small hose pipe, the splendid new Postoffice building was saved (though afterwards badly damaged by dynamiting), and the fire was turned aside from the Appraisers' building, the branch Postoffice on Sansome and Jackson Streets, and the Montgomery block at the corner of Montgomery and Washington Streets, where a large part of the Sutro Library with its priceless old tomes was stored. These still remain like oases amid the universal devastation—monuments to the unrecorded deeds of heroes.

When it became evident that the city was threatened with destruction, a number of public-spirited citizens, moved as by a common impulse, sought out Mayor Schmitz to offer aid. As the Mayor's office in the City Hall was in ruins, they made their way, one by one, to the badly damaged Hall of Justice at the east of Portsmouth Square, and here they commenced to plan for the relief of the stricken city. Suddenly some one called out:

"It's time to get out of here, gentlemen!"

The air was growing oppressive and stifling. Buildings were being dynamited all about them, and the meeting adjourned to the historic square opposite, where, beside the Robert Louis Stevenson drinking fountain they continued their deliberations. Presently Portsmouth Square became untenable and they moved again, this time going up through Chinatown to the Fairmont Hotel on the summit of Nob Hill. This splendid structure of white stone was nearing completion, but unfinished, and was supposed to be outside the fire zone. After perfecting their organization, electing a secretary and outlining a plan for a "Relief Committee of Fifty," the members scattered to look to the safety of their families.

The sun wheeled down to the sea, a blood-red ball of ill omen. Night came, but in lieu of darkness there was a wild unearthly glare that lit up the streets as on the day of doom. Still the business district north of Market Street and centering at Kearny remained intact, although the opposite side of the great city highway was a dismal wreck. By seven in the evening the insatiable monster began to move up Sutter and Bush Streets. Two hours to the block marked its rate of progress. Meanwhile another conflagration (said to have been started by some housewife a few blocks above the City Hall, who, after the earthquake, lit a fire in her kitchen stove) was moving down-town. By midnight the sentries along the streets were keeping the death watch, for the fire demon was charging from the east and west upon the city's heart, and, ere morning, walls had been calcined and steel frames smelted in this peerless furnace of destruction. The unfinished Chronicle Annex came through the fire little damaged, but the old Chronicle building, the familiar red-brick landmark watching over the crowds that for years have surged around Lotta's Fountain, was but a hollow shell.

Union Square was packed with a motley crowd—guests from the big hotels and denizens of the tenderloin, with trunks and rolls of bedding, all watching the thrilling spectacle as it moved up-town, nearer and nearer, block by block, lighting the midnight darkness with its unearthly awesome glare. The silent rain of ashes increased, and the incandescent air warned the crowd to abandon their trunks and save their lives. The flames worked their will, first to the east, then advancing on the north and south sides. The tall St. Francis Hotel was spared until the early morning watch, when it, too, ignited.

Chinatown was ablaze early in the evening and burned throughout the night, the fire sweeping fiercely through the flimsy oriental city, scattering the inhabitants hither and yon in helpless bands. Out of the narrow alleyways and streets they swarmed like processions of black ants. With bundles swung on poles across their shoulders they retreated, their helpless little women in pantaloons following with the children, all passive and uncomplaining.

In every quarter the night was full of terror. The mighty column of smoke rose thousands of feet in air, crimsoned by the wild sea of flame below it. Scarce a soul ventured to sleep. A procession of weary refugees moved continuously toward Golden Gate Park, the Presidio and the cemeteries. Homeless throngs rallied about the great cross on Lone Mountain, and many a footsore, heartsick mother—with her little ones leaned against overturned tombstones. From the heights the calm starlit night was intensely black in contrast to the vast crater, whence flames leaped in fantastic shreds high above the burning city. There was a ceaseless crash as buildings and homes shuddered and fell in the fiery maelstrom, and the booming of the dynamiting sounded throughout the night.

The Second Day.

Thursday morning dawned, fair and beautiful, but bringing no hope to the inhabitants of the doomed city. As if dissatisfied with its task, the fire turned back toward the water-front and the Latin Quarter north of Market Street, while another great conflagration was raging amid machine-shops and homes of artisans in the Potrero and Mission districts to the south and west. Here the suffering of the people was most poignant, and hungry crowds of homeless poor, gathered in whatever open plot they could find, watched the destruction of all that made life possible for them.

Nine o'clock found a small party of men in an automobile, seeking a road from the water-front to attend the Citizens' Relief Committee meeting at the Fairmont Hotel on the summit of Nob Hill. The Mark Hopkins Institute of Art was afire, and Lieutenant C. C. McMillan was saving the pictures, driving the people to the work at the point of his revolver when they stopped to question his authority. Artillery officers ran up to ask for more dynamite, as their supply was exhausted, and our automobile was soon speeding away for more. Furniture was being hurried from the doomed Flood, Stanford and Crocker mansions atop the hill, for the insatiable red monster was sparing neither rich nor poor that day.

On entering the Fairmont Hotel we found it already afire, the window-sills having ignited. The Citizens' Relief Committee had adjourned to the North End Police Station on Sacramento Street, and thither we hurried on foot. Here we received an officer's tar and a pass through all lines. About the tall figure of the Mayor, in that cramped police office, a group of men crowded in earnest consultation. A list of leading citizens was made out, and work was assigned to each as chairman of a sub-committee.

Meanwhile the fair city of San Francisco upon its many hills was burning, and the bewilderment of people was complete. As I hurried up the hills men stopped me all along the way to ask how far the fire had come and if I thought their homes in danger. Just then a man with a megaphone came dashing down the street in an automobile, shouting continuously, "Time to leave! Time to leave! The fire is coming—only two blocks away!"

People would say to one another, "Surely it will never burn as far as this," but anon the soldiers were ordering them from their homes, driving them at the point of the bayonet if they resisted.

At three o'clock on Thursday afternoon the only hope left was that the Western Addition, including the north end of the peninsula to the west of Van Ness Avenue, and the Mission district beyond Dolores Street, might be saved, these two wide cross-streets offering the first effective break to the fire. Back-firing was tried on Van Ness Avenue as a last desperate expedient. It was a terrible spectacle when all the fine mansions, costly apartment hotels and churches along this broad street were in a blaze. Bright shreds of flame lept frantically up, steeples blazed and crackled, while the colossal pall of smoke spread above the doomed homes. A deafening boom shattered window panes near and far. A blazing building heaved and collapsed, and the firemen rushed upon the scattered embers with the hose-line, for here a scant supply of water was available.

Automobiles passed up the avenue with finely dressed women loaded with Indian baskets, cut-glass bowls and other household treasures. Two men, intent on saving a piano, rolled it for several blocks on the sidewalk until the casters were all broken and it would not budge. They were not to be thwarted, however, and so they commenced banging it along end over end like a huge packing-box. Coatsless and perspiring, they worked until stopped by a policeman on Van Ness Avenue. "Don't you think that piano is about done up?" asked the bluecoat good-naturedly. They stopped and looked, somewhat foolishly, at the piano. The case was fairly burst asunder, the strings snapped, and the instrument a hopeless wreck. But they had saved it from being burned.

When, in the late afternoon, it was learned that despite the most heroic efforts to stay the fire, it had crossed Van Ness avenue, men shook their hids dubiously. There seemed no hope for the remaining residence section. But with the courage of despair the fire-fighters made their stand at Franklin Street, a block to the west, and with dynamite and water succeeded in checking the conflagration at this critical point. For the time being it had been arrested in its triumphal sweep toward the ocean.

But the night was full of terror, for there was still abundant fuel to feed the insatiable flame. Still the crimson cloud swept heavenward—the awfulest torch which human eyes have ever gazed upon. Still the firemen and soldiers fought on without rest or sleep. Still the half-million people, shivering and cold in the dewy night, watched and wondered. Would it be here they were all driven to the bottom of the ocean? The boom of the dynamiting continued, and the crash of falling walls.

The Third Day.

By Friday morning the outlook for the section beyond Van Ness Avenue and Dolores Street was more encouraging. The storm center had now moved toward North Beach. The strong west wind swept the fire back over the unburned district between Van Ness Avenue and the bay. A vast torrent of flame poured down towards Russian and Telegraph Hills and around them in the direction of the water-front. Thousands of refugees thronged the hills, and, as the fire came sweeping closer, they were in imminent danger of destruction. A fleet of tugs and steamers hastened to their rescue, and they embarked at Meiggs Wharf for points across the bay.

The little colony on the summit of Russian Hill made a valiant stand in defense of their homes, again and again beating out the fires with wet rags. The steep rocky slopes rendered their position somewhat isolated. While these scattered groups of men were fighting for their homes, the main wave of fire again rushed threateningly right in the teeth of a stiff west wind, up to Van Ness Avenue, sweeping all to the north of the area burned a day earlier. Again the Western Addition, and for that matter all that remained of the city, was in jeopardy. Houses across the avenue began to smoke and blister. The firemen carried their hose right up to the curb, with fiery walls tottering above them. Some of the men had been without sleep since the earthquake and worked until they fell from exhaustion.

We amateur firemen carried the hose and brought wet cloths to hold before the men on the firing line, where they stood doggedly in the blistering heat playing the water upon the roaring walls. Then there was a rush with buckets and wet blankets for smoking roofs and cornices opposite. When the block was finally saved, a great cheer went up from the onlooking crowd, the only one I heard during all those terrible days.

Late that afternoon I went along the water-front in a launch, and looked upon the burning city. Despite all efforts to arrest the flames, they had invaded the docks and lumber yards about Meiggs Wharf. The open roadstead was crowded with ships, men-of-war and steamers, painted with the ruddy glow that never should be on land or ocean. Awesomely throngs stood upon their decks, gazing at the thrilling spectacle. Fire-tugs were pumping water upon the flames that waved and lashed before the brisk wind. Dynamiters were sending off their thundering blasts. But look, another path of fire has swept down from the hills to the docks! Nothing can save the ferry building and the wharves, we all agreed. But something did save them—the indomitable pluck and courage of those men on the tugs, the deluge of streams of sea water, the heavy blasts of dynamite.

The End of the Fire.

Over the Berkeley hills peered the morning sun, clear and radiant—unmindful that a city, late so joyous, now lay in ruins. It was Saturday, and many a family awoke from the sleep of exhaustion, chilled to the bone in the dewy morning air. Some had tents and blankets, but thousands were without protection, lying upon the ground in the only clothes they had saved. Black clouds of smoke arose from the burning oil and coal on North Beach, and everywhere fires still smoldered, but the mighty conflagration had spent its fury.

What a scene of desolation, where late had stood the proudest city of the Pacific! It might have been a ruin of a thousand years. Nay, even Pompeii or Nineveh or Babylon would not have seemed more ancient. So fierce had been the heat that scarce a trace of charred timber remained. Flames had leaped from the asphalt of the streets, and basalt blocks beneath were chipped and cracked like shale. The very ashes had been sucked up into the fiery vortex and swept away to sea. The wind eddying amid the ruins caught up clouds of lime and brick-dust, but no ashes. Look where you will up the highways, and piled heaps of bricks and snarls of wire block the way. The coloring is of livid red and pale purple, with patches of whitish gray lime and dun ground. Some rows of withered trees or an occasional charred telegraph pole are the only touches of black in the picture.

A narrow foot-path up Market Street alone leads through the business district, and here two silent processions pass in single file, the refugees burdened with their all, slowly moving toward the ferries, and the relief corps hastening to the Mayor's office far out at Franklin Hall, or to the various camps. Express wagons loaded with foodstuffs and automobiles with Red Cross flags flying are also making their way up the winding lane between the brick piles.

Tottering walls rise on either hand, all hollow and crumbling. Great hulks of buildings stand gaunt and defiant. The walls of the Palace Hotel remain, divested of the bulging windows, but the floors have all fallen through, leaving the building but a mockery. The new Monadnock block, which contained almost nothing combustible, is less damaged, but the adjacent Examiner building has been blown to fragments. The Call tower stands proudly, defiant of earthquake though marred by fire—still beautiful and triumphant amid all this misery. The old Chronicle building opposite is gutted, but the unfinished annex towering beside it is practically unscathed.

And thus through the muster of steel-frame, fireproof-cased levellans—the Crocker building, Mills building, Merchants' Exchange, Kohl building, Emporium, Flood building, St. Francis Hotel, Shreve building, and others! They stand, but the fire has consumed all the inflammable material, and some are ruined beyond repair. All structures of less thoroughgoing workmanship are unrecognizable heaps of twisted steel and chaotic masonry.

In the factory district "South of Market" is a jumble of distorted machinery amid the brick piles. In Chinatown and the Latin Quarter, brick walls are half standing, like ruined stalls in the stables of the early gods. At the lower rim of Portsmouth Square the Hall of Justice stands in ruins, its tower toppled over, its brick walls fallen off, and part of its heavy steel cells crashed from the top floor into the basement.

The Stevenson monument remains unscathed, a long row of temporary graves hard by, and a camp of soldiers and refugees round about—a shelter for the living and the dead. Upon the summit of California Street the Fairmont Hotel is the only work of man that breaks the contour of the hill.

Up on the slopes where wooden residences had jostled one another for many a long year, there are blocks upon blocks where no obstacle save an occasional chimney varies the monotony of the shaven crown.

The volume is accompanied by some fifteen photo-process illustrations printed on heavy coated paper. It has a colored design on the cover, the work of Louise Keeler. The publishers deserve great praise for their success in presenting the work in such creditable form. The mechanical difficulties attending its preparation can only be appreciated by those publishers who have gone through the stress and strain of the last hundred days.

"The Secret of my Success"

VANITY FAIR.

Owing to some interesting rumors, the return to the United States of Mrs. Longworth is awaited in Washington social circles with much interest. These rumors are to the effect that she intends to establish a literary and political salon. A Washington correspondent says:

How such a departure will be received in Washington is a source of much difference of opinion. It is also reported that she will undertake to follow that portion of British etiquette which gives to a woman her father's rank and not that of her husband, so she may still be received as the daughter of the President instead of the wife of a junior member of Congress. If she succeeds in these plans she will effect a notable revolution in Washington society.

The San Francisco Chronicle does not believe she will succeed, and says:

There will be a tempest in the Washington society teapot over the question of precedence which it is declared Mrs. Longworth will attempt to raise. Although the daughter of a President she is the wife of a common Congressman, and will have to walk behind the wives of Secretaries, Senators and Speakers unless she wins her point. If she does it will only be after a hard fought battle. There have been some awful scraps at the capital over this subject, and it is not at all probable that the ladies who have been at the head of the procession will allow Alice to walk ahead of them because she is of the house of Roosevelt. There is "blood on the face of the moon."

The Outlook's "Spectator" recently wrote at length on the rudeness of New York. Now similar reflections have been aroused in the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle, which says:

It is commonly believed that New York is the worst mannered city in the world, and the belief is not ill-founded. The visitor to New York had better leave at home all sense of his personal dignity and instinctive objection to being man-handled by aggressive strangers. If he doesn't he will be in constant hot water. The street manners of other cities in the country are bad enough—but in this particular New York bears away the bell.

New Yorkers explain that the rush of life in New York is so great that no one has time to be courteous. This is largely nonsense. It doesn't take any longer to be courteous than to be boorish. There is always time to be courteous. Moreover, the hurry of New Yorkers is largely affectation. A man whose time is worth nothing at all rushes from place to place as if it were worth a hundred dollars a second merely because he wants people to think it is.

Richard Harding Davis is writing a series of articles on "Modern Adventurers"—the successors of the Cid, Roland and of Roncesvalles, Jason, Dugald Dalgetty, Ulysses, Marco Polo and men of that kidney. His latest subject is Winston Spencer Churchill, of whom he says:

Once he ran away to Cuba to fight with the Spaniards.

After this campaign, on the first night of his arrival in London, he made his maiden speech. He delivered it in the Empire Music hall.

At the time Mrs. Ormiston Chant had raised objections to the presence in the music hall of certain young women, and had threatened, unless they ceased to frequent its promenade, to have the license of the music hall revoked. As a compromise, the management ceased selling liquor, and on the night Churchill visited the place, the bar in the promenade was barricaded with scantlings and linen sheets. With the thirst of tropical Cuba still upon him, Churchill asked for a drink, which was denied him, and the crusade was explained.

He scrambled to the velvet-covered top of the railing which divides the auditorium from the promenade and made a speech. It was a plea in behalf of his "Sisters, the Ladies of the Empire Promenade."

"Where," he asked of the ladies themselves and of their escorts crowded below him in the promenade, "does the Englishman in London always find a welcome? Where does he first go, when, battle-scarred and travel-worn, he reaches home? Who is always there to greet him with a smile, and join him in a drink? Who is ever faithful, ever true—the ladies of the Empire promenade."

The laughter and cheers that greeted this, and the tears of the ladies themselves, naturally brought the performance on the stage to a stop, and the vast audience turned in the seats and boxes.

They saw a little red-haired boy, in evening clothes, balancing himself on the rail of the balcony, and around him a great crowd, cheering, shouting and bidding him "Go on!"

Churchill turned with delight to the larger audience, and repeated his appeal. The house shook with laughter and applause.

The commissioners and police tried to reach him and a good-tempered but very determined mob of well-dressed gentlemen and cheering girls fought them back. In triumph Churchill ended his speech by begging his hearers to give "fair play" to the women, and to follow him in a charge upon the barricades.

The charge was instantly made, the barricades were torn down, and the terrified management ordered that drinks be served to its victorious patrons.

Those ladies who intend soon to be presented at the Court of St. James will find the following hints from the Ladies' Field quite useful:

The Queen is addressed as "ma'am" by all the members of the upper classes, the term "Your Majesty" being rarely used except on formal occasions. The King, the Prince of Wales and all the other English princes are addressed as "Sir." Yet foreign princes and princesses bearing the title of Serene Highness must not be addressed as "sir" or "ma'am," but as "prince" or "princess."

A letter to the sovereign must begin thus: "His Majesty the King," and below the single word "Sir." The conclusion of the letter would be worded somewhat as follows: "I have the honor to submit myself Your Majesty's most humble and devoted servant," etc. A letter to the Prince of Wales should begin thus: "To His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales," on a lower line "Sir," and then the letter would be proceeded with.

When the King and Queen play bridge or any other round game money fresh from the mint must be provided, and when any member of the reigning family joins in a game of cards new money is usually supplied.

Peek-a-boo waists and diaphanous clothing must go. The Los Angeles Women's Christian Temperance Union has so decreed. Members of the local union have declared themselves unequivocally upon the subject. The fiat went forth last week. The death knell of the peek-a-boo waist and the clinging, diaphanous skirt was sounded at a meeting of the union. The scene was an extraordinary one. Every member present appeared excited over the issue, and, by a rising vote, the official stamp of disapproval was placed upon the alluring waists.

The audience granted by Queen Alexandra to Mrs. Whitelaw Reid and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth was entirely private and informal. The only other persons present were the Hon. Charlotte Knollys, always called "Chatty" by the Queen, and Lady Alice Stanley. The Queen received her visitors in her boudoir, and what delighted her Majesty particularly about the President's daughter was her distinct speech. The Queen is far deader than she was even a few years ago, and Miss Knollys had hinted beforehand to Mrs. Longworth to move her lips carefully when talking without raising her voice too much. Shouting annoys the Queen intensely, as she is very sensitive about her affliction. The Queen asked innumerable questions about America, and especially about the daily life of the President. All sorts of photographs and souvenirs never shown to ordinary visitors were brought out for Mrs. Reid and Mrs. Longworth. Altogether the audience, which became a very informal tea party, lasted over an hour and a half.

Just before leaving America's kindly shores the Gaekwar of Baroda delivered himself of a long disquisition upon Yankeeland in general and American women in particular. The Maharajah said:

"As in any country as new as this, society is bound to be somewhat crude. What you call the higher class, as well as the middle class, we found exceedingly kind and hospitable. I must admit, however, that very frequently I met a spirit of curiosity, which, in my poor opinion, merged almost upon vulgarity.

"I found American women independent, self-possessed and high spirited, but I must own they are not as beautiful as I had been led to expect. I had heard a great deal about the beauty of your women, but I did not find them particularly beautiful, although they are very attractive."

Sir Walter Besant was a strong advocate of "The endowment of the daughter," as he called it in an article on the subject. There have been since his death some rather satirical remarks because he apparently did not follow his own doctrine, but the London Sphere declares that this is false.

"The very small sum given in the newspapers at the proving of the will was as misleading as it nearly always is. Both his daughters, who are now happily married, were well provided for, and thus it will be seen that the author of 'All Sorts and Conditions of Men' carried out his own oft-expressed conviction as to the duties of all fathers, whatever their position in life, to dower their daughters."

An old bachelor will "go" with the most fascinating women for years and escape. Then suddenly he will be captured. How do the successful women manage it? And another peculiar thing is that the women who succeed in landing wary old bachelors are either divorced women or stenographers. Society women who make a business of looking for husbands never land these rare catches.

While a wedding breakfast was being held in a restaurant at Fresno les Rungis, a naval officer in uniform entered the room, and was invited to preside over the feast. He made himself very agreeable, sang songs and delivered speeches. He was proposing the bride's health when two policemen rushed in and arrested him as an escaped lunatic from a neighboring asylum. It is further asserted that he thereupon politely turned to the officers and said: "I think you have made a mistake, gentlemen. There"—pointing to the bridegroom—"is the man you want."

All the characters except two in the play which George Ade is writing are women. The scene is Radcliffe college.

STAGE GOSSIP.

On a deadwall in San Jose is an old poster bearing the suggestive legend: "The Lion and the Mouse," Wednesday, April 18.

Mme. Sembrich is now at her home in Berlin, chiefly engaged in repairing the ravages which the San Francisco catastrophe made in her operatic and personal wardrobe.

"H. M. S. Pinafore" is being sung at the Opera House, Oakland. Sybil Page has the role of Josephine, Hope Mayne is little Buttercup, Arthur Cunningham is the captain and Ferris Hartman is Sir Joseph Porter.

Miss d'Arville's return to the stage after several years' retirement following her marriage to a wealthy Californian, will be an event of no little interest; she will head a big comic opera organization in a new play which is to be produced in the early autumn.

A new theater, to cost $75,000, has been nearly completed at McAllister and Leavenworth streets, and will be owned by a dramatic stock company, under the direction of Frank Bacon. It will be named the Colonial. Martin Atzig is the proprietor and financial backer of the enterprise.

"Lady Jim," by Harold Heaton, is the play in which Hilda Spong will make her first appearance as a star next season.

Actresses rarely marry between seasons. It is more profitable from the advertising standpoint to embark upon the matrimonial sea late in the fall.

The Late Julie Rosewald.

It is only a few weeks since we published a letter in these columns from Madame Julie Rosewald, tinged with great grief over the disaster which had befallen San Francisco, and expressing in pathetic terms her affection for our stricken city and her determination to return here. Since then, news has come that Madame Rosewald passed away on July 16, at Wildbad, in the Black Forest. An Argonaut reader who in common with many of us was a warm admirer of the deceased lady sends us the following biographical sketch concerning her:

Madame Julie Rosewald was born in Stuttgart, the musical center of South Germany, in which city, at the age of 11 she was placed at the Conservatory of Music for a general musical education. At the age of 12 she entered the Royal Theatrical School, a great distinction, as tuition there is paid for by the King of Wurtemberg. Her operatic debut was made in Canada, under the management of C. D. Hess, and so great was Madame Rosewald's success that Hess made a contract with her to go to California with a repertoire of fifteen operas. Later on she embraced the opportunity of singing in her native land, and made her German debut in Wurtemberg in "The Huguenots," singing subsequently in Cologne, Bale, Bielefeld, Frankfurt, Mayence, Amsterdam, Stuttgart and Dresden. The result was a most flattering contract for a permanent engagement of three years at the Dresden Royal Opera, but she preferred to return to the United States, where she accepted an engagement with the Emma Abbott Company, her husband filling the position of director. After several very successful seasons together in the Abbott company, Mr. and Mrs. Rosewald decided to leave the publicity of stage life and establish a home for themselves, settling teaching as a profession. Mr. Rosewald was a master of the violin, and his wife, after a short period, attained the reputation of being by far the best singing teacher on the Pacific Coast. Her death occurred suddenly; she had been stricken with paralysis on three days before and appeared to be in no immediate danger.

Madame Rosewald leaves a host of mourning friends and disciples behind. She was an excellent woman and an excellent musician, and her place will not be filled. To have known her was a privilege and a benefit; and her memory will long be felt among California women, to whose musical training she devoted her great talent and best years.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

La Belle Otero, the most famous dancer in Paris, has insured her ankles against sprain for $80,000 each.

F. D. Coburn, the new Senator from Kansas, began life as a farmhand at $12 a month.

When Edouard de Reszke comes to this country next fall to sing he will begin all over again. Most of the money that he made here has been lost.

Baron Komura, the Mikado's chief representative at the peace conference in Portsmouth, succeeds Viscount Hayashi as Japanese ambassador to London.

Don Manuel Estrada Cabrera, President of Guatemala, unlike most of the Central American rulers, is not a soldier. His public life has been that of a lawyer eminent in his profession.

Edward Halton James, a Harvard graduate, has abandoned the practice of law in Seattle and is working as a common farmhand. He is testing his socialistic views. An uncle is Henry James, the novelist.

Ibsen at sixty-one, sour and grey, was in love with a girl of twenty as is shown by a series of letters, written by the poet to a beautiful Austrian girl, which Professor Brandes has just published in a Copenhagen journal.

In Paris the photographs of Mlle. Elise de Vere, a variety artist, sell best. She has a close second in Cleo de Merode and Mlle. Robins. Pierre Loti comes next, with Loubet, Fallieres, Rejane, Paul Bourget, Theodore Roosevelt, Yvette Guilbert and Santos Dumont in order as named.

The German Foreign Minister is considering the purchase of the house at Vaillima, Samoa, formerly owned by Robert Louis Stevenson, as a residence for the governor. The house was sold by Mr. Stevenson's heirs to a Hamburg merchant named Herr Kunst. It is the finest residence on the island, less than an hour's drive from Apia. Kunst died recently.

Prince Eugene Murat of Bavaria was killed near Munich, July 26, by the overturning of his automobile while he was on the way to Carlsbad. He was the oldest son of Prince Louis Napoleon Murat, who was the son of Prince Joachim Murat, who was born in Bordentown, N. J., and married Miss Caroline Fraser of Bordentown. Prince Joachim was the son of the Prince of Naples, who fled to Bordentown with his father, ex-King of Naples, after the downfall of Napoleon. His wife, Violette Elchingen, is a descendant of another famous marshal of the First Napoleon, Ney, who was created Duke of Elchingen. She was born in 1878.

Edith Helena, the soprano, will be heard at the Orpheum on Sunday afternoon. She comes direct from Europe, where she has sung in London twenty-four weeks and in Madrid, Paris, Berlin, Vienna, Milan, Munich, Brussels and Barcelona. Frank Gardner, Lottie Vincent and their company will present their original spectacular fantasy, "Winning a Queen," the very latest idea in vaudeville. They are great favorites in this city. The Proveanis, six trick cyclists of international reputation, will make their first appearance in San Francisco. They open their act with a graceful bicycle ballet, containing many intricate movements, and present a succession of wheeling surprises that cause their spectators to marvel. The limber-limbed Reiff brothers, singers, and dancers, will complete the list of newcomers. Edward Clark and the "Six Winning Widows" will continue their interesting specialty, while Billy Van will change his chatter with the rising inflection and sing new songs. Carter and Bluford, with their numerous changes of costume, the Lucania trio of acrobats, equalibrists and contortionists, and Orpheum Motion Pictures, will complete a varied and interesting program.

LITERARY NOTES.

Sport in Southern California.

In "Life in the Open; Sport With Rod, Gun, Horse and Hounds in Southern California," Charles Frederick Holder presents the impressions of a score of years of hunting days. With fine enthusiasm the author describes cross country runs with hounds after the nimble hare and lowland wolf; the joys and perils of hunting the lynx, the mountain lion, the big-horn, the wild goat and the deer in the Sierra Madre; and the royal sport for Waltonians in brook and lake and along shore. There is no day in this all-the-year-round land that has not its invitation for the lover of sport and nature.

Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons; $3.50.

New York Politics.

In two volumes of some 400 pages each, DeAlva Stanwood Alexander has written a history of "that most unfathomable of subjects, the politics of the State of New York." The work treats of the movements of political parties and their leaders in the Empire State from 1777 to 1861, although the author announced in the first volume his intention to bring the history down to the year 1896. Hamilton, Burr, the Clintons, Van Buren, Seymour and Weed are the central figures in the narrative.

Published by Henry Holt & Co.; $2.50 net per volume.

The Journal of a Gentleman Farmer.

Altogether charming is "On Common Ground," by Sydney H. Preston. Those to whom the whimsical, daintily sentimental volumes of Roy Rolfe Gilson, or Donald Mitchell, are a delight, will be extremely pleased to meet Merrivale, the gentle city-bred bachelor. Very entertaining, genuinely humorous and pleasantly fanciful are his experiences as a "gentleman farmer." His description of his adventures in search of his hens, who have wandered far afield, is full of fun.

Published by Henry Holt & Co.; $1.25.

Foibles of the Bench.

Henry S. Wilcox of the Chicago bar, author of "Foibles of the Bench," has evidently had a hard time with the judiciary, although he assures us he is not trying to "get even." He holds up a number of types of judges for ridicule and censure.

American Poems.

"American Poems, 1776-1900," is intended to serve as an introduction to the systematic study of American poetry. It is a useful and intelligently edited little anthology. Brief critical comments and explanatory notes and biographical sketches that really inform are supplied by Augustus White Long of Princeton.

Published by the American Book Company.

How Ferns Grow.

Advanced students of the fern and botanists generally will be interested in "How Ferns Grow," by Margaret Slosson. The book is illustrated with forty-six plates by the author. The layman, to whom the fern is but a delicate-bit of greenery, will be astonished at the formidable lore with which science encompasses the plant. Who would suppose that the dainty branchlet of a maidenhair fern is "borne on rachis below one of basal pinnae; pinnae lanceolate; oblong deltoid, the apical cuneate; outermost basal pinnae sometimes bifid, etc.?" The author points out the principal features of the development of form and venation in fern leaves, as seen in the species of the northeastern United States.

Who's Who on the Stage.

"The Green Room Book" is a biographical record of the dramatic and musical world—a "who's who" of the stage. The book includes not only biographies of actors and actresses, in the stricter meaning of the phrase, but also notices of the principal variety artists, dramatists, musical composers, conductors, critics, managers and proprietors of the United Kingdom, America and the Continent. The details of the entries have been supplied largely by the subjects themselves, hence accuracy is assured.

Twelfth Night.

"Twelfth Night" is the ninth volume in the "First Folio" edition of Shakespeare, edited by Charlotte Porter and Helen A. Clarke. The spelling and punctuation of the original text are given and the play is freed from the editorial changes of three centuries. This is the only reprinting of the First Folio in handy form. The book is a model of typographical beauty.

Published by Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.; $1.00.

Italian Romance Writers.

American readers are singularly unfamiliar with the works of the modern Italian novelists. In "Italian Romance Writers" Joseph Spencer Kennard gives us fourteen admirable critiques of the best known story writers. Mr. Kennard begins with Manzoni, whose practice it was to omit love scenes and tender endearments from his novel, and ends with D'Annunzio, who probably pronounces that paragraph faulty that has not in it some passionate expression. D'Azeglio, Guerrazzi, Grossi, Nievo, De Amicis, Fogazzaro, Verga, Serao, De Roberto, Neera and Butti are also the subjects of eloquent appreciations.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

"On Art and Artists" is the title of a work by Dr. Max Nordau. Whistler, Rodin, Meunier, Carriere and others are vividly characterized, and in some cases Dr. Nordau's judgments differ widely from those generally accepted.

New novels that will soon appear are "The Call of the Blood," by Robert Hichens, "Listener's Lure," by E. V. Lucas, "Les Desenchantees," by Pierre Loti, "The White Plumes of Navarre," by S. R. Crockett; and volumes by Hall Caine, Louis Tracey and Mary Johnston.

Catulle Mendes, critic, playwright and academician, has just received a gold medal for cooking. It was awarded by the jury of a culinary exhibition for his latest dish, "Carpe la Mendes."

Marie Corelli's new novel "The Treasure of Heaven, a Romance of Riches," appeared in London on July 31st with her portrait as a frontispiece.

Ex-President Cleveland has gathered some hunting papers into a volume that is about to appear.

It is intended to form a Thackeray Club in London.

Thackeray's Lord Steyne is said to have been a pen portrait of an ancestor of Lord Yarmouth, who married Harry Thaw's sister. The Lord Yarmouth whose picture was painted in Steyne married Mlle. Fagniana, who inherited from George Selwyn £30,000, £150,000 from another man and still another immense sum from Fagniana.

John Adams Thayer has sold part of his stock in Everybody's Magazine and has retired from active participation in the Ridgway-Thayer Company June 1, though retaining an interest in the company that makes him the third largest stockholder. His reason for this action it is said, is an unwillingness to join in launching a new magazine which the company contemplates putting out—a weekly. Mr. Thayer has been instrumental in building the advertising patronage of Everybody's from $120,000 a year to over $750,000, and leaves the advertising department in charge of Robert Frothingham, formerly advertising manager of Life. His interest is said to have brought $250,000. No change in the policy of Everybody's is contemplated. The chief stockholders are Erman Ridgway and G. W. Wilder, the latter the active head of the Butterick Publishing Company.

Handsomely printed, prettily illustrated and miserably written is "The Cloud Kingdom," by I. Henry Wallis, a collection of verse for children. Published by the John Lane Company.

All the mechanical work of the Baedeker handbooks, including the printing, map-making and binding, is done in Germany, most of it in Leipzig, where the firm has been established since 1872. Before that its seat was at Coblenz. The connection of the Baedeker family with the book trade goes back to Diederich Baedeker, who died at Bielefeld in 1716 as königlich-preussischer privilegierter Buchdrucker. Since his day there has been an unbroken line of printing or publishing Baedekers, forming a good example of that honorable commercial hereditry so difficult to parallel out of Germany.

The Singing Carpenter.

The following story is told at the expense of a New York theatrical manager:

"We were engaged one morning testing voices for a summer production, the manager, musical director and myself. There was a rather long line, and all looking for positions in the chorus, and nearly every voice was below the standard, which was very disappointing, and the manager got to be very irritable as we reached the last of the applicants, who was a very melancholy looking man. As he came to the piano he attempted to make some remark, but was promptly cut short by the manager, who said:

"You will omit all preliminary remarks and get down to business! Try him," he added, turning to the director.

"The latter began the accompaniment to a popular song, which with some hesitancy the applicant for a job attempted with what voice he had. His effort was about as bad as it could have been.

"Look here!" cut in the manager, after the singer had cleared his throat for the second verse, 'that will do! You actually have the nerve to ask me for a job?"

"Certainly," replied the sad one, in an injured tone.

"Why, man, you can't sing a bit!"

"I don't claim to be able to sing," calmly responded the man, 'and I don't want to sing. I am a stage carpenter. I was only singing to please you people—you seemed so set on it."

MRS. M. J. WARREN

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Lady Lytton, wife of the novelist, Bulwer Lytton, wrote of the widow who became the wife of Lord Beaconsfield: "My mother went to call upon Mrs. Wyndham Lewis to condole with her upon the death of her husband. She had no sooner entered the room than the widow came forth all smiles and eagerness. 'Congratulate me, my dear,' she said. 'Disraeli has proposed.'"

An American artist, during his student days in the Latin Quarter in Paris, was passionately fond of honey, and of a particularly good kind which he secured in a little restaurant in the quarter. The waiters became accustomed to him and usually had a dish on his table. The student married, and some months later brought his bride to the restaurant and incidentally gave her taste the honey of his bachelor days. As they sat down to the table he noticed the absence of his usual delicacy and called to the waiter, "Hey, where's my honey?" The waiter, stranger, looked puzzled for a moment, and then his face clearing, with satisfaction at the thought of exhibiting his familiarity with "rag-time" Americanisms, winked knowingly, and in a hoarse stage whisper, remarked: "Ah, yes, you mean ze leetle black-balled one? She ees not here now, but perhaps I could find out for ze gentleman where she go!" As the ex-student assured the waiter that it was not necessary, he caught his bride's eye, and the meal was finished in silence—without the honey.

When I was connected with the Ananias Traveler, said Opie Read, I one day called upon a large advertiser to solicit his patronage. Naturally, the first question he asked was as to the circulation of my paper. "Where does it go?" he queried. "Where does it go?" I replied. "Why, it goes North and it goes South; it goes East and it goes West; and would have gone to hell long ago if it had not been for me."

A young physician in a thriving eastern town was awakened at midnight by a violent ringing of the door-bell. He scrambled into his clothes and hurried downstairs. A well-dressed man was standing at the door. "Doctor," said the stranger breathlessly, "you're wanted immediately out at the Country Club. Can you come right away?"

"Certainly, sir. Just step inside a moment while I 'phone for my horse. I'll be there in a jiffy."

It was a good five miles to the Country Club. Just beyond stood a cluster of suburban homes.

The yellow house on the left there," said the stranger as he alighted from the buggy. "By the way, I forgot to ask the amount of your fee."

"Four dollars," said the doctor. The stranger peeled off four one-dollar bills and passed them to the doctor.

"That'll be all, thank you, doctor. One of those pirate hackmen up in town would do it for less than six."

John Sharp Williams had an engagement to speak in a small Southern town. The train he was traveling on was not of the swiftest, and he lost no opportunity of keeping the conductor informed as to his opinions of that particular road.

"Well, if yer don't like it," the conductor finally blurted out, "why in tarnation don't yer git out an' walk?"

"Would," Mr. Williams blandly replied, "but you see the committee don't expect me until this train gets here."

A certain Doctor of Divinity was accustomed to slip down a side aisle at the conclusion of his service and be at the door of exit to greet the people as they passed out. He was especially cordial to strangers.

One Sunday he extended his hand to a young German woman, who, in answer to his inquiry, said she lived in a certain suburb. The minister then told her he would like to call and see her some time, whereupon the girl, with a blush, stammered:

"Please, sir, I've got a young man already!"

Thus spoke Congressman Cushman in a duel of wit with Bourke Cockran:

My admiration of Mr. Cockran was so great that a few days ago I said to a friend of his, "Is it possible that in all of those masterful and misleading addresses which the gentleman 'pulls off' upon this floor that he speaks entirely without preparation—absolutely extempore? Has the gentleman no thought of what he is going to say when he rises to speak?"

And his friend said to me, "Mr. Cushman, I not only assure you that Cockran has no idea of what he is going to say when he rises to his feet, but what is more wonderful than that, he speaks with such unusual fluency and enthusiasm that he does not even know what he has said when he sits down."

Russell Sage, the millionaire, hated lawsuits and always tried to avoid one if possible.

One day he went to his lawyer and laid the details of a case before him. When Mr. Sage was through the lawyer said he would be delighted to take the case; Mr. Sage had a sure case—one, the lawyer said, he couldn't possibly lose.

"I can't lose," asked Mr. Sage. "You can't lose," positively replied the lawyer.

"I guess I won't bring suit, then," said Mr. Sage.

"But why not?" asked the lawyer in amazement.

"Because," replied Mr. Sage as he took up his hat, "it wasn't my side of the case, but my opponent's side, that I laid before you."

One day when William M. Evarts, Secretary of State under President Hayes, was a college student, he was called on to read Virgil in class.

He started out bravely: "Three times I strove to cast my arms around her neck, and—and—" adding lamely, "That's as far as I got, professor."

"Well, Mr. Evarts," said the professor, "I think that was quite far enough."

William H. Crane, the actor, was recently asked how it was that he never attempted serious Shakespearean roles.

"But I did once," replied the comedian. "Years ago, in the West, I played 'Hamlet.'"

"Did you, indeed?" said an admirer and friend. "Didn't you have a great success? Didn't the audience call you before the curtain?"

"Call me," replied Crane. "Why, man, they dared me!"

When Meyerbeer died his son composed a funeral march which "remembered his dead father." Full of emotion, the young man took it to Rossini.

"Play it, maestro," he pleaded; "play it. I wrote it in expression of my grief and mourning for my dead father."

Rossini took it up and placed it on his piano and played it. Tears rolled down his cheeks. Utter sadness dwelt upon his countenance.

"You weep," cried young Meyerbeer, beside himself with joy at the effect upon the great master.

"Because," replied Rossini, "I am wishing that you were dead and it was your father who had written the funeral march."

Two boys who managed to be rather unruly in school so exasperated their teacher that she requested them to remain after hours and write their names one thousand times. They plunged into the task. Some fifteen minutes later one of them grew uneasy and began watching his companion in disgrace. Suddenly the first one burst out with despair between his sobs, and said to the teacher:

"'Tain't fair, mum! His name's Bush and mine's Schluttermeyer."

The News From Peterhof.

What's the news from Peterhof—from quiet little Peterhof, From peaceful little Peterhof, where Nicholas resides?

What's the double guard about? And what's the fighting hard about? And what's the bloody yard about? And what's the row, besides?

What's the news from Peterhof—from restless little Peterhof, From sweet, Edenic Peterhof, where Nicholas retires?

What's the din and roar about? And what's the bolted door about? And what's the running gore about? And what are all the fires?

What's the news from Peterhof—from cosy little Peterhof, From soothing little Peterhof, of which we've often read?

Whose corse is that upon his shield? What man is that the Cossack steeled?

And why is Nicholas concealed in underneath his bed?

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Manager George D. Dornin advises that the City Department of the Springfield is now open in the Kohl Building. The General Department will occupy its old quarters on the California-street side, third floor, as soon as rooms are restored, and furniture, now ordered, made ready. Temporary Department headquarters will remain for the present at 1112 Broadway, Oakland. The Springfield is among the companies which are adjusting and paying policy holders' claims in the San Francisco disaster involving $1,600,000. The payment of this sum will leave the company's capital $2,000,000, its reserve for reinsurance (or unearned) premiums $3,132,531.32, as appears by its financial statement of December 31, 1905, intact, and a net surplus of over $400,000. The assets of the Springfield at the close of 1905 were $7,156,531.72.

Army and Navy.

Rear Admiral W. T. Swinburne, U. S. N., commissioned rear admiral from July 22nd, 1906, has been detached from duty as a member of the general board of the navy and as a member of the army and navy joint board, Washington, D. C., and ordered to duty as commander-in-chief of the Pacific squadron, hoisting his flag on the Chicago, relieving Rear Admiral Casar F. Goodrich, U. S. N., who is ordered home to await orders.

Major General Adolphus W. Greely, U. S. A., who has been in command of the Pacific Division since the retirement of General Sumner, U. S. A., in February, returned on Monday of last week from a ten days' tour of inspection in the Department of the Columbia, and left the following day for the east on his leave, which was interrupted by his return here at the time of the fire. General Greely, accompanied by Mrs. Greely, went from here to Benicia, where he spent one day, and then from there to Tahoe, where they spent a day, going thence directly East. General Greely will spend most of his leave in Massachusetts, and on September 15th will go to St. Louis, Mo., to assume command of the Northern Division.

Major General Arthur MacArthur, U. S. A., arrived from the Orient on the ship Manchuria on Thursday of last week and re-assumed command of the Pacific Division and also temporarily of the Departments of California and Columbia during the absence of their respective commanders at the maneuvers at Camp Tacoma. Accompanying General MacArthur were Mrs. MacArthur, Lieutenant Douglas MacArthur, U. S. A., aide-de-camp, and Lieutenant Arthur MacArthur Jr., U. S. N., and Mrs. MacArthur. Lieutenant MacArthur, U. S. N., has recently been relieved from duty in the Orient and ordered home.

Colonel John P. Wissner, U. S. A., acting inspector general of the Pacific Division, has been ordered to Camp Tacoma, Washington, for duty during the maneuvers, as inspector general of the camp.

Major Charles B. Hardin, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., has appeared during the past week before the army retiring board at the Presidio of San Francisco, consisting of Colonel Charles Morris, Artillery Corps, U. S. A.; Colonel George M. Dunn, U. S. A., judge advocate of the Department of California; Colonel William H. Comegys, Pay Department, U. S. A.; Colonel Daniel M. Appel, Medical Department, U. S. A.; and Captain James Kennedy, Medical Department, U. S. A.

Major Samuel W. Dunning, U. S. A., Military Secretary of the Pacific Division, and Captain William C. Wren, U. S. A., acting Chief Quartermaster of the Department of California, returned on Sunday evening from several days' stay at the Bohemian Club Hotel at Bohemian Grove, Russian River.

Captain Eugene P. Jervy Jr., Tenth Cavalry, U. S. A., who was stationed here last winter as aide-de-camp to General S. S. Sumner, U. S. A., and who rejoined his regiment upon General Sumner's retirement, has been granted two months' leave of absence on account of sickness.

Captain Robert McMillan, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., and Mrs. McMillan, who have been visiting Mrs. McMillan's parents, Mr. and Mrs. T. Z. Blumman in this city, since leaving the quarters at the Presidio, left on Monday for the East, Captain McMillan having been ordered to Fort Moultrie, South Carolina.

Captain George C. Nugent, U. S. A., has been ordered to proceed to Manila for temporary duty, on the transport sailing from this port. He will be relieved from duty as quartermaster of the Presidio post by Colonel William C. Davis, Artillery Corps, U. S. A.

Captain George B. Pond, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., has been granted leave for one month and fifteen days, to take effect on September 12th.

Lieutenant Raymond H. Fenner, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Fort Baker, has been granted twenty-one days' leave of absence dating from August 1st. Lieutenant and Mrs. Fenner returned early in the week from a brief trip to Yosemite Valley, and he left this week for the East, and will report at Fort Monroe, Virginia, for a year's course in the Artillery School. Mrs. Fenner will remain at Fort Baker until the end of September.

Lieutenant G. W. Winterburn, who rendered efficient service in the relief work under Major Devol, left on Tuesday last for Fort Leavenworth, where he will enter a second year's course in the staff college. Mrs. Winterburn will remain here with friends for a few weeks longer.

Lieutenant Thomas E. Selfridge, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., has been ordered to proceed to West Point, New York, to report for duty at the United States Military Academy on August 22nd. Lieutenant Selfridge, who is a son of Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Selfridge of this city, has been stationed at the Presidio of San Francisco for about two years.

Lieutenant Caspar Goodrich, U. S. N., has been detached from the Chicago and ordered home to wait orders.

Lieutenant Haywood S. Hansen, assistant surgeon, U. S. A., Presidio of San Francisco, has been ordered to proceed to Camp Tacoma to report to General Funston, U. S. A., for temporary duty during the maneuvers, relieving Captain Irving N. Rand, assistant surgeon, U. S. A., who will return without delay to his proper station, the Presidio of San Francisco.

Lieutenant Randal Kernan, Philippine Scouts, U. S. A., has been ordered to proceed to the Army General Hospital, Presidio of San Francisco, to report for examination by a board of medical officers to determine his physical fitness for re-appointment for a second term of service with the Philippine Scouts. The board consists of Captain James M. Kennedy, assistant surgeon, U. S. A.; Captain Roderic P. O'Connor, assistant surgeon, U. S. A., and Lieutenant W. R. Eastman, assistant surgeon, U. S. A.

Surgeon Charles Kindelberger, U. S. N., who has recently been stationed at Mare Island and left a few months since for Manila, has been ordered to the naval station of Olongapo, P. I.

Lieutenant Douglas C. McDougal, U. S. M. C., has been recently under treatment at the Naval Hospital in New York City, and upon being discharged from there is ordered to the Marine Barracks, Washington, D. C., and thence to Camp Admiral Harrington, Williamsburg, Virginia, for duty with the Marine Corps rifle team.

Lieutenant Chauncey L. Fenton, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., has been relieved from duty in the Philippines and ordered to West Point for duty. Lieutenant Fenton, who returned last week on the Logan, went out last spring on the transport Dix from Seattle, in charge of the horses of the batteries which sailed then from this port.

Lieutenant John Mel, U. S. R. C. S., has been commissioned a first lieutenant, to date from July 8th.

Orders have been issued by the War Department changing the system of appointing examining boards for the promotion of officers. Instead of convening temporary boards at various posts throughout the country where most convenient and where examinations were necessary, as heretofore, boards more or less permanent will be established as follows: For the Subsistence Department at Chicago, Illinois; Quartermaster and Pay departments, at Washington, D. C.; Corps of Engineers, at New York and San Francisco; Ordnance Department, at Sandy Hook Proving Grounds, New Jersey; Signal Corps, at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas; Medical Department, at Washington, D. C., and the Presidio of San Francisco; Cavalry, at Fort Riley, Kansas; Coast Artillery, at Fort Monroe, Virginia; Field Artillery, at Fort Riley, Kansas; Infantry, at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas. When necessary boards for the examination of officers of the various departments, corps and arms of the service will be convened by direction of the Secretary of War at Manila or the other large posts in the vicinity of that city.

Company I, Signal Corps, U. S. A., will, on arrival this month on the transport Thomas from the Philippines, take station at Benicia Barracks.

The fall target practice of naval vessels will be commenced about September 25th and for the Pacific squadron will be held near the entrance to Puget Sound. The fall practice is not competitive but is for the purpose of training gun crews, developing theories, putting theories into practice and the execution of various problems of evolution.

The home of Lieutenant Charles O. Thomas, First Cavalry, U. S. A. and Mrs. Thomas (nee Bessie Hannay) has been brightened by the advent of a daughter born on Sunday last.

The home of Dr. and Mrs. George B. Somers (nee May Hooper) has been brightened by the advent of a son.

Among the arrivals at Byron Hot Springs for the past week are: Mr. E. W. Hopkins, Mr. and Mrs. F. W. McNear, Miss Florence Hopkins, Mr. F. N. Wilson, Mr. John C. Klein, Mr. Samuel D. Mayer, Miss Mae Sadler, Miss Agnes Foster Buchanan, Mrs. Henry Wetherbee and Dr. F. H. Brown.

Man and the Quake.
Oh, man is a creature
Who cannot be tricked;
He never discovers
When he has been licked.

His buildings are tumbled,
His foundations raked,
He hasn't a notion
That he has been quaked.

His homes are in ashes,
To cinders have turned.
He has no idea
That he has been burned.

So cheer for the fellow
Who knows not rebuff,
Who never to Nature
Has hollered "Enough."

I Remember.

I remember, I remember
The house where I was born,
The stained-glass windows where the sun
Came peeping in at morn;
And Mama had such diamonds,
Such bows, and hearts, and stars!
And Papa had such splendid yachts,
And lovely private cars!

I remember, I remember
The parties they would hold,
The dinners and the dances, when
The favors were of gold;
For Papa was the president
Of an insurance co.,
But when the public got too wise,
Our grandeur had to go!

Organized Labor in the Congressional Fight.

The charge of battle was thrown down by Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, when he announced at the close of the Congressional session that organized labor would attempt to elect certain Congressmen, who were mentioned by Gompers has now issued a call for a dollar contribution from each member of the Federation of Labor to carry on the Congressional campaign. The men whom he hopes to defeat are Speaker Cannon of Illinois, Jenkins of Wisconsin, Parker of New Jersey, Vreeland of Pennsylvania, Vreeland of New York, McCall of Missouri, McCall of Massachusetts, and Littlefield of Maine. Three of these gentlemen are members of the Committee on Labor, which committee did not please the Federation of Labor; hence they are marked for defeat. McCall and Littlefield incurred the hostility of the Federation of Labor by their attitude toward various bills affecting labor interests, Littlefield particularly by his firm stand on the anti-injunction bill and the eight-hour bill.

The first hostilities will take place in Maine, where Congressman Littlefield comes up for election in September. Two years ago he carried his district by over 5,000. It is believed in Maine that this majority will be reduced, but that it will not be wiped out. Coming from Maine we have no labor journals from which to gather facts, but both the Republican and Democratic papers in that State believe that the workingmen of Maine will vote according to their party lines. President Gompers seems to think differently. We shall all know more after the election, but it would seem to us as if Mr. Gompers had been rash in selecting Littlefield in Maine and Cannon in Illinois as the first victims to offer up on the altar of outraged Labor. Both are extremely able men; both have reputations that are national; both are popular in Washington and at home; and both have been invariably elected by large majorities. Mr. Gompers would have been wiser to select weaker candidates. But if he should defeat these two, the greater will be the glory to the great god Labor.

Earthquakes Even in Cockney Land.

The assumption of the crooked cockney companies that they are not responsible for fire following an earthquake ought to be known to their policy holders in the Land of Cockayne. Earthquakes are by no means confined to California, nor are they peculiar to semi-tropical or sub-tropical lands. They are experienced in nearly every part of the globe, although local disturbances are more frequent in the vicinity of volcanoes. Shocks such as we experienced last April, however, may be looked for either in the Arctic or the Antarctic zone, from the equator to the poles. Such shocks are not volcanic, but tectonic; they are the result of slips in the strata of the earth's crust; they may occur anywhere. They sometimes happen in parts of the world where earthquakes have previously been unknown in historic times. On the other hand, in countries like California, where slight shocks are frequent, severe shocks sometimes occur, and these severer disturbances are usually followed by periods of terrestrial tranquillity which may endure for many years.

Still no country can claim absolute exemption from earthquakes. The great shock at Lisbon in 1755—the most destructive ever known in a civilized country—was followed by a period of tranquillity extending over a century and a half down to the present day. So with the great earthquake shock in what is now the Middle Western part of the United States. The evidences of that great disturbance are plainly to be noted in the Mississippi Valley to-day. Had there been living in that valley then such a population as is found there to-day, the loss of human life would have been something colossal.

Is England free from Earthquake?

The crooked cockney companies hail from a land which is certainly not balmy or tropical, and which from a climatic point of view is renowned principally for rain, fog, and mud. But even perfidious Albion has its earthquakes. It is only a few weeks since a shock took place in the great smelting district around Swansea of which the London Chronicle says: "Hundreds of chimneys collapsed, and several public buildings, including the jail and general postoffice, sustained injury. A number of women and children became panic stricken, leaped from windows, and otherwise injured themselves."

Sir Norman Lockyer, the Astronomer Royal, is quoted by the press as saying that the large cities and towns employing electric power passed through serious peril in this earthquake. "Suppose," he is quoted as saying, "Suppose that at Bristol short circuits had resulted from the earthquake, and fire had started—as at San Francisco; the destruction of some of these towns would have ensued, and we must expect an earthquake in London some day."

Here is a pointer for the unfortunates who are now being swindled by the crooked cockney companies. Probably the Briton likes as little to be swindled as does the Californian. If the cockney companies are liable for damage from fire, the cockneys ought to know it; if the cockney companies are not liable for damage from fire when caused by earthquake, the cockneys ought to know that too. And we think the cockneys would be very much obliged to the Californians if we were to warn them of the stand taken by their cockney companies and of their repudiation of liability.

We presume the crooked cockney companies have no objection to letting their cockney policy holders know how they are treating their California policy holders. As the cockney directors are theoretically honest men, they should not be ashamed of what they or their companies do. Therefore, we urge on the California policy holders of the crooked cockney companies that they circulate as widely as possible throughout England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, the way in which the crooked cockney companies are swindling them.

Russell Sage's Will.

The will of the late Russell Sage disposes of a fortune variously estimated by the newspapers at from 50 to 100 millions of dollars. 'Tis a wide range, but a trifle of fifty millions of dollars to a newspaper reporter getting fifteen dollars a week seems a mere nothing. At all events, Uncle Russell left a large fortune. It took him ninety years to pile it up, and he had a great deal of fun in accumulating it. Now his family and their lawyers are going to have more fun in disseminating it. Sage left practically all of his millions to his widow, excepting $25,000 to each of his nephews and nieces, with a provision (which is now becoming customary) cutting off any legatee contesting the will. The legatees have formed a syndicate with the advice and assistance of some earnest and altruistic attorneys; under this arrangement they all chip in and raise $25,000 for a single selected nephew, who thereupon will contest the will. If he fails, he gets his $25,000. If he succeeds in breaking the will they will all get their $25,000 and a great deal more. The altruistic attorneys assure them that they will get at the very least a million dollars, which is a handsome return on an investment of $25,000.

The nephews and nieces, whatever their age, sex, and previous condition of impecuniosity, have our earnest good wishes for their success. There is now no limit on the amount which a successful skinfint may heap up in America in the course of a life as long and as ignoble as that of Russell Sage. We have no income tax and we have no federal inheritance duty. As the government of Russia is said to be a despotism tempered by assassination, so the American attitude toward abnormal fortunes might be termed unrestricted accumulation tempered by post mortem dissemination. Hence, while Uncle Russell spent ninety years in piling up his hundred millions, it is gratifying to reflect that his nephews and nieces will probably spend only a few years in getting their hands on it—with the assistance of the altruistic attorneys. They may spend even less time in spending it all and spreading it among the people again. How simple, how entirely admirable is our American system of preventing the undue accumulation of wealth for more than the span of lives in being. How true it is, as the American epigram goes, that here there is only a generation from shirt-sleeves to shirt-sleeves. As a boy Uncle Russell went barefooted, had chilblains on his toes, and began his business career as assistant in a country store. After his nephews have divided up his millions, run through them, and returned to their primitive environment, they, or their sons, will again be sitting in the village store, spitting at the red-hot cylinder stove, as Uncle Russell's father used to do.

Yes, American civilization is all right.

Sure.

In the dispatches from New York telling of Uncle Sage's nepotic syndicate, we observe a paragraph calculated to fill us here in the West with unfeigned wonder. It runs thus: "The syndicate of contesting lawyers is being arranged with great secrecy, lest there be talk of bad professional ethics and investigation by the Bar Association." What kind of professional ethics can they have there in the East, and what sort of a star-chamber bar association? In the old days there used to be a belief that the attorney sat like a Senator in the Roman forum, clad in a white toga, while to him came humble clients plucking at his gown, and craving his assistance when wrong was done them. They might give him money, yet he was not supposed to sell his services, but to labor unselfishly for the doing of justice. The relation between advocate and client, even in pre-Victorian times in England, has been deemed such a relation. In fact, there may be found in old and musty English law-books occasional cases of "barratry" and "champerty," where lawyers have been punished for stirring up litigation calculated to redound to their interests, or where they have entered into litigation in which their fee was contingent on its success, or where they would bring a suit concerning a man's land and take part of it for their trouble. But all of that nowadays is looked on as mediaeval nonsense. The smart lawyer nowadays not only takes things on a contingent fee, but he looks out keenly for cases where contingencies can be worked up. In one of our most famous California will cases, that of Thomas Blythe, there not only was no question of "recruiting the syndicate with great secrecy," but the recruiting sergeant used to turn out his phalanx of lawyers with great pride. He had reason, for they were "leaders of the bar," every man of them. And their possible percentages, future percentages, and present percentages were discussed freely, not only in the courts and clubs, but in the press as well. In fact, one of the chief assets in the "estate" of a deceased leader of the bar was his contingent interest—a twenty-fifth, let us say—of the possible fee to be obtained in case the Occidental Blythe syndicate succeeded in swearing through its claimant against the Gypsy Blythe syndicate. And this shadowy "estate"—a potential contingency in a possible fee to be paid by his client if that client succeeded in winning another estate—this contingent fee constituting an "estate" was solemnly passed upon and probated by the courts.

Hence it is that this remark in the New York dispatches not only fills the public here with wonder, but must amaze our local attorneys as well. What a curious kind of professional ethics they must have in the East. And what a very remarkable Bar Association. It certainly is not at all like ours.

Records of Land Titles Destroyed.

Do you own land in San Francisco? If you think so, how do you know you own it? If you know you own it, how do you think you can prove it?

The records in the office of the Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco were destroyed by fire last April. Few if any owners can show records of title to property. Twenty thousand property-owners and millions of dollars are involved in this disaster, and speedy and efficient relief must be found.

The relief will be found. In addition to its application to the present emergency it may bring release from the slow, mysterious, and costly system of recording land titles. It may strike off the chains that entangle all legal transfers of real property and that lengthen and multiply in weight with each change of ownership. A common error of belief is that an abstract of title is a defense against adverse claimants; it is merely a history of transfers and liens, and may enclose evidence of numberless lapses and flaws.

At the recent special session of the legislature an act prepared by G. W. McEnerney to fit the needs of the time was passed and has become a law. It purports to afford a simple, safe, and speedy method of establishing title by owners of property. With the object of settling all questions that might be raised on its constitutionality, an action was brought under the new law before Judge Kerrigan of the Superior Court, to prove title to a piece of property on India street. The judge denied the motion for an order requiring publication of summons, in order that on appeal the case might be taken to the higher courts.

Before the Supreme Court of the State, argument against the validity of the act was made by former Judge John Garber. The possibility of error and fraud under the act was pointed out by Judge Garber, but the main contention was as to the character of the actions authorized by the new law: whether they were "proceedings in rem," against material things, or "proceedings in personam," involving the rights of persons.

Mr. McEnerney's argument for the new law covered the need of emergency legislation, the power of the State to regulate the transfer of property, the details of the mode prescribed, and decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States on analogous legislation.

Counsel will file briefs within twenty days, ten days will be allowed for briefs in answer, and the decision of the court will follow their consideration. Should the law be upheld, the case will be taken to the Federal Courts, and if necessary to the United States Supreme Court.

Briefly stated, the provisions of the McEnerney Act allow an owner, where public record of title has been destroyed by fire, to file in the Superior Court a complaint against all persons claiming interest in the property described, and against such persons summons will be issued, for personal service when known to be in the State, for service by mail when known to be outside the State, and notice by publication two months in a newspaper of general circulation when unknown. Answer to the complaint must be made within four months of the first publication of the summons. No judgment will be given for default; proof is required of all facts set forth in the complaint and pleadings, and the judgment when given shall be conclusive, determining all rights in and title to the property. Actions authorized under the new law must begin before July 1, 1907.

It is pointed out that California already has a simple and effective land title law—the Torrens System—but that it has never come into general use, being optional, mainly through the opposition of those who profit by the more cumbersome, involved, and expensive method. The Torrens system of land registration is named for its originator, Sir Richard Torrens, who produced it in Australia in 1854. It has been in operation there for years, and has been adopted in the United States by the legislatures of Massachusetts, Illinois, and California. The plan requires the registrar to place on a single page of his record book the claim to title made by an owner and to issue a certificate of the entry. When a transfer is made the certificate is produced by the seller and a new certificate issued to the buyer. When property is mortgaged, a note of the fact with the details must be made officially on the certificate, and thus the certificate at all times shows the true status of the title. An indemnity fund is established to provide for the reimbursement of any owner who meets with loss through error of the registrar.

Title insurance companies, searchers of records, makers of real estate loans, and many lawyers have effectually opposed the Torrens system authorized by State law; the same interests are opposing the McEnerney law, and for the same purpose. The ancient and intricate system produces fat fees. Should the courts find the McEnerney law defective, their decision will be known before the Legislature meets. Why not then put the Torrens law into operation? Is enabling legislation required? If not, it may be made operative at once.

If the courts should uphold the McEnerney Act, the legislature might enact that titles be registered under the Torrens system. San Francisco property-owners then know they own their land, and have the papers in their hands. The present system is mediaeval, inefficient, and bad; it puts a premium on perjury, forgery and fraud.

Strikes in the Printing Trades.

For a number of months a strike has been going on in the Eastern States which bids fair markedly to change the relations of the United Typothetae and the Typographical Union. The printers have insisted on higher wages for men employed in the book and job offices, as well as the "closed shop," or the barring out of persons not members of the union. The United Typothetae, as the employers' union is called, have refused to accede to this demand. The strike has lasted nearly eight months. Some of the largest publishing houses in the Eastern cities are running their business on the "open shop" principle. Among these large periodical publishers are the S. S. McClure Company, McClure, Phillips and Company, publishers of McClure's Magazine and of numerous books; another is the Scribner Publishing Company, which issues the Ladies' Home Journal and the Saturday Evening Post, these two having the largest circulations, monthly and weekly respectively, of any publications in the United States; then there is the Butterick Company, which issues such periodicals as the Delineator, largely devoted to fashions and for women's clothing, which publications also have the largest circulation in their respective lines. Mention in detail these publishers and their widely distributed periodicals in order to chronicle the fact that the Typographical Union has been attempting to bring about their enormous circulations. The boycott of a daily paper by a labor union has always been dreaded by newspaper publishers; this is probably owing to the fact that their circulations are so highly localized. Periodicals of national circulation, however, would seem to have no reason to fear from a trades union boycott.

A strike assessment, varying according to the value of the printers, but averaging about two dollars per week, being collected all over the West, including the Pacific Coast, in order to carry on the Eastern strike. The Typographical Union is a powerful organization, has a large treasury, and its leaders are unusually intelligent. It would seem, however, as if they were less disposed to be stiff-necked, and more inclined toward conciliation with the employers, for they made overtures to the employers at the annual convention of the United Typothetae. The employers' representatives stated that they would not confer with representatives of the Typographical Union but only with their employees as individuals.

The Typothetae gave out to the newspapers that their offices were running on full time, were well equipped, and that they found no difficulty in obtaining labor. During the early months of the strike this was certainly somewhat crippled, but during the past few months, if they are still embarrassed for lack of labor, the fact is not apparent. There has been a great migration of craftsmen in the printing trades from the rural districts to the large cities, where the wages are always higher. Altogether the strike would seem to be running counter to the interests of the Typographical Union.

Such being the case, the movement now under way to initiate sympathetic strikes on the part of craftsmen akin to the Typographical Union would seem to have its source in that body. There are rumors from Chicago that the stereotypers, electrotypers, photo-engravers, binders, and other craftsmen are thinking of joining the ranks of the strikers. This movement is rendered somewhat less threatening by the fact that the Printers' Union have a contract with the United Typothetae which does not expire until next year. They are reported as being adverse to repudiating their agreement. If the Pressmen's Union does not strike, such movement on the part of the other allied printing trades would have a poor chance of success.

A strike has been ordered by the Lithographers' Union, which is said to involve some twenty thousand workers. This seems to be an independent strike, for the relation between the lithographic printers and the letter-press printers is not particularly close.

printing from the lithographic stone, as discovered by Alois Senefelder, and the art of printing from movable types, as discovered by Gutenberg, or Faust, or whoever, are two distinct arts. Still, the strike of the lithographers, although unallied with the typographers' strike, is calculated to assist it.

In the meantime the United Typothetae are taking steps to entrench themselves in the advance they have made in the industrial war. In Stamford, Connecticut, the American Machine Type Setting Company has issued bonds for a large sum, intending to begin a technical school for teaching type setting, and the care, installation, and operation of type-setting machines. The printers' union believe that the United Typothetae are behind the type-setting school. Very likely they are right. When the printers' strike began in New York last winter, the Typothetae started a school for type-setters on Broome street, New York City. It is not difficult nowadays, with the various kinds of type-setting machines in existence, so to train men of fair education and average intelligence, as to render them in a short space of time very useful workmen. It is said that the output of the training school for type-setters has been very useful in keeping the employing printers of New York during the present long strike.

The United Typothetae are in a way to solve that part of the labor problem which most closely concerns them when they begin to supply new material to the type-setting craft. No one denies the right of the printers to combine and set a minimum on their wages and a maximum on their hours. No one denies the right of the Typothetae to combine and set a maximum on their wages and a minimum on their hours. They are neither of them concerned with public utilities, and so long as neither violates the law, the public is not specially concerned. As matters are at present, the intelligence and wealth of the Typographical Union would usually get the better of the United Typothetae. The Typographical Union is a close corporation, and many objections are thrown around admissions to its ranks, both from other countries or from apprenticeships. But when the United Typothetae established technical schools they speedily began turning out so many operatives at the main type-setting that it will be impossible for the Typographical Union to keep up its barriers very much longer. For that matter, there are already training schools for type-setters in a small way, like that of the World Printer in Chicago. All of these, however, are entirely within the Typographical Union rules. But when a new type-setter turned out, whether by the technical school within the union or the Typothetae school without the union, will tend to entrench the employing printer, and weaken the stand of the Typographical Union.

The Governorship of California.

The stanzas of the "Ten Little Injuns" ditty, as applied to the California political situation, have been reduced to a finality, according to the wise men who allow themselves to be quoted for publication. Four months ago at least ten prospective candidates for Governor were named, even if they were not all strictly in line; but half that number have fallen with the buds of spring. The Republican field is no longer crowded, and the Democratic aspirants—never numerous—have been reduced a third less by long-delayed Congressional action. And too, with seemingly little interest in political circles, the apathy of even the provincial leaders was noted with increasing frequency by the daily papers that are wont to be termed organs.

With the results of the primaries in many of the counties to build conjecture upon, there are still two particular problems awaiting solution, though the Democratic triangle has the darkest of dark horses for one side. Interest in the problems has at last approached the point, induced, no doubt, by the goings up and down in the State of three of the Republican candidates.

George Knight, the party orator, who deserves much credit for little of the Republican party, was the first one to make a choice to decline positively all consideration. Then Governor Henry T. Gage, now practicing law in Los Angeles, who won with ease eight years ago, when the parties seemed fairly balanced, might with reason have remained in an expectant attitude, but he has announced that he will not be a candidate. E. B. Edson, the Siskiyou stock-grower, was merely mentioned for the place. Mayor Schmitz, who loomed large on the horizon a few weeks ago, is declared by the political seers to be no longer a probability. J. O. Hayes, of San Jose, still has a large following in Santa Clara and San Mateo counties, but it is pointed out that his brother, E. A. Hayes, is Congressman from the Fifth District, and the family can hardly expect another high place.

Governor Pardee is more than willing to succeed himself, with but little encouragement from tradition, for the honor of re-election has never been won since 1863, when the term of the office was made four instead of two years. With all the patronage he has had to bestow, and no Governor had more, it is said that there is a lack of willing workers for the present incumbent, and it is remembered that his majority over Lane was numbered by hundreds, while that of several of the candidates of the ticket was figured in thousands. The Governor now is busy in his campaign. Harbor Commissioner Charles Spear is working for the Governor, not merely because both come from Alameda county; but Congressman Knowland, from that District, is alleged to be cool. Many counties have endorsed the administration, but it is asserted that hard and fast instructions in the Governor's favor are noticeably absent.

Congressman Gillett, of Humboldt, is aggressively in the field, taking no warning from the fate, often referred to now, of former Congressman W. W. Morrow—the only example of a California Representative seeking the nomination—who was badly defeated by H. H. Markham. But Morrow stayed in Washington, and Gillett is very much here.

Mr. Gillett is a good campaigner. Two years ago he distanced his opponent, ex-Congressman Caminetti, even in the strongholds of the latter—Amador and Calaveras counties, which are a long way from Humboldt. Congressman Needham appears to be willing to assist his colleague, as his private secretary has been the companion and introducer of the Northern California Representative in the central and southern counties.

Warren Porter, a banker of Watsonville, whose aspirations were announced early, though coming from the smallest county in the State that is not a city, has won the support for the convention of four or five neighboring counties, and is reaching north and south. He is a Native Son, but was defeated in his candidacy for grand trustee of the order at the recent State meeting by A. Ruef, a not altogether auspicious happening.

Another triangle to be reckoned with at the Republican convention is made up of the more or less recognized political forces, A. Ruef, W. F. Herrin, and Walter Parker. Mr. Ruef will control a large number if not all of the 159 delegates chosen in San Francisco. Mr. Herrin, it is confidently proclaimed, can easily sway as many or more from various districts. Mr. Parker is asserted to have at his call the expressions of most of the Los Angeles delegation, 129 strong. The convention will be made up of 825 delegates, and it will take 413 votes to nominate. Uncertainty for even the most hopeful is likely to continue beyond the first and second ballots.

The Democratic situation is less complex. Had Franklin K. Lane's appointment to the Inter-State Commerce Commission been defeated in the Senate, he would, in all probability, have been the unanimous choice of his party for Governor. Lane out of the way, there are but two men left in the show of probabilities—ex-Congressman Thomas J. Geary and ex-Mayor James D. Phelan. And all reports up to this time tend to establish the conviction that even these experienced politicians will remain coy until the result of the Republican convention is known.

How Our Sister Cities Love One Another.

Immediately after the disaster of last April the Argonaut printed a number of articles from other Pacific Coast cities condoling with poor San Francisco on her calamity; linked with the condolences were the congratulations of those cities which escaped scot free—through their own foresight as it would seem; for those lucky cities which got off with a scare instead of a shaking invariably set it down to their own forethought in locating just outside the earthquake zone.

We in San Francisco perforce endured the pharisaical sympathies of our wiser sister cities with as much resignation as might be. Some San Franciscans expressed the belief that such sympathy was worse than the earthquake; but that, of course, was a nasty remark. After printing a number of these sympathetic manifestoes, with San Francisco's polite acknowledgements for sympathies extended, the Argonaut grew silent and awaited further developments.

It did not take long for them to come. When so many cities were congratulating themselves on being entirely free from terrestrial disturbances, we were quite certain that some jealous rival would soon endeavor to refute their claims. Next to "The City That Was," the two most important cities on the Coast are Los Angeles and Oakland. From the very first day after the disaster they began regarding each other with jaundiced eyes, each secretly hoping to achieve the winning and wearing of San Francisco's mural crown. Such an attitude of veiled hostility could not for very long conduce to silence. When two cats on a back fence meet at midnight with erectile tail, with green eyes glaring they can not long refrain from screeching. Full soon the screeching began. Los Angeles proudly printed a long list of earthquakes that had not quaked and of shocks that had not shaken in Southern California. Judging from the self-gratulations of Los Angeles papers, and the little leaflets and booklets sent forth by the thousands from her groaning printing presses, no earth movements ever happened in Los Angeles except the upheavals of real estate values.

But the City of the Angels boasted so much of its freedom from temblors that the Oakland Tribune could not stand it, and proceeded to dig up earthquake ammunition from an arsenal which California is profusely furnished with. When it comes to talking about earthquakes, this country is something like Melbourne and Sydney in the matter of grandfathers. So short a time has elapsed since the British Government sent many gentlemen to Australia for their country's good that it is considered the worst possible form in Australian society circles to talk about turnkeys, wardens, cells, or ropes. Correspondingly, while there are many places in California that did not experience the severe shock of April 18th, 1906, they must be careful when it comes to boasting about the years that are gone. Thus, the Oakland Tribune says: "It would be in better taste for Los Angeles to refrain from felicitating itself that it escaped the earthquake of April 18th, when it is remembered that that city is not immune from seismic disturbances, and lies within a belt which has suffered much in the past." Referring to the earthquake in the early part of the last century, the Tribune says: "The earthquake of April 18th, 1906, only slightly damaged the old adobe Mission church in San Francisco, but the adobe Mission buildings at San Juan Capistrano were totally wrecked by the earthquake which swept over Los Angeles in the early part of the last century." Coming down to later times, the Tribune says, "In 1872 the loftiest building in Los Angeles was the Pico House, a three-story brick structure. That hotel and many of the two-story brick and one-story adobe buildings were badly shattered and the community thrown into a panic. The Owens River Valley, to which Los Angeles is now looking for its future water supply, was the center of that earthquake. Twenty-eight persons were killed and scores were severely injured. The towns of Independence, Lone Pine, and Cerro Gordo were practically destroyed. The Owens River, which Los Angeles intends to use for her water supply, totally disappeared for a time in a crevasse."

The latter part of this sentence is reminiscent of Martial's definition of an epigram, "A little thing having in its tail a sting." Los Angeles might stand every other part of the attack. But to assert that Southern California is so subject to earthquakes that the Owens River—which she intends to bring within her limits at a cost of over twenty millions of dollars—could disappear in an earthquake crevasse—that is too much. We have not yet seen the reply of the Los Angeles papers to the Oakland Tribune attack. We fancy, however, that it will be a corker when it comes. Of course it will not be reprinted in any other of Oakland's rival cities on the Coast, which at present are looking with envy on the Pacific Athens for her crowded streets and her large increase in business from San Francisco's disaster. We observe, however, that the Sacramento Union reprints the Oakland attack on Los Angeles without any comment. But there seems to be a faint snicker running through its headings.

The Millionaire's Sandlotter Cousin.

A number of years ago one Loring Pickering, then editor of the Call newspaper, was very much interested in the founding of a free public library in San Francisco. At the meetings of the Dashaway Association, a temperance body, there spoke on a certain Sunday one Denis Kearney, then unknown to fame, on this subject of a public library. Mr. Kearney was moved to scorn over the interest taken in certain rifle-shooting competitions then in progress, and spoke sneeringly of the folly of young men "shooting bullets at a painted board" when they might improve their minds by reading. These remarks commended themselves to Mr. Pickering, and thereafter when Denis Kearney spoke, as he frequently did at such gatherings, the Call usually reported his remarks at length.

This was a time of political and industrial unrest. On the Pacific Coast there was much feeling against the Chinese; in San Francisco, in Truckee, in Eureka, and in other Coast cities, there were anti-Chinese riots; great railroad strikes extended clear across the continent, which the military were called out to suppress; and this was the time when Denis Kearney lifted up his voice in the slogan of "The Chinese must go." Charles De Young was then editor of the Chronicle, and both he and Loring Pickering had political and journalistic ends to subserve. They both saw the potentialities of Denis Kearney, and each endeavored to win him. Mr. Pickering won him. Thereafter Kearney became a powerful agent in the political battle which was waged over the events preceding the Constitution of 1879, and the deep-seated split in both parties which resulted therefrom, the growth of the "New Constitution Party," and the "Honorable Bilks."

Denis Kearney became a political power. He was a sort of journalistic Frankenstein. He grew greater than his creators. For a time he swayed the Sand Lot, where enormous crowds gathered weekly to listen to his speeches. Kearney swayed the Sand Lot, the Sand Lot dominated the city, and for a time the city almost ruled the State.

But not quite.

In the course of years, Kearney lost his influence over his Sand Lot following, and retired into obscurity and affluence.

During all these years an eccentric man named M. Theodore Kearney was building up a fortune in Fresno county. He went there some years before these events began, and bought large tracts of land, which he cut up and sold off in small tracts to colonists. The best of his land he kept; he inaugurated costly irrigation works; he cultivated his land intensively and extensively. He became one of the great raisin growers of California, which means one of the great raisin growers of the world. He also became one of the most unpopular men in Fresno county, for he was dictatorial, selfish and arrogant. He had the arrogance of riches, the selfishness of the self-made man. For M. Theodore Kearney became a millionaire.

Thirty years ago a millionaire in interior California could do little to dazzle lesser men. He might build the largest house in the county. He could not run a yacht, for there was not water enough there. Tulare Lake, which was the only sheet of water in the great interior valley, had so diminished by reason of the growth of irrigation, that it was navigable only by wagons. Then, again, it had been pre-empted by thrifty settlers, and yachting over ranches might involve a man in actions for trespass. By the way, we observe that Tulare Lake is now slowly rising again, and the son of the settlers of the seventies will be forced to turn the paternal acres into ducks and drakes.

The only thing that M. Theodore Kearney could find to do, in order to write plain and large his difference from poorer men, was to set up a tandem and a tiger. This he did. He drove his tandem in San Francisco's Golden Gate Park, where it excited surprise, amusement and socialistic sneers. But in San Francisco we have always had a slight veneer of civilization, and even before the fire there were many thousands of people here who did not eat with their knives. Furthermore, there was a marked tolerance for eccentricity, whether in rich or poor. Cincinnati or Buffalo would not have tolerated "Emperor Norton" for a day. Russell Sage, had the emperor attempted to levy a small imperial tax, would have turned him over to the police. Our "Great Unknown"—who, oiled and curled like an Assyrian bull, daily promenaded Montgomery street—would have been "vagged" in sedate Boston within a week. Yet the "Great Unknown" lived out his harmless life in San Francisco, and nobody knew who he was, and nobody cared.

Therefore M. Theodore Kearney's tandem and tiger were not even a nine-days' wonder in San Francisco. In the great interior valley it was different. There the coach whip, the long traces, the rings and turrets on the wheeler for the leader's reins, the tiger, the tiger's buckskins, the tiger's varnished boots, the solemn, owl-like countenance of M. Theodore Kearney himself, impassive even when his leader tried to dispossess the tiger and climb into the trap by the back way—all of these things, intrinsically humorous and harmless, excited deep feeling in the granger bosom. M. Theodore Kearney, like Whistler, had perfected the gentle art of making enemies, but even his high-handed ways in business did not make him so many enemies as did driving tandem in the face of high heaven and in the San Joaquin valley.

All of this, be it understood, is written of the time when Placers was consul. It is different now. In the San Joaquin valley, nowadays, there are young people who were born to the high band-shake, knickerbockers may be worn by elderly men openly and unashamed, and young men play polo without being shot at.

In the great interior valley, nowadays, such a man as M. Theodore Kearney buys a high-priced and high-powered automobile. And, in fact, that is what M. Theodore Kearney did in recent years.

Not many weeks ago, while on his way to Europe, M. Theodore Kearney died in mid-Atlantic, and his body was taken ashore at Queenstown, to be shipped back to his adopted State. He left a will by which he devised his large fortune to the University of California. In order to prevent the breaking of his will, he devised his property to four prominent citizens of this State, in the event that his bequest to the University should be set aside. A San Francisco trust company is the executor of the estate. As M. Theodore Kearney was a solitary man, known to have no family and apparently no heirs, it was believed that his will would be probated without contest and without question. Now, however, to the surprise of the State, Denis Kearney comes forward and threatens to contest the will of M. Theodore Kearney. The ground of his contest is that he is a first cousin of the decedent, and that "the law forbids the leaving of more than one-third of a fortune to charitable purposes."

The law in California throws marked restrictions about the act of testamentary devise. Not only does it limit the amount that may be left to charitable institutions, but it provides that any such bequest must be made more than thirty days prior to the death of the testator. It has always been believed in San Francisco that this provision in the law was due to the will of William S. O'Brien of the Bonanza firm, which left large legacies to churches and church charities. It was also believed that these bequests were made in the fear of death—and the bereafter. However that may be, the law was changed not long after the death of O'Brien.

If Denis Kearney should contest the will of M. Theodore Kearney, what will be the result? Is the University of California a "charitable institution"? Is the gift of higher education to the sons of the State by the State itself to be considered as alms? Does the State owe to its youth anything more than a common-school education? Should the State give to its youth any more in the way of education than that which is necessary to make them good citizens? Is the providing of education in the primary and grammar-school branches sufficient to accomplish that purpose? If that be not the gift by the State to its youth of educational courses of ancient languages and literature, law, medicine, surgery, pharmacy, veterinary medicine, dentistry, engineering, assaying, metallurgy, agriculture, horticulture, viticulture, raisin-growing, and other arts, sciences, trades, to be considered in the light of a charity? If so, would not the will of M. Theodore Kearney in giving money to the University of California be considered as a testamentary devise to a "charitable institution?"

These are hypothetical questions, but they are interesting if only academic.

The State possesses great power over its citizens; it can limit or restrict their right of testamentary disposition. It can even take that right away. It can prevent a father from leaving his estate to his daughter or his son. It does not even have to pass laws forbidding testamentary disposition, for that privilege is not a "natural right," but an "artificial right," and is purely a creature of statute. Were the statute to disappear, with it would disappear the artificial right. The State would need no affirmative legislation to wipe out completely the privilege of conveying property by will; simply to repeal the statutes giving to her citizens that right would be sufficient. Then there would be no more will-making and no more giving by wills.

However, States are very much like individuals. They do not like to deprive themselves of money. We are in the confidence of the California Supreme Bench that we are inclined to think that if this matter comes before them, and the respective rights of Denis Kearney and the University of California be presented to the able advocates that the claims of Denis Kearney will kick the beam.

Determined to Dig Up the Dead.

There seems to be a ceaseless attempt to dig up San Francisco's intra-mural cemeteries. We do not see why. The people inside of them behave better and do less harm than those outside. There are many cemeteries much older than San Francisco where the ancient dead are allowed to remain, and they are harmless so far as we are aware. It is of course not advisable to sink surface wells for drinking water in the midst of ancient city cemeteries, but if people want to sink wells they will have them, whether in city or country. Once, in San Mateo county, we saw a country mother at a funeral pumping water for her child to drink from an ordinary surface well sunk in the midst of the tombs. In San Francisco our water comes either from distant foothill reservoirs or from artesian wells. Therefore, we see no objection to retaining the cemeteries as they are. Ordinances forbidding the burial of fresh bodies in them are doubtless desirable, as crowding is bad among human beings, whether alive or dead.

The latest attempt to dig up the cemeteries broke in the Board of Supervisors. A supervisor offered a resolution that condemnation proceedings be instituted to open streets through Laurel Hill, Odd Fellows, Mount Calvary cemeteries. One supervisor suggested that "the city has a twenty-five acre plot of land on Cypress Lawn, intended for the bodies of paupers, in which the bodies of those removed from the cemeteries could be reburied. Removing the bodies from the cemeteries would cause a great deal of land to become available as homes for people who are being forced to go to Oakland." Even if there were ninety-nine reasons for removing the cemeteries, we fail to see the merit of the last one. If there is anything of which there is a superabundance in San Francisco at present, is vacant land. Then, why this feverish demand for land? "The cemeteries are supposed to cover some twenty-eight blocks," say the Supervisors. But there are nearly five hundred blocks burned. Let us build on these before building on the cemeteries. There is so much vacant land in San Francisco that if the Board of Supervisors were to announce that it wanted to buy twenty-eight blocks—the area it is now seeking to add to the building space—its offices would be so beset by people who wanted to sell that there would have to be a riot.

a large squad of police sent to protect the Supervisors from the mob of maddened sellers.

The Banks and the Insurance Companies.

There are a few people who are pleased to consider the remarks of this journal on the insurance situation as "temperate." The Argonaut has always called a spade a spade. Likewise, it now believes in calling a rascal a rascal. Not all insurance men are rascals, but a great many of them are.

Newspapers, as a rule, are not conservative. Bankers are invariably so. When the Bankers' Clearing House Association joined the Policy-Holders' League, we felt much encouraged. It showed the time for temporizing was past. Now the Hibernia Savings and Loan Society, through its attorneys, has issued the following warning to clients and depositors:

SAN FRANCISCO, August 8, 1906.—To the Mortgagees of the Hibernia Savings and Loan Society: The first collection from the insurance companies on account of fire losses in the recent conflagration was made on June 7, 1906, just two months ago. Since that time there has been collected on account of insurance held by the Hibernia Savings and Loan Society as collateral security for its loans about $2,000,000. At the present time collections amount to about $50,000 every day.

Most companies have dealt honestly with the mortgagees of the Hibernia Savings and Loan Society and with the society itself. On the other hand, the practices of some of the companies have been such that it is our duty to advise and warn the mortgagees of the Hibernia Savings and Loan Society against offered compromise settlements made under such terms and in such manner as to convince us that the purpose of the companies proposing such settlement is simply to take from the people of San Francisco a large amount of money which the companies are legally bound to pay.

Our experience with the adjusters and attorneys of the London and Lancashire, Orient, State of Liverpool and English-American Underwriters has been such that we deem it our duty to make the following specific statement in regard to their business:

First—The above-named companies represent that they are well able to pay San Francisco losses in full.

Second—Their local managers have resigned because of the practices adopted by their adjusters to evade the payment of liabilities of the companies.

Third—The attorney for the adjusters has stated within the last week that they have not adjusted a single loss.

Fourth—They have knowingly denied all liability was beyond question, and by persistently adhering to their fraudulent statements they have frightened policy holders into accepting from 50 to 90 per cent of the amounts due them.

Sixth—By reason of their practices the Hibernia Savings and Loan Society regards their new policies of insurance as of doubtful value and will, therefore, refuse to accept the same as security for its loans.

Seventh—As attorneys we cannot counsel the acceptance of less than the amounts legally due from these companies. Yours very truly,

TOBIN & TOBIN,

Attorneys for the Hibernia Savings and Loan Society.

The Hibernia is one of the oldest, richest and most conservative banks in California. That it should issue a document shows in how unscrupulous a manner insurance companies are attempting to defraud their depositors.

Seats at the Bryan Love Feast.

The ingeniously humorous head waiter at a summer hotel lost his position through his whim of seating the red-headed guests at one table and all the bald-ones at another, and similar obvious but unappreciated plays of classification. The experience is recalled by the announcement in the press that Judge Feltner would make an effort to seat all State delegations to the Bryan convention in New York. Even with the arrangement on the lines there will be difficulties for the master of ceremonies on that festive Democratic occasion, but with an attempt to make a more particular distribution and grouping, a sorting of sentiments and parceling of probabilities, the possibilities of inharmony are hardly to be exaggerated. Divisions for the Parker patricians, the Appleton and unreconstructed silverites, the Watson populists, the Taggart and Sullivan sports, the Hearst irreconcilables, the Bailey Bourbons, and the innumerable middle-of-the-road and by-path varieties must be provided, with partitioning devices high, strong and tight. The task will not be an enviable one.

Fireman's Fund and Policy-Holders' League.

The following statement in regard to the Fireman's Fund and Home Fire and Marine Insurance Companies has been given out through the medium of the Policy-Holders' League, which is made up of the Merchants' Association, the Chamber of Commerce, the Clearing House Association, other commercial institutions, and individual policy-holders:

"The Fireman's Fund officers are formulating a plan which they think will be acceptable to their

San Francisco policy-holders. They have had several conferences with the trustees of the Policy-Holders' League, who propose to lend them every assistance in ascertaining whether the plan under consideration can be made practicable and satisfactory to policy-holders in general. The Policy-Holders' League has promised to co-operate to the best of its ability, and the expectation is that within a few days the details will be announced. In the meantime the Fireman's Fund officers urge that all policy-holders await the result of these negotiations before taking any action which will simply precipitate complications, to the injury of all concerned.

"The plan involves, with other features, a heavy assessment of shareholders."

Since insolvency proceedings were threatened against the Fireman's Fund and the Home the directors of both corporations have been considering how best to avoid the forced winding up of their business. The Policy-Holders' League is endeavoring to assist them, in the interests of their own members. These two San Francisco fire insurance companies hold large blocks of San Francisco securities. Turning them into cash at present would not realize sufficient to meet their fire losses. More deliberate liquidation may do so. This is what is looked for and hoped for.

LESSONS OF THE GREAT FIRE.

Albert Reed, Expert Engineer, Makes a Report to the National Board of Fire Underwriters.

The conditions existing at the time of and governing the progress made by the San Francisco conflagration are well presented in the report of the committee on fire prevention of the National Board of Fire Underwriters. This report is the result of the investigations by Albert Reed, consulting engineer to the committee, who was sent out to make an investigation immediately after the fire. Mr. Reed gives valuable data concerning existing conditions, and regarding the effect of the earthquake he says:

"On the solid ground the action was confined to shaking, in which the upper parts of structures were apt to experience a maximum oscillation. In soft ground there were permanent displacements which resulted in a distortion of the lower parts of structures where foundations did not go through to solid ground. This is illustrated by the cases of the Aetna building, the postoffice and the car tracks at the foot of Market street, all of which were foundations going through the few feet of soft material. They show but slight change of level, although the streets adjacent have sunk away.

"The actual damage was not, as a general rule, structurally serious as far as appearance went. Apart from buildings having ponderous architectural attachments, particularly the City Hall, where the damage was great and spectacular, the apparent structural injury was mainly to tall chimneys, church towers and unbraced brick gables, copings and projections.

"The effect on fireproof buildings was especially important, as the steel-frame type had never before been seriously tested in an earthquake. It may be said, generally speaking, that these buildings had no apparent structural injury. The steel frames appeared plumb and true and, contrary to the early account, neither the sides nor the floors had dropped out."

Mr. Reed, as the result of his investigations, reaches the following conclusions:

"Among previously accepted views which are confirmed are the following:

"The paralyzing effect of a number of simultaneous fires. The weakening of the fire-fighting force as it thins out over a wide front. The impossibility, with existing methods, of front resistance to the sweep when the wind velocity exceeds a certain critical figure. The special vulnerability of leeward up-slopes. The utility of explosives, except where there is close co-operation with hose streams. The structural ruin in conflagration of all wooden joist brick buildings where the stability of the walls in any way depends upon the bracing by the beams. The structural ruin to be anticipated in conflagration in all wooden joist brick buildings where the wall bracing depends upon unprotected iron and steel girders or columns.

"The limited utility in a conflagration of rear and side shutters, where front windows remain unprotected. The ignitibility in conflagrations of ordinary roofs, consisting as they do of wooden boards with a thin veneer of tin or other roofing material. The slight value as conflagration-breaks of fireproof buildings when abandoned. The possibility in conflagrations of holding buildings with unprotected openings, provided there are some men, even a little water, and the openings are few.

The little reliance to be placed on street widths as positive conflagration-breaks. The structural survival, even without window protection and when abandoned, of steel frame buildings with fireproof floor arches, provided the steel frame is properly encased with fireproof material, the structural damage being in close proportion to the excellence of the frame protection. The more or less complete destruction in such buildings of all non-structural interior; heavy spalling of all kinds of facing stone, with little distinction as to kind, the injury to ornamental moldings and copings; extensive damage to hollow tile in floor, arches, and partitions as ordinarily constructed; a marked increase in injury where wood finish floors are used over the floor arches; the danger from falling safes, where there is loose back filling; the failure of unprotected cast iron mullions and spandrels in courts, and the weakness of roofs carried on unprotected steel rafters with suspended ceilings."

The most notable facts in respect to light thrown upon debated matters are as follows:

"1—The case of the Bush-street Telephone Exchange, which had a high type of window protection, but was full of combustible contents, was shut up tight, and abandoned to the maximum conflagration exposure. The structure and the window protection resisted successfully the general sweep of the conflagration; but some unascertained leak admitted the spark which originated an interior fire, causing as complete interior destruction as if there had been no window protection at all.

"2—The partial success of the South Mission Telephone Exchange, a window protected, fireproof building, in a frame district. This building was abandoned, and yet survived with two floors in habitable condition and a large part of the switchboard equipment intact.

"3—The saving of the Kohl building, a steel frame office building, with reinforced concrete floors, and with metal-covered trim and cement floors throughout. This was noteworthy as the first conflagration in which there was a building of this type. The glass was ordinary plate glass and all partitions had ordinary glass transoms. Caution must be exercised in drawing broad conclusions from this case. The fact that the majority of the plate glass windows are not even cracked shows that the upper floors did not receive any severe attack. The building was not deserted during the fire. Furthermore, the three lower floors are extensively burned out, the wood having ignited under its metal sheathing, showing that when the glass of windows break and fire takes hold of the contents of the room, the heat soon penetrates the thin metal sheeting of the trim. Still there is a definite though small advantage in this detail of protection, which advantage may be thus accounted for.

"The prominent cases of successful defense of unprotected windows were the Mint and the Custom Houses. Furthermore, both were only three stories high, below the drift of flames and gases and in addition were mainly of fireproof construction. The building whose window trim is slowly combustible has, therefore, an appreciable advantage, even with ordinary plate glass and no shutters.

"Going higher in the scale of window protection we have the case of the Western Electric Company, with its wire-glass windows. These still cannot be regarded as standard, inasmuch as the defect well known to fire protection engineers, diathermancy, developed the anticipated effects, namely, ignition through the glass. It is important not to be misled as to the lessons of this fire."

England is increasingly agitated over the motor nuisance. In Kensington, London, a fine residence section has been devastated, with a great depreciation of values. It was the practice in that region to sit on the balconies on pleasant evenings, quite in the American style. Now all retreat indoors and shut the windows to exclude the noise and stench of automobiles and motor buses. Statistics of accidents in the London area during May and June, showed that in those months there were 1,125 accidents caused by motor cars, and 790 caused by motor buses. Public indignation threatens revolt.

Joseph Monier, from whom reinforced concrete is usually called "Monier" construction in Europe, was a gardener, and in 1867 took out a patent for making flower pots with a wire skeleton filled in with cement—little thinking that bridges and buildings could be built in a similar way.

The account of a wedding published in a Kansas paper, describing the marriage in the usual flowery adjectives, concluded with this surprising announcement: "The bridegroom's present to the bride was a handsome diamond brooch, together with many other beautiful things in cut-glass."

The club house of the Inwood Yacht Club parted from its moorings, on a recent Sunday, and went drifting down the Hudson River with two hundred scared men, women and children. A launch gave chase and brought the runaway to shore.

GERALDINE BONNER

Discusses in an Eastern Magazine "The Passing of the Argonauts' City."

The San Francisco that was destroyed by fire was one of the most individual and colorful cities in North America. Quebec may present more picturesque points to the traveler's eye, New Orleans have an atmosphere more quaintly old-world, but neither of them—nor any of their sister towns—could rival the city of the Golden Gate in charm, in buoyant, high spirits, in a gay cosmopolitanism, in a pagan pleasure of life and romantic zest of adventure.

It was built by the Pioneers and the Bonanza Kings, two widely differing types of men. The Pioneers were the giants of that unwritten chapter of romantic history, the winning of the far West. They were the hardy ones, the bold spirits of their native towns and villages. The cautious, the timid and the feeble were not equal to the hazards of the enterprise, and stayed at home. Only the vigorous and daring, those who knew no fear and thrilled to the call of the Red Gods, went to California in '49. They were the outdoor men, the adventurers, who wanted worlds to conquer and followed the star of empire to the continent's rim.

The goal toward which they bent their steps lay like a reef between the great unknown wastes of the Pacific on one side and the drab, unpeopled lands on the other. It rose, a spine of sand, between these two desolations and the men and women who toiled toward it and saw it in the distance—opal-bright and beguiling as a mirage on the desert. It was the land of their dreams, the Eldorado that beckoned them, as they marched across the long prairies where cloud-shadows lay blue on the feathered grass; as they struggled over the desert where the alkali broke through the soil in leprous whiteness, while their tongues were as leather in their parched mouths. They climbed to the hilltops that twilight turned to lilac-blue and amethyst, and, with the sunset in their eyes, looked toward it—the land of promise. They dreamed of it as they slept beside the hollowed spring, the howl of the coyote in their ears and the prowling Indian shadowy outside the circle of their fires.

They founded a straggling village along the coves and among the sand dunes. It was three times swept by fire, and three times rebuilt, but their courage was unconquerable, their spirit indomitable. They were far from other cities and other influences, so that San Francisco developed unrestricted on its own lines, taking color from its founders and its environment. The Spanish strain, still strong in the people, lent picturesqueness and a somewhat faded splendor to the local life; Pioneer and Argonaut gave it a flavor of debonair audacity; the blue skies and tawny hills that framed it planted in its children the sense of beauty.

The heart of the early city was Portsmouth Square, its main street Montgomery, its fashionable quarter where Chinatown afterward stood. Here the little town boiled and seethed, and grew as untrammelled as the cocoa palm that springs from a dropped seed on a ledge in the reef. It was wild and gay, with all its doors wide open, the tinkle of the guitars in the gambling-hall mingling with the chanting of hymns from the church on the hill. Its streets were thronged with men—men from the East who had just arrived, men from the mines who had come down to spend their money, men from the seas whose deserted ships lay idle in the cove. The stimulus of the excitement that held and dominated each one was in the air like an electric vibration.

Their city ran like wild-fire round the lip of the shore, huddled close to the water, between the sand hills and the sea. From the water-front to the Presidio lay miles of land, as wild as when Portola landed; clothed with lupins and sea-grass, and with the glitter of the bay beyond. The Mission was a sandy expanse, pegged down here and there by a white cottage, and striped by a plank road running over its ochre-colored wastes to the old Spanish church founded by Junipero Serra. Where the Bonanza Kings were later to crown Nob Hill with palaces there were canvas tents and huts built of coal-oil tins, while children picked blackberries on the chaparral-covered slopes.

The business district lay round the edge of the cove, which was gradually filled in, block by block, till deep-drawing ships could anchor at the wharfs. On this made land the old Nianfic, the "ship of '49," was left stranded until the busy town grew around it, and it was braced into an upright position and used as a boarding house. The stern projected from between conventional house-fronts, and a door of entrance was cut where the rudder once swung. When finally the old relic was demolished, the sides were found to be lined with crates of champagne, hidden and long since forgot.

Fashion moved many times in the early San Francisco but left its mark most distinctly on South Park. This oval spot of green, ringed by dignified houses, whose sober, stuccoed fronts were pierced by long French windows that opened on iron balconies, was one of the most characteristic landmarks of the older city. Though fallen from its original high estate, the Park never lost its air of sedate good breeding. From this throne the Southern aristocracy ruled; the famous beauties of antebellum days—the B. C. period of San Francisco's history—were wooed and married in these solemn old dwellings, which retained to the end the atmosphere of high distinction.

All this was part of the San Francisco that developed between 1850 and 1870—the San Francisco in which everybody knew everybody else, and the rest of the world was as remote as though the peninsula of Yerba Buena was in some uncharted corner of the South Seas. This was the San Francisco of Southern sympathies, when there were no millionaires, and when the desire to become one was not every man's dearest desire.

At the end of the '60's came the silver developments in Nevada, and the city entered into the second epoch of its life. From 1868 to 1878 were the "Bonanza Times," when the San Francisco of the Bonanza Kings was built. The Pioneer Days had followed on the gold discoveries in the foothills, the Bonanza Times on the silver discoveries in the Comstock Lode. These are what might be called the two geological eras that went to the forming of the city that now lies in ashes.

The Bonanza Kings built up San Francisco in the grand manner. They were a different race from the Pioneers—less simple, less frank, and not so broad; a more astute, complex breed. But they were equally daring, if they dared in a different way and for other ends. They were men of large grasp, who swept a broad horizon; humbly born, but gigantically aspiring; in youth cramped and confined by ignorance and poverty, in maturity determined to square things by recognizing no restriction of God or man. They were the first far Western millionaires, the first money kings, and they rose to the requirements of their vast possessions with confident ease, carrying bewildered wives and children with them. A boundless self-reliance, a gallant fearlessness, a bold joy in the hazards of the game, marked them. They were born to win—conquerors of destiny, before whom fortune halts and capitulates.

They were great spenders. The privations of youth had not taught them economies, but had stimulated in them the desire to atone for the lean years of the past by the abundance of the present. They came down from gray, sterile Nevada and poured out their treasures to make San Francisco a worthy market wherein rich men might magnificently take their pleasure. On the crest of the line of hills that bristled across the city they raised great mansions in which luxuriously to end their days, saying, like their biblical prototype, "Now, soul, take thine ease." Works of art were brought from Europe, and decorations from New York, that the Nevada miner might be as artistically and as magnificently housed as the millionaires of an older and more sophisticated East.

Stimulated by their demands, the city furnished them with all they asked. It quickly passed from the quaint Pioneer town to the glorified mining camp, where every luxury could be procured and every extravagance indulged in. The San Francisco of huge private residences, of fine office buildings, of splendid hotels, of brilliant theaters, of unmatched restaurants, grew out of the Comstock millions. It was the prodigality of the Bonanza Kings that made it the gayest and most pleasure-loving city on the continent—"more like Paris than any other place in the world!" as the traveled tourists often exclaimed. A fantastic extravagance, a feverish zest of amusement, entered its life and grew into the marrow of it.

It became an anomaly among cities—a place where much of the unrestraint and some of the lawlessness of the early mining camp still lingered to jostle the self-poise and to temper the sophistication of the great metropolis. Vast sums of money, suddenly acquired, flowed with careless prodigality from purses that but yesterday were empty. The enjoyment of life became as absorbing an occupation as had been once the conquering of fortune. And while the lack of equilibrium, the spectacular effervescence, were that of a new community, the general tone of existence, the easy affluence and the spontaneous richness of the life that the eyes rested on were like those of centers where time has made the business of gracious and pleasant living easy and familiar.

Strangers felt this and could not explain it. They spoke of the cosmopolitanism, of the absence of provincialism, and thought they had plucked out the heart of the city's mystery. Native San Franciscans, in whom the sense of contrast was undeveloped, could define it no better. They gave the best explanation of the enigma when they alluded to the consciousness of restriction and constraint they experienced in other cities. In a town where the outward surroundings showed none of the half-baked rawness of the new West, where a curious completeness of finish marked the social life as well as the individual, where the keynote of existence seemed a joyous appreciation of the more refined pleasures, it was difficult to recognize the strain of lawlessness, the taste of wild liberty, the indifference to public opinion, mark the great mining camp in its hot, fierce heyday. These lay hidden under the conventional surface of Francisco's life, giving it its mysterious effect of "decence," its charm of a wayward, undisciplined perversity. They lent it the attractiveness that comes from defiance of accepted standards, the glamour of forbidden and disapproved.

One of its characteristics most frequently mentioned was its foreignness. Much of this was the lingering afterglow from the days of Spanish glory. It also imparted by the predominating presence of the Roman Catholic, an unobtrusive participation in the daily life by the priest and the nun. The Greek Church, with its deep-mouthed choir of bearded priests and its blue, sprinkled domes, was like a bit of the enameled brilliancy of Moscow sunning itself on a dreamy plaza. At the slopes of Telegraph Hill olive-skinned women with fawn-eyed youths fitted into the background of blue and green leafage as they did into that of their native Italy.

In the heart of the business section—a piece of the world's oldest civilization imbedded in the newest—Chinatown stood, all vermilion and gold, like an Oriental banner. With the bright effervescence of busy streets eddying around it, it remained aloof, inscrutably uncommunicative. Its baffling reserve hung between it and the encircling outer life like a veil. Half a dozen streets brought the wayfarer from the green-carpeted brightness of Portsmouth Square, where the good ship Bonanza bent its sails before fairy breezes, into the gloom of a street mottled only by the light of crimson lanterns, then, as if with the whisperings of an unknown tongue and the shifting of softly shod feet. The advancing throng of faces all bore the same suggestion of controlled emotion, even in the eyes, set like bits of onyx into slits of tight-drawn skin. It was a center of undivulged secrets, the home of the alien and the unknown, at your very door, and yet thousands of years away and beyond.

It was not stranger, though much less terrible, than the Barbary Coast. That, too, was a relic of the mining town, a conglomerate of "the bad streets" which radiated from the main thoroughfare when "strikes" are frequent and "the camp is booming." City sophistications were incorporated on frontier franknesses, and the Barbary Coast grew to be a name of darkling significance. It drew to itself all the lost and strayed spirits that the peopled rim of the continent called from the long as on one side and the gray deserts on the other. It was a stopping place—a bivouac in hurried journeys and desperate midnight flights. Its light was as a beacon to the battered adventurer, to the sinister criminal, and the woman with only the outward traces of her womanhood left. Its pianos sounded loud in the early morning, its saloon lamps glimmered pale in the dawn. Exploration in the great sea of human nature went there on dark voyages of discovery, sounding the depths of its dance-halls and sailors' lodging-houses. The fermentation of a wild enterprise, shot by red gleams of the legends of sea-pirate and outlaw, made perpetual agitation in its uneasy air currents. Color, hazard, mystery, redeemed its atmosphere from the rank sordidness of city life. Romance lurked in its shuttered byways, and adventure dwelt in the shanties that winked all night along the water-front.

All this has gone. So, too, have the embroidered balconied houses with the jut of protecting roofs screening dim second stories—faded relics of the days when the Spaniard built against hot weather and earthquake. So have those long-windowed, iron-shuttered old rookeries whose pale faces were streaked with the drippings from the eaves and mottled with the vari-colored stains of sun and sun. Artists lived in these, nailed their cards on the doors of each successive floor, and might have dreamed they were back in the Latin Quarter if sunbeams had not so constantly slanted in through their untainted windows and the brilliancy of bunched flowers lit up the corners of their studios.

Gone are those old storied houses round whose walls clustered histories, often tragic, always sensational—the court room, where Laura Fair was tried for the murder of her lover, and, being a woman, young and pretty, was discharged; the white-pillared house on Nob Hill, the acquisition of which reads like a story only because it could have conceived and written; the square, old dwelling round which Chinatown afterward grew, where the owner was found dead by his servants one bright morning; the houses that shined the youth of dead-gone beauties; the houses whose walls had shed lurid, unchronicled loves; the houses built in days of splendor and fallen on days of squalor, and the houses that saw the humble birth of distinguished men.

All, all are gone!—that which grew from bad beginnings, and that which grew from good. The work of two generations of men toiled to build up, forty-second of earthquake and three days of fire obliterated.

like a great drama, working up through a imitative volcano of action to a tremendous crescendo. The climax was the end of San Francisco's splendid, undisciplined youth. The two first acts were those of Pioneer endeavor and Bonanza glory. The day passed from struggle to crowned achievement, toward the place where material success reached its ultimate point. The conquest of matter was complete; all that could be done by the brain and hand had been done. Then came the terrible climax. The curtain fell on a city swept and ravaged, on a blacked-out line, on skeleton walls against the sky. It fell in a period, cut off, ended; it set the seal of finality on each.

The great drama will have a quiet last act, as all wars should—an act of reconstruction and restoration of a less spectacular struggle, an equally proud but less impetuous endeavor. And a great city will rise, and by fire, chastened by its wilful passions, soberer, and humbler—the San Francisco of the future.

For the moment let us mourn for the glad, gay, and things that has gone. In the midst of our new life let us step aside into a dim place and lament for the things rich and untamable and brilliant that has gone from our lives, for the splotch of color that has been wiped from the map. Eheu! fugaces, the mad, bad days of '50 and '70! Eheu! fugaces, the port at whose mouth all nations met and were merry! Eheu! fugaces, the days of the Bonanza King and the Pioneer!—Reader, adieu.

It is advertising for a "reliable, sturdy execution." The remuneration offered is $364 per execution. The former occupant of the post retired, owing inability to wield the heavy axe used in Scandinavia. The hangman is also having trouble with his executioners. The official hangman struck a few days ago for more salary and pension guarantee. His salary had been $50 a week. The hangman, who had served a long term of imprisonment for murdering his father, has had his salary raised to $106 per execution.

Flammarion, the distinguished wife of her equally distinguished husband-astronomer, never allows anyone to cut her husband's hair but herself, and she keeps shorn locks for pillows. Her home in Paris is full of such pillows stuffed with clippings. The Flammarions were married thirty years ago; therefore, taking the average time of a man's growth of hair between each haircut as three weeks, the treasured accumulation of over 1000 haircuttings must make a goodly pile.

The German pork shops are fitted up as gorgeously as bakeries are in New York. Plate-glass windows, marble counters and shelving, hard-wood fittings, with much polished brass, prevail. The pig himself is dealt with delicately. The plump and tender hams are so trimmed that the layers of fat and lean show to the best advantage. Loins and chops are grouped in porcine bouquets, while the ornamental effects of the sausages are never lost.

Hudson Bay Company's stock of a nominal value of £100 is selling at £86 per share in London and paying a dividend of eighty shillings. This venerable corporation was in its 237th year. Only seven years ago its shares with a nominal value of £13 did not go above £2. The company still deals in furs, and does a large general trade, but its great profits are derived from its fur sales.

For a quarter of a century, so expeditious is the British mail, freight has been collected in London late in the afternoon and delivered at the consignee's door anywhere in the north of Scotland the following morning. The great African roads send out four fast freight trains daily to New York; the London and Northwestern Railway sends out twenty-eight!

Two Swiss fire engines were dispatched from Bale to a warehouse fire in the German town of Huningue, just thirty yards over the Swiss frontier. Although the German engines were quite incapable of dealing with the outbreak, the German custom-house officials would not allow the Swiss firemen to cross the frontier, as "they had received no orders to that effect."

An investigation by the Belgian Government of the theft of leather mail bags in the Kongo Free State disclosed the fact that natives in the postal service took the bags, cut out the bottom and gave them to their wives to be worn as clothing.

The number of tramps harbored by Massachusetts towns and cities has decreased 71 per cent in a year, due to a statute enacted making them work.

Italian cigars look like Pittsburg stogies, with bits of stick sticking out of them.

POLITICO-PERSONAL.

Richard Harding Davis will go to New Hampshire to help out Winston Churchill's campaign for the Governorship.

Scott Bone, for nearly 20 years managing editor of the Washington Post before that paper had come under the control of John R. McLean, will begin the publication of a new one-cent morning daily in Washington, to be called the Herald. The paper will be independent in politics, as the Post is a thick-and-thin supporter of the present administration.

President Roosevelt has contributed $1 to the Republican Congressional Committee's campaign fund. The contribution was sent in response to a general appeal for dollar contributions. The New York Evening Post notes the fact with this comment: "The President sends on his dollar for the Republican campaign fund, and thinks it 'an admirable plan.' The praise gains point from the fact that the plan saves Mr. Roosevelt, if the story of his contribution in 1904 was true, exactly $99,999.

Charles E. Magoon, now governor of the Panama Canal zone and United States minister to Panama, will resign from both places about September 1 to accept appointment as member of the Philippine Commission and vice-governor of the Philippine Islands. Later on Mr. Magoon will succeed to the office of governor-general of the Philippines, and it is thought that he will become ultimately a member of the Cabinet, thus following closely in the footsteps of Secretary Taft, who rose to Cabinet honors through the governor-generalship of the Philippine Islands.

Senator Shelby M. Cullom added another to his long list of victories last week, defeating ex-Governor Richard Yates at the primaries for the nomination for Senator, which means re-election for the second figure in Illinois politics, as Speaker Cannon must be reckoned first. It was the first direct vote for Senator in Illinois, and the new primary law is declared a success, though the vote was not as heavy as was expected. Senator Cullom is 77, has been in public office as member of the legislature, governor, Representative in Congress, and Senator for more than fifty years. He is now completing his fourth full six-year term in the Senate.

The triumph of Governor Cummins, of Iowa, the leader of the Republican "progressives," or tariff revisionists, over Perkins, the stand-patter and nominal leader of the Shaw forces, was complete. The State Convention nominated Cummins for the third time, in spite of the opposition based on traditional hostility to a third term. The nominee for Lieutenant-Governor was Cummins' own man, and the whole ticket was satisfactory to him. Governor Cummins has for years declared that trusts must be curbed and that the tariff has nurtured trusts. The tariff, therefore, was to be revised sharply. The platform declaration of the convention, however, was mild, and almost noncommittal.

The next Senator from Oregon was practically chosen at the recent general election in that State, under the new statute allowing the electors to express their choice at the primaries, and binding the members of the State legislature to ratify that choice. The successful candidate, the first man ever virtually elected United States Senator from Oregon by the vote of the people, is Mr. Jonathan Bourne, Jr., a prominent lawyer and a wealthy mine-owner. He is a Republican, but while the Democratic Governor was re-elected, Mr. Bourne defeated his Democratic opponent, United States Senator John M. Gearin, by a handsome majority. Mr. Gearin was appointed to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Senator Mitchell, and his term will expire on March 4th, 1907.

Alabama has joined the lengthening roll of States that will choose Senators by popular vote. With Senators in service who have reached the mature age of eighty-two and eighty-five years—Morgan and Pettus, respectively—and have attained positions of great prominence among their colleagues in the Senate, the State is unwilling to leave to a chance governor the designation of any one not thoroughly approved. Morgan is outranked in length of continuous service in the Senate by Allison alone out of all the ninety members, and has already completed twenty-nine years of service in that body. Pettus, though the older man, was confining his political activities to manipulation as the chairman of every Alabama delegation, except the first and last, since the civil war, to the Democratic national conventions, and became a candidate for office for the first time when he was sent to the Senate in 1897. Voters in the August primary will have five votes, four of which will be for United States senatorships. Each man is entitled to vote for two candidates for senator, and in this class Morgan and Pettus are unopposed. Then he is entitled to vote for two alternates and the pair receiving the highest vote becomes the senators-prospective. Seven of Alabama's best known and most capable political leaders are candidates. Next they cast one vote indicative of their choice for governor, the candidates being Lieut.-Gov. Robert M. Cunningham and B. F. Comer, president of the State Railroad Commission. Public sentiment will force ratification of the sensational choice of the people.

Captain Lewis M. Koehler of the Fourth Cavalry is again in disgrace for having criticised General Leonard Wood, his superior officer. Koehler accused General Wood of unjust and illegal acts and with malice in connection with the court-martial of Captain Koehler last January in the Philippines. Captain Koehler had some trouble with Major H. L. Scott, military and civil Governor of the Island of Jolo, where the Mount Dajo battle occurred last March, charging Major Scott with incompetency and neglect of duty. When the charges reached General Wood, Major Scott was in Manila and preferred charges against Koehler. General Wood, who is a strong personal friend of Major Scott, ordered Koehler court-martialed. Koehler was convicted and sentenced to be reprimanded. Captain Koehler appealed to the Secretary of War to have the sentence of the court and the reprimand by General Wood set aside. This letter came through the regular military channels and of course passed into the hands of General Wood. He complained against Captain Koehler and the President has ordered Koehler before a court-martial to be held in the Philippines on October 1.

OLD FAVORITES.

The Modern Romans.

Under the slanting light of the yellow sun of October, A "gang of Dagos" were working close by the side of the ear track.

Pausing a moment to catch a note of their liquid Italian,

Faintly I heard an echo of Rome's imperial accents. Broken-down forms of Latin words from the Senate and Forum,

Now smoothed over by use to the musical "lingua Romana."

Then came the thought, Why, these are the heirs of the conquering Romans;

These are the sons of the men who founded the Empire of Caesar;

These are they whose fathers carried the conquering eagles

Over Gaul and across the sea to Ultima Thule.

The race-type persists unchanged in their eyes and profiles and figures—

Muscular, short, and thick-set, with prominent noses, recalling

"Romanos rerum dominos, gentemque togatum."

See, Lahienus is swinging a pick with rhythmical motion;

Yonder one pushing the shovel might be Julius Caesar,

Lean, deep-eyed, broad-browed, and bald, a man of a thousand;

Further along there stands the jolly Horatius Flaccus;

Grim and grave, with rings in his ears, see Cato the Censor;

And the next has precisely the bust of Cneius Pompeius.

Blurred and worn the surface, I grant, and the coin is but copper;

Look more closely, you'll catch a hint of the old superscription—

Perhaps the stem of a letter, perhaps a leaf of the laurel.

On the side of the street, in proud and gloomy seclusion,

"Bossing the job," stood a Celt, the race enslaved by the legions,

Sold in the market of Rome, to meet the expenses of Caesar.

And as I loitered, the Celt cried, "Tind to your worruk, ye Dagos—Full up yer shovel, Paythro, ye haythen, I'll dock yees a quarter."

This he said to the one who resembled the great Imperator;

Meekly the dignified Roman kept on patiently digging.

Such are the changes and chances the centuries bring to the nations.

Surely, the ups and downs of this great world are past calculation.

How the races troop o'er the stage in endless procession!

Persian, and Arab, and Greek, and Hun, and Roman, and Vandal, Master the world in turn and then disappear in the darkness,

Leaving a remnant as hewers of wood and drawers of water.

"Possibly"—this I thought to myself—"the yoke of the Irish

May in turn be lifted from us in the tenth generation.

Now the Celt is on top—but time may bring his revenges, Turning the Ferian down once more to be 'hossed by a Dago.'"

PHILIPPINES NO PARADISE.

An Englishwoman Says Americans Have Spoiled Land and People.

Admiral Cornish with ships of the British navy bombarded Manila in 1762, and, when the city was taken, a "priestly governor" of the Philippine capital presented the gallant officer with a beautiful emerald ring. Mrs. Campbell Dauncey, who inherited the ring, as the admiral was her "papa's great-uncle," wore the cherished gift when she went to the Philippines from England with her husband in 1904, and looked forward with a glow of romantic interest to her arrival at the historic stronghold on the Pasig. For nine months the Daunceys remained in the Philippines at Manila and Iloilo, and the lady had excellent opportunities for observation and criticism which were certainly taken advantage of with sharp eyes, even if with a somewhat captious disposition. Her letters to friends at her old home have been collected and published in a handsome volume of 350 pages, illustrated and admirably indexed. The book is titled "An Englishwoman in the Philippines," a phrase that gives no hint of the color, racy description, and critical philosophy to be found within the blue covers embellished with the remarkable Philippine "coat of arms." Every contact with novel characters and customs, in home life as well as in island travel and participation in public entertainments, is sketched with firm lines, and political aspects no less than personal concerns are presented and pronounced upon. It is not hard to believe that the several chapters were written, as is explained, while the impressions made by the experiences described were fresh.

When the Taft party visited Manila, Mrs. Dauncey was there, an interested witness of spectacle and speech, and her comments touch more than the obvious. With her husband she attended the public reception:

We struggled through the crowd of sight-seers and into the big basement, which was decorated very profusely, and where a lot of people were standing about. A man told us he guessed the reception was going on upstairs; we thought perhaps he had guessed correctly, so we mounted the broad stairs, between sheaves of palms and American flags, and found ourselves in a huge crowd in the outer room of the suite. The court room had been arranged with rows of chairs and benches facing the dais, and the balcony beyond, with the bright blue sky and white glare of sunlight for a background, was a seething mass of white-clad humanity. I noticed the Americans were all at one end and the Filipinos at the other—an arrangement of choice, I imagine, rather than accident.

There was no regular presenting being done and no one offered to introduce us to Mr. Taft or "Miss Alice," and we did not like to ask them to do so, which I am sorry about now, as I should have liked to have met them. However, Miss Alice was standing next to the Governor's wife while I was talking to the latter, so I was able to get an impression of her appearance, which I thought quite pleasing; a young girl with a fluff of fair hair tied behind with a big bow of black ribbon, a very pale complexion, and heavily-lidded blue eyes. She had on a coat and skirt of stiff white pique, which did not do justice to her pretty figure, and a plain straw hat with blue ribbons on it tilted over her forehead.

All the American ladies among the visitors were very plainly dressed in shirts and skirts, as for the country in the morning, with large, flat hats and floating gauze veils—just like the American tourists you see in London out of the season. The residents, however, had on pretty muslins and hats, and the Filipino ladies sported their most beautiful camisas and finest jewels. I heard afterwards that the very plain costumes of the visitors were considered as rather a poor compliment, not to say a mistake in tact, for of course the Manila papers had given glowing accounts of the lovely dresses they wore at the entertainments in Manila, and Orientals think such a lot of that sort of thing—and so do Occidentals, too, for the matter of that!

Mr. Taft and the Senators were all in white linen suits; the officers in white linen, too, plus the badges of their rank. Mr. Taft, who is a very tall, fair man of enormous build, towered over the heads of every one about him. I don't think I ever saw any one so vast, and could quite believe that he weighed 250 pounds—though I must say that to hear a weight expressed in pounds does not convey much impression to my mind. He has a large, clever face, which creases up into an amiable smile for which he is famous, and which has helped him enormously in life. In curious contrast are his eyes, which are small, and placed rather close together, and very shrewd in expression. When he is serious, it is a stern, rather hard face, and not very prepossessing, but when he smiles the "Taft smile," it is altered in the most extraordinary manner, and he really looks charming.

It was at this reception that Secretary Taft made the announcement concerning Filipino independence which is alleged to have been unexpected:

On the dais were placed two or three rows of Vienna cane chairs, those for the important people in front, with arms to them. In these sat the Governor, Mrs. Luke E. Wright, and "Miss Alice." Next to the latter Mr. Taft took the chair assigned to him, into which he wedged himself with infinite trouble; but the chair at once broke into pieces. Every one laughed very much, Mr. Taft most heartily of all, saying in a good-natured, jolly way: "Here! Some one give me a chair I can sit down on. I'm tired of standing."

So they brought him another chair, and he took his place, and the speechifying began.

The Presidente of Iloilo—a very courtly old Filipino of the name of Meliza—made a speech of welcome, a very long affair, which included the subjects of Taxation, Duties, and Independence, to which Mr. Taft replied elusively, repeating nothing tangible but his old phrase of "Philippines for the Filipinos."

Then some more people made speeches—natives—and at last they drove Mr. Taft into a corner about the Independence, and he said, "I am not come to give you your independence, but to study your welfare. You will have your Independence when you are ready for it, which will not be in this generation—no, nor in the next, nor perhaps for a hundred years or more."

Even though I have told you how up to then no one had any idea of why he and his party had come to the Islands—most people thinking he was going to say nothing definite about the Americans retiring from the Islands—the natives all firmly convinced that he was coming to ratify the undated promise of Independence he made them two years ago—even though I have told you this, you can have no idea of the effect these words had upon the audience. We were simply staggered, and the darker complexioned among us sat quite still and immovable.

The speeches lost some of their force by being translated as they went along by an interpreter, who spoke English and Spanish with equal perfection, and, indeed, he was quite marvelous; but all the same the utterances lost point, and it was not easy to follow the thread with long halts between. What was more serious was that the translations of Mr. Taft's opinions were softened by the courteous Spanish phrases, and the fiery patriotism of the Filipinos was marvelously toned down in the English rendering.

There seemed to be a lack of dignity in the bearing of the American visitors, in the opinion of the English lady:

The whole ceremony was indescribably free and easy, and even commonplace. Most of the Senators took very little interest in the proceedings, while the ladies with them did not even pretend to care about what was going on. As to "Miss Alice," she was honest enough to make no pretense at all of listening to anything, but sat staring before her, drumming with her pretty, slender, white fingers on her lips, only waking up to signal and laugh to some friends in a doorway near the platform. She was very girlish and natural in this and in all her other gestures, and if she lacked the pose necessary to the occasion, one could not be too critical nor take objection to her lack of grand manner when people were presented to her, for, after all, such situations are only to be carried off with ease by those born and bred to State ceremonies. Besides it would have been unreasonable to have looked for scrupulous aristocratic bearing among such a party of professed democrats.

In spite of all that, however, the Filipinos, who, with their traditions of customs, are themselves a very polite people, were much shocked by the free and easy ways of their rulers, benefactors, or whatever they are. I afterward heard many little comments upon the American lack of dignity, which made me feel sad, for these two peoples will never understand each other—even the good sentiments of the heart being conveyed by differences of manner, which are meat to one and poison to the other.

But few handsome costumes were displayed, and one notable showing was considered worthy of this paragraph:

One handsome woman, who I heard was the wife of an officer in Camp Josman, was so much in evening dress, possibly to make up for the others in the blouses, that she was instantly nicknamed The Mermaid. Her finely shaped head was dressed very low and set off by classic bands of gold, with huge bunches of flowers and ribbons over each ear, and I heard a man near me suggest to another that some one should go and ask her to take some of the ornaments out of her coiffure and put them in her bodice. But no one had the courage to do this thing, so the little Mestiza ladies stared and giggled, and as for the few Orientals present, they looked at The Mermaid as if they thought Equality was going to be great fun.

The banquet in the evening, at which the absence of Miss Roosevelt was noted, was another feast of speechmaking rather than of edibles, and the author reports at length the varying declarations of visitors and visited. When all was over, two prominent citizens, dignified in the book with capital initials, spoke to the lady of the show and the commanding orator:

I said: "He spoke a great many truths; what he said was very straightforward."

"Yes," said the P. C., "but he should have said all that two years ago."

Another fateful declaration follows the second brief interview:

"It was a fine show," we said.

"Why, yes," he agreed, "I guess the Filipinos did their best for the Seewar."

"I think he disappointed them, though," said C—.

"Well, I should smile! I guess Secretary Taft's the best hated man in these islands now."

And that, I believe, is the unfortunate truth.

Later, when the Manila papers came out with versions of the affair, the lady was stirred to indignation:

I never read such brazen lying in my life; in fact the reports are so cooked that they leave off being annoying and begin to be funny. The wild scenes of popular enthusiasm, the crowded banquet, the frantic love of the people of Panay for their idol, and so on, and so on. And as to sheer reporting, Mr. Taft's speech (which the Manila people are informed was greeted by the natives with much thunderous applause) is given at length, but the impassioned utterance of the patriot who clutched the back are dismissed in a few mild No mention, too, of the ominous hiss in the procession, of the note of hack of the menu at the banquet, not the faintest hint of the one hiss which greeted the sentiment the Seewar himself. So much for local papers. And if that is the they daily with truth out here, one only faintly wonder what impression this trip is being disseminated; the intelligent voters in the far-off A., by our well informed journal friend and others of his kidney.

The Iloilo banquet, hy-the-bye, up rather disastrously for the American dignity, as the rowdy party at the near us got up some quarrel with the Filipino waiters; there were blows fighting, and the whole lot were ch out into the street. This as you imagine, has made a horrible scene and produced a very bad impression.

Not only Filipino independence Filipino and American equality favorite topics with Mrs. Dauncey. of the choicest bits of her philosophy in a letter from Manila:

I have discussed the subject, good nature, and generally half in with nearly all the Americans I met, for it is one that interest enormously; and the gist of all the me—or imply, which is better—is all Americans are the equal of above but not of those below then I suggest a social distinction between any citizen of the United States and King of England, the mere idea of a proposition makes these democrats into fits of laughter, but when I then if they, personally, would commit an indignity to be sent to dine in king's kitchen with his scullions, generally get quite offended and see that at all. I think, too, that subtleties of democratic etiquette can be even more distracting to the Filipino brain than they are to people like myself, for though the "little brother" is now being taught that men are equal, he can see without doubt that a native or Mestizo with plenty of money can get the wives of the big American officials to visit his house, whereas the poorer relative is not recognized.

Emerson told his countrymen the truth once for all when he said that "humanity loves a lord"—and it will have "lords," and must make "lords," and the best intentioned American in the world will no more make these half-breed Malays equals of each other or any one else, than they are of other or negroes.

Public improvements, too, are mysterious subjects to Mrs. Dauncey, but easily understood, even when in purpose and impossible in fact:

It is the American go-ahead, run before-you-walk way, too, to build docks and harbors costing millions before they have spent the necessary thousands in constructing roads to drag the merchandise from inland, or to feed the hundreds required to encourage trade.

The same thing is being done down Iloilo, where two millions are being spent on a harbor, when there is not one tolerable road across the island, and all the revenues that choke agriculture go to pay the officials and the school teachers, conditions which prevail throughout the Archipelago. The Americans mean well by the Philippines; but no one can doubt for an instant, which makes it all the more sad to see them wasting magnificent energy, and carrying nothing but failure and unpopularity by going dead against everything that has ever been discovered about the successful government of the Asiatics. Then, is this real government? It is very difficult to know what to call it, as at one time the venture is referred to as a "Colony," at another as "the Youngest of the United States," and yet again as "A Sacred Trust." In fact they use these terms indiscriminately and officially, which is very puzzling.

From national aspirations and disappointments to the economies of the household and back again is a little journey easily and expeditiously accomplished in the book:

Rice and potatoes from China, live cattle from China, or frozen meat from Australia, and everything else under the sun in transit from London or America! Thus, after six years of what we are told is the most enlightened system of colonial or Tropical Government yet invented. It is useless to point out that roads exist inland, except one in Luzon for the Governor and his family (go to the hills; or to remark that labor is too dear for any enterprise to try, and that all healthy foreign competition in the way of labor is excluded. The reply is, to contemplate the splendid work that is being done in education. For these schools and swarming schoolmasters this pastoral country is being taxed and tarified to breaking point—schools to which the natives are being taken from the fields, and in which they are taught a crude wash of English and mathematics. The chief result is to bring all the "scholars" into the towns to loaf along as clerkships, if they can get them. You will laugh at my vehemence! But it does seem such a pity to see a splendid country wasted, as it were, thrown away, for the sake of a windy theory expounded by some well-meaning though ignorant sentimentalists at the other side of the globe.

There is no satisfaction in the money on the islands or in the spending of it:

The money here is a dollar currency called Conant, which is worth 2s. 1d.—half the American dollar. This is the Philippine currency, and is named after its inventor, an American called Conant, and I wish he had invented a cheaper unit, for 10 Conant dollars, or pesos, as they are called, are nothing to spend, whereas the equivalent, an English guinea, is an important sum, and represents four times the spending value of 10 pesos. It is a silver currency, dollars and notes, and the coins have rather a pretty design of a man sitting looking at the sea, surrounded by most amusing inscriptions. For instance, the 5-cent piece is: "Five Centavos," and underneath is "Filipinas." Why not "Five cents," and "Philippines," or else "Cinco Centavos, Filipinas?" Why such a mongrel? One can only suppose it is the notion of Equality coming out in some mysterious way by meeting the natives half-way in Spanish, which, by-the-by, is not their native language, and only a few of them speak it at all.

Extravagance is a vice that causes constant pain to innocent people in the provinces:

You know the way Americans go about in Europe spending the unit, which is lower than their own, like water, with no sense of value? And how they raise prices wherever they go! Well, they have done the same thing here, and an American woman, who was talking to me the other day, told me it was now beginning to be apparent to them what a mistake they had made, and they bitterly regretted having made the Philippines as expensive as America, but that it was very difficult for them to go back now to the more reasonable scale, for as soon as a Filipino found out you were an American, nothing would move him from American prices. Poor thing, she was very bitter about it, and I felt very sorry for her (as well as rather alarmed for myself), for the sums she was paying in rent and wages to live at all in Iloilo, would have kept her in comfort in London or Paris.

Decoration Day has been established in the Philippines as a public holiday, but Mrs. Dauncey finds reasons for a lack of sympathy with its objects:

They have so ordered the ceremony that the graves of those who fell out here in the war with Spain and the Insurrection are supposed to be decorated, Americans and Filipinos alike. But the two events become hopelessly confused in the native mind; and it is no wonder that the Filipinos have some dim idea that they are rejoicing over the fall of those of the Americans whom they managed to kill in the Insurrection. There are not many American soldiers' graves out here to decorate, however, as the dead Americans are being dug up and sent back to their homes—such a queer idea! Fancy if we dug up all the men who fell in our innumerable wars and sent them to their relations at home! There is nothing left but bones, of course, but each man is identified by a bottle containing his name, etc., which was buried with him. At least, they are identified to a certain extent; but a man who had the job of bringing a lot down the Pasig for shipment told C—, that the only thing to be done, as a rule, was to put a name on a coffin and then lay inside as many bones as you could find to make a complete skeleton. It sounds rather horrible, but I must say one can't have much sympathy with such unheroic and superstitious sentimentality, which seems to me no better than the customs of the Chinese.

Additions to the number of more or less permanent resting-places are continually being made even under the happiest conditions otherwise:

I have before me the Manila Times of 17th January, 1906; from which I give the following extract:—"While the municipal and ecclesiastical dignitaries, etc., were awaiting the arrival of Secretary Taft, a Government vessel slowly made her way up the Pasig River filled with the dead and wounded from the island of Samar. During the stay of the party in Manila, four native men were brought in from the adjoining province of Cavite frightfully mutilated because of their pro-American sympathies."

Summing up at the end, when the voyage homeward is at hand, the lady writes:

No, no terrestrial paradise, for one has the laziness, the heat, the apathy, and cruelty of the East, without the compensations of artistic beauty, cheapness, plenty, and luxury, which make up for those draw-backs in other hot countries. A shuffling, drab, discontented, thick-headed, costly East—with all the worst traditions of our hundred years off the off-scourings of the Spanish monkish orders, overlaid by a veneer of shallow cock-sureness hastily assimilated from a totally incongruous alien civilization.

It might be imagined that the climate of the Philippines made Mrs. Dauncey an inerrigible pessimist, but there is evidence to oppose the validity of such an excuse, as the lady declares in one of her earlier letters that she was never able to sleep during the heat of the day; that the solace and reviving influence of the siesta were unknown to her. Were complete justice to all offenders decreed swiftly by fate, it is to be feared that from the date of Mrs. Dauncey's hook—or from that of her first letter from Manila—all peaceful rest, by day or night, must have been denied her.

The great tunnel of the Western Pacific in the Sierras is steadily going through the mountains. The tunnel, when completed, will be nearly a mile and a half in length, and is a monumental undertaking. The work has been begun at both ends and the two bores are being pushed toward each other. There is another big tunnel at Niles canyon, but it has not the length of the one through the Sierra. The work on the tracks is being pushed westward from Salt Lake City and there are about 10,000 men grading and laying the tracks. The chief engineer reports that at least 7,000 more men could be used in the work and that he is greatly hampered because he cannot secure the requisite labor for the work.

A will that was toasted to a brown crisp in the San Francisco fire, but is still legible, was filed for probate in Oakland recently. It was locked in a safe with other papers. When the safe was opened it was found that with care it could be pasted to pieces of thin paper, and this was done. By holding it to the light the tracing of the ink can be read. The will is that of Edward P. Herenden.

The Paris budget committee in taking up the estimates for 1907 struck out the salary of Diehler, the public executioner, thus foreshadowing the disappearance of the guillotine.

P. Connor, the weather observer on the fifth floor of the Rialto Building, was bowed over his desk. The noises from the street floated in at the half open window. This is the picture presented by the Kansas City Star, and the interview as reported:

"The area of high barometric pressure, which is forming rapidly in the northwest," murmured Mr. Connor, tracing out queer-looking lines on the map, "is moving slowly but surely to the south and southwest. We are likely to have rain; yes, or snow. Who knows? Let's see what the almanac says. I'll bet that—" Brr-hrr-hrr! "O, hang that telephone." Brr-hrr-hrr! "Yes, I'm coming. Keep on ringing."

P. Connor at the 'phone: "Hello! Yes, this is the United States weather bureau. Connor is my name. Yes, this is Connor. I say Connor. Yes, C-o-n-n-o-r."

The unmistakable feminine voice through the 'phone: "Well, of course, I couldn't talk to any one else but you. It's very important, at least to me. You see, if it rains I don't want to wear it. It would ruin it, you know. And if it's a nice day, why everybody will be so dressy and I would feel awfully tacky. Wear it? Wear what? Why, goodness me! don't you know? I mean my new party gown."

P. Connor, catching his breath: "Ah, I see, madam. You want to know if it will rain tomorrow?"

F. V.: "Yes, that's it, Mr. Connor. You see tomorrow is the day Mrs. Got-rocks entertains. Bridge, you know, and she always does it so lovely, of course I would want to wear my very best."

P. C., hracing himself against the wall for a final effort—"No, madam, it will not rain tomorrow. Not at all. Don't mention it."

F. V.: "Then I can wear it. Good bye." Hangs up receiver.

Why women seem to find a fascination in the swiftly rising elevator is easily understood, when explained:

"We carry lots of women clear to the top floor or at least several floors up and then they take the next elevator down without going three steps away from the elevator," declared the operator of one of the "lifts" in a big office building. "No, it isn't because they like to ride in the elevators, particularly. Why do they do it? To get the use of the mirrors, of course. See those mirrors on either side of the elevator? That's what attracts them. A hit of wind will strike them as they turn the corner by a big building and then they imagine that their hair is badly disarranged and make for the nearest mirror, which is in the elevator."

Mrs. William Howard, the wealthy Boston widow, has had one of those experiences which should warn Americans against too much reliance on foreign chauffeurs:

Mrs. Howard bought a magnificent car from a French firm before leaving America. Then she instructed a French chauffeur to bring it to Paris and on to London, having given him first a sum of money to buy various accessories and sundries.

The chauffeur disappeared entirely somewhere near Paris, and the car arrived the other day in London looking like a second-hand article. It had evidently taken hundreds of people on excursions, and there were certain articles in the car which showed that the chauffeur had also enjoyed a few race meetings.

The whole car was in a terrible condition. Mrs. Howard was in despair, but she has no intention of going to the trouble of commencing a hunt for the fugitive.

A Chinese gentleman gives in a recent number of the Metropolitan Magazine his impressions of American clubwomen in this entertaining style:

Among the many invitations I have received was one to meet some "club women." The club woman is an American product. It is now fashionable to belong to clubs, hence, as a rule, the clubs are made up of

First. Women who wish to attain notoriety. They find in the club an opportunity to read original papers, poems and verses—as the members have rules by which they agree to listen to the literary productions of fellow-members. There is no escape.

Second. Women who by this way increase their acquaintance.

Third. Women who dislike household work.

There are clubs for all purposes. Thus women join forces and form a club—to study the mental development of the child. At the meetings you will hear profound dissertations upon the subject by women who have never borne children. I have seen a hook on "The Infant, How to Bring It Up," by a spinster.

The wedding gift of the Duchess of Roxburgh (formerly Miss May Golet, of New York), to Lady Unah Hely Hutchinson shows how prevalent cigarette-smoking habit is now among young English society women.

It was a complete cigarette outfit, the match safe, cigarette case and lighter being in gold, with an amber mouth-piece.

The Duchess is a great devotee of the "weed." At the Duchess of Westminster's party the other evening, when the ladies retired to the drawing-room, she introduced an innovation by producing her dainty gold cigarette case and, asking permission of her hostess, handed it around.

When the men came up they found nearly all the ladies smoking and the drawing-room wreathed with cigarette smoke.

From London came the following gleeful announcement of a remarkable lack of appreciation by Parisians:

Thirty Kentucky girls have introduced new slang into the French language. They arrived in Paris a few days ago with the widely heralded statement that they were "PEACHES."

The Paris newspapers seized the phrase. Parisians now call every girl a "peach." The Kentuckiennes resented the report that they were either "peaches" or beauties. Paris, however, insists that they are both.

Crowds surrounded the Hotel du Louvre and audibly commented on the appearance of the tourists. Next day the Kentuckiennes were followed everywhere by kodakers. Their photographs were published everywhere. The tourists declare they suffer more from publicity than from the heat.

The Paris "Gil Blas" is severe. It says: "There is not one beauty among them. They have no figure and no features. Any group of Parisian shop girls can give them points on dress. Their walk is gawky. Youthfulness is conspicuously absent."

The other papers, among which are the "Matin," "Echo" and "Petit Parisien" joke about the American beauty standard and say the girls make unentertained remarks about public monuments the like of which are not visible in their own country.

The "Petit Parisien" says: "They lack appreciation of the beautiful things of Paris. Kentucky's reputation for producing beautiful women has received its death blow in the selection made by the 'Courier-Journal.' We fear the paper had to work too hard raising subscriptions for our ingenious confreres to pay attention to individual charms."

A special cable dispatch to the New York World says that the French public and the press, as the first offender and instigator, are showing singular lack of gallantry in its treatment of the thirty Kentucky girls who are touring Europe under the auspices of the Louisville Courier-Journal.

Against all the facts it has been assumed, or pretended, that these girls represent the "survival of the fittest" in a hearty show, instead of having been selected for their popularity.

As a matter of fact the visitors are happy and healthy young women, conspicuous neither for rare features nor for what the French consider sartorial elegance. But five hundred Parisians gathered at the station to see the trans-Atlantic beauty en masse and from fifteen hundred to two thousand waiting at the hotel showed almost indignation at their foolish disappointment. As the girls straggled out of the train with their "grips" and waited for the omnibus there was at first silence, then here and there a laugh, then various uncomplimentary murmurs of "We can do better than this in Paris," and "So these are American peaches, are they? Well, our home fruit is more tempting."

"Peach," which the London correspondents passed on to Paris, threatens forthwith to become accepted French. All the papers use it and it has already been applied to French women.

L'Eclair distinguished itself by a mocking article. It declares that it finds the beauty of the visitors only a bluff. Another remarks: "Never did feet so immense prop so little beauty."

Surprise is expressed that one of the first places they visited in Paris was the Morgue, which no decent French woman thinks of entering. Their explanation is that through some strange misunderstanding they thought they were being taken to the Zoological Gardens.

All their movements are published at great length, making excellent "silly season" matter. One paper even asserts gravely that they live in rocking chairs evenings and are fed mainly on iced water and crackers.

The girls themselves are inclined to be angry at the treatment, but they are enthusiastic over Paris as a city, agreeing that it is far finer than London. Most of them choose the Louvre as the true glory of Paris.

The girls have received invitations to every theatre and music hall in Paris.

Two journals have already proposed to Miss Ord Hazelip, who is twenty and a full-blown lawyer, to publish her impressions of Paris as compared with New York and London.

A novel feature of the Macgregor building, to be erected by the Boyd estate, on the northwest corner of Pine and Battery Streets, will be the introduction in the basement of a series of safe deposit vaults for the exclusive use of the occupants of the building.

Johann Martin Schleyer, the enthusiastic inventor of Volapuk, is also a monsignor of the Roman Catholic church, and has just celebrated his seventy-fifth birthday at his dwelling on the shore of Lake Constance.

The Chancellery of the Legion of Honor, having refused to approve the Government's nomination of Sarah Bernhardt for the insignia of Chevalier of the order, Minister of Public Instruction Byrand announces his formal approval of the Chancellery's action, which is based on Mme. Bernhardt being an actress, without official status.

Nat Goodwin's manager, George Goodwin, was a little afraid of venturing into San Francisco for fear of an earthquake on April 18th. Goodwin's faith in the city was founded on a rock, and he prevailed. After being installed in their apartments, Goodwin waited until he heard sonorous snores proceeding from Goodwin's room, and then quietly secured himself under the bed. At the first signal a glass of jelly went through the window, pans fell with a crash, and the ladies made the night hideous with their screams. The bed heaved all ways at once as Nat heaved and did the earthquake act. Weeden went three feet into the air, and never stopped until he felt terra firma. Weeden still tells of his earthquake experience, and every time he does it Nat goes into unexplainable paroxysms.

The suit of Edna Wallace Hopper to break the will of the late Alexander Dunsmuir, her stepfather, has met with a succession of adverse judgments, the latest being the recommendation of its dismissal by the judicial committee of the Privy Council in London, England.

John Lawrence Toole, for many years the favorite low comedian of the British public, died at his home in Brighton, England, July 30, aged 74. Never a great actor, he had the good fortune to associate himself with a type of character which appealed irresistibly to the national sense of humor, or pathos, and so came to be recognized and acknowledged as a representative British comedian. He began acting in youth as an amateur, but became a professional in 1852, making his first appearance in London in "The Spitalfields Weaver," a farce in which he was popular for years. He was the original Spriggins in "Ici on Parle Francais," a character which he played thousands of times to the delight of countless spectators. He made a hit as Caleb Plummer, and followed with successes in "A Fool and His Money," "Through Fire and Water," and other similar plays. There was no one to compete with him in popularity, either in town or country, and when he was incapacitated he was able to retire into private life with an abundant competence. Outside the British Isles he was little more than a name. In this country which he visited thirty years ago, he had a chilling reception. In New York city he failed utterly. He appeared in several of the characters in which he was most admired in England, and found his audiences utterly unresponsive. He soon returned to England and never again crossed the Atlantic. Most Americans today will remember him chiefly as the lifelong friend of Henry Irving. The affection between the two men was profound and tender, and they had frequent happy reunions.

THE ORPHEUM.

May Boley, a most versatile comedienne, will make her first vaudeville appearance in this city at the Orpheum this Sunday afternoon in Richard Carle's "Polly Girls" and the "Village Cut-Ups," the two principal novelties of his musical comedy, "The Maid and the Mummy." The act opens with the "Polly Girls" and is followed by the internationally famed acrobatic and fantastic dancer, Jennie Prager; after which comes the comical conceit, "The Village Cut-Ups." This number is rustic in character and combines the features of musical comedy, opera and burlesque. Mary Norman, the monologist, will reappear after an absence from San Francisco of several seasons. Terley comes direct from London. He appears as a hush mounted on its pedestal; beside it is a young girl, attired in the white smock of the sculptor; as she proceeds to carve—so it appears—the features take shape—each touch brings on a finished hush is before the astonished audience. It is all so real that you can hear the chips flying as the modeller works. The grounds of the Chutes, where the Orpheum is located, are full of novel attractions and are open every day from ten in the morning until midnight. "A day in the Alps," shown in the electric theatre, is well worth seeing.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Thomas A. Edison has gone on a 2,000-mile automobile tour of Canada, and will hunt for coal in New Ontario.

Old Mme. Lehaudy, mother of the Emperor of the Sahara, and of the celebrated aeronauts, has just made her first ascent. She is 61 years of age and went up with Comte de la Vaux in his balloon, the Icare. They left Paris at 5 o'clock in the afternoon and landed at Limours at 6:45.

Mr. Bryan appears to have accumulated quite a comfortable fortune since his defeat for the presidency in 1896. He was then assessed for taxation at about $5000. He is now assessed at Lincoln, Neb., for $73,000, not including $78,000 of United States bonds which he is said to hold.

The postal card with Mr. Jerome's picture on it and nothing more is circulating in the mails of New York state, much to the profit of the postal revenues. The card is full of politics to the edges, and the question implied, though not expressed outright, is "What do you think of him for governor?"

Mrs. Michael Hickox Durand of Canandaigua, N. Y., celebrated her 99th birthday last week. Mrs. Durand's father, Capt. George Hickox, was an officer in the state militia during the war of 1812, and stationed at Buffalo. Her grandfather fought under Washington at the battle of Trenton. When Mrs. Durand was a girl Brigham Young worked on her father's farm.

Reinhold Begas, probably the greatest German sculptor, has just passed his seventy-fifth birthday. Ten weeks before Bismarck's death, Begas appeared at Friedrichsruh to get a final impression of Germany's most striking figure, before beginning work on the great Bismarck monument voted by the Reichstag. When Begas stated his mission, Bismarck replied: "Gott, why do you wish to set me a great monument? Represent me as being on crutches!"

Miss Kate Barnard, a writer for the Daily Oklahoman, is in Chicago gathering material for the new constitution of Oklahoma. The young woman has credentials from the governor of her State and the mayor of Oklahoma City, and the fruits of her quest will be of practical service. She has been in St. Louis and while there secured articles from the leading charity workers concerning juvenile courts, child labor, compulsory education and child penal laws.

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's impulsive cry of "Vive la Duma!" in his speech before the Interparliamentary Union, was generally supposed in this country to have been an interjection of French. But his whole address was in that language. Both Sir Henry and Lady Campbell-Bannerman speak French fluently. They always spend some time in Paris each year, and have many friends in the French capital. They are fond of exploring the old chateaux, and have for many years been collectors of old French furniture and curios.

LITERARY NOTES.

A Spinster's Romance.

It is not only because it is by May Sinclair of "The Divine Fire" fame that the book reviewer will be apt to single out "Superseded" for special mention, but because the author has shown what amounts to positive genius in laying bare the timid hopes and fears, the elderly flutters, and the subsequent self-castigations of a poor little pathetic, limited, narrow-minded spinster who, at the age of fifty, first falls in love. She is not intrinsically interesting, this pathetically unimaginative pedagogue with the strong sense of duty and the tender heart, but May Sinclair compels her readers to dwell with that pity which is akin to love, and those smiles that are close to tears upon the dry-as-dust details of her cut-and-dried life. This power of illuminating the commonplace grows rare among authors in this epoch of the story for the sake of the plot, but May Sinclair has it to a degree.

Published by Henry Holt and Co.; price, $1.25.

The Fierce Thirst for Gold.

Edmund Mitchell's novel, "In Desert Keeping" is a capital story, its plot turning upon one of the strange, sinister tragedies of the desert. In his leading character Mr. Mitchell has outlined with much skill and adherence to truth the gradual deterioration wrought by the frenzy of the confirmed gold-hunter upon a nature susceptible to the passion for gain. The story, which is located in a Southern California town contiguous to mining territory, is made realistic by the introduction of virile frontier types, and men will enjoy it.

Published by Alston Rivers, London; price, six shillings.

A Canadian Love Story.

The author's familiarity with, and appreciation of the simple-hearted, wholesome, sturdy habitants of the northlands of Canada is the real basis of "The Ancient Miracle," an unpretentious but pleasing love story which includes in its unfolding many homely details of the industrious lives led there. The book will appeal to a taste which is surfeited with the omnipresence of the self-assured, restless up-to-date modern, who knows it all, and has forever lost his simplicity. In comparison, the devout, industrious rustics in Jane Grosvenor Cooke's story are as a draught of spring water beside a schooner of steam beer.

Published by A. S. Barnes; price, $1.50.

Some Exuberant Westerners.

In "The Builders," a story of life in an ebullient Western town, in which Willis George Emerson has turned his own experiences to account, the sincerity of the author is agreeably reflected in a style that renders the book acceptable in spite of a lack of the skill of the trained novelist. Mr. Emerson has an old-fashioned preference for closing each chapter with a moral or philosophical reflection done up, as it were, in a neat package. But one finds one's self reading them, and his exuberant Westerners, although somewhat inclined to model themselves upon Wilkins Micawber, strike the reader as happily indigenous to the fruitful soil upon which they flourish.

Published by Forbes & Co.; price, $1.50.

A Multiplication of Pigs.

The inborn antipathy of the general public for red tape is amusingly justified by Ellis Parker Butler in "Pigs is Pigs," which, although it is a short story, has the honor of occupying an entire volume by itself. The marrow of the tale is the dispute which arises between the agent of an express company and the consignor of two guinea pigs, as to whether the rates due are for pigs or pets. While the officials in the company settle the point the guinea pigs thrive and increase, at the company's expense, for the consignor, disgusted at the circumlocution of red tape methods, leaves town and is heard of no more. The story is of the quality that will bear reading aloud to a delighted family circle on a dull winter evening.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

Mrs. Humphrey Ward is making plans for her long expected visit to the United States this autumn or winter. She has not made up her mind to accept any of the offers made to her by lecture bureaus.

"A literal translation of Mr. Henry James's article in the August North American indicates that he was charmed with Baltimore," is the not altogether gracious acknowledgment of the Baltimore Sun.

"In the Shadow of the Lord" is a novel to be issued by Henry Holt and Company in the early autumn. It is by Mrs. Hugh Fraser, already favorably known for her "Maid of Japan," "Letters from Japan," and other books. Mary Washington, the mother of the father of the country, is the central figure. Her husband, Augustine Washington, and the young George himself are among the characters.

Joaquin Miller has gone East to arrange for the publication of his latest work, "For Love Is All in All, Love."

Cooks and books were associated before Owen Meredith declared the former the real necessity, and it is evidenced that the association will continue. When street kitchens were in vogue after the San Francisco disaster, many of the people named their miniature cafes after popular novels. One noticed "The Man of the Hour," very appropriately borrowed from Octave Thanet's story. Other kitchens gave evidence that Geraldine Bonner's California romances had found appreciative readers for they were named "Hard Pan," "Tomorrow's Tangie" and "The Pioneer."

A translation of President Roosevelt's "Rough Riders" has been brought out in Germany under the title "Die Rauhen Reiter." The book is prefaced with a poem by Bret Harte, printed in English, and some of the President's Americanisms in the text of the work have evidently appeared as insurmountable difficulties to the translator.

Among literary topics frequently touched upon in the newspaper press, the predominating feminine influence is prominent. Women writers are furnishing half the short stories for the magazines and much of the verse. In the book world there is a similar condition, as the volumes most in demand always include the work of women. But the most impressive fact, according to the New York World is that "No magazine is likely to achieve great financial success unless it can make a convincing appeal to female readers. How long will it be before the magazines which are now edited chiefly for women be written chiefly by women?"

The "Life and Letters of Lafcadio Hearn," is announced for the autumn. Mrs. Elizabeth Bisland Wetmore, the author, knew Hearn intimately for nearly thirty years. The bulk of the two volumes is given up to Hearn's correspondence during a period of thirty-five years.

Success for August makes the following announcement: "We have a distinct feeling personal pride in presenting to our readers a new writer, Mr. W. C. Morrow, whose work is too little known in the 'effete East.' Out in the great western country of superlatives, Mr. Morrow's writings of virile American life are known and appreciated by the readers of that classic sheet, the San Francisco 'Argonaut.' Mr. Morrow is distinguished also by a great book he wrote a few years ago, 'A Man: His Mark.'"

State Librarian Gillis is seeking information on the early history of California. To that end he has issued a circular asking all who possess books, pamphlets, newspaper files, manuscript narratives, diaries, public correspondence or original documents of any kind which may throw light on the early history of California to send them to the California Historical Department of the State Library at Sacramento. Much literature bearing upon the subject of the State's early history was destroyed in the fire. The State Librarian will pay expressage.

The Dial, Chicago's literary organ, thinks that the announcement of a new magazine in Los Angeles shows that San Francisco's sun has set. Thus the Dial:

"It may be significant of the dubious fortunes of San Francisco, and of the growing importance of its vigorous southern rival, Los Angeles, that the announcement of a new Pacific Coast monthly comes from the latter city. This is to be the 'Pacific Empire Magazine,' and its publication is to begin September 1st. As its title might imply, it will concern itself largely with the industrial and commercial development of the great and growing southwestern region of which Los Angeles is perhaps now the most vital center and exponent. But it will include intellectual as well as material things in its survey, and will lighten its more serious contents by stories and poems, and by profuse illustrations. Mr. Edmund Mitchell, for some years past the leading editorial writer on the Los Angeles Times, and author of several works of fiction, etc., a man of large experience and scholarship, is to be the editor-in-chief, assisted by Mr. John S. McGroarty, also an experienced journalist and author of several works of verse and fiction. We wish success to this new venture in an interesting and enticing field; it will make, we trust, a worthy fourth in the quartette of notable California magazines, beginning with the old classic Overland of Bret Harte, and including the beautiful but ill-fated Californian of Professor Holder, as well as Mr. Lummis's Out West 'sui generis' and indestructible."

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

When Jim Fisk was in his glory as a railroad magnate, one day he was greatly annoyed by people asking for passes over his road for all sorts of reasons. He was well worked up, when a badly looking individual asked for a pass and asked sharply: "On what grounds do you ask for a pass?" The man replied: "Because I do not wish to pay my fare." Fisk called a policeman and said to him: "Give this man a ticket to anywhere and return. He is the only man that has told the truth today."

A professor of sciences, well known for his absent-mindedness, was engaged in a deep controversy one day with a law student when his wife hurriedly entered the room. "Oh, my dear," she said, "I've swallowed a pin." The professor smiled. "Don't worry about it, my dear," he said in a soothing tone. "It is of no consequence. Here—" he pointed at his lapel—"Here is another pin."

A woman entered a bar-room, and addressed quietly to her husband, who sat drinking with three other men. She laid a covered dish on the table and said: "Thinkin' ye'd be too busy to come to supper, Jack, I've fetched it to you here." And she departed. The man looked awkwardly. He invited his friends to share the meal with him. When he removed the cover from the dish, the dish was empty. It contained a slip of paper that said: "I hope you will enjoy your supper. It is the only one your wife and children have at home."

To city men hired a horse and trap for a little outing. Upon reaching their destination, the horse was unharnessed and permitted peacefully to graze while the men fished for an hour or two. When they were ready to go home, a difficulty presented itself, inasmuch as neither of them knew how to re-harness the horse. The worst problem was properly to address the bit. The horse himself seemed to resent the idea of going into harness again. Finally one of the friends, in disgust, sat down in the road. There's only one thing we can do, he said. "What's that?" asked the other. "Wait for the foolish beast to come."

William Wightman held office in the old court of Queen's Bench far beyond the prescribed time, and at last he gave a sort of farewell of his brother judges. However, he turned up smiling again at Westminster Hall. "Why, brother Wightman," said Sir Alexander Cockburn, "you told us that you intended to send in your resignation." "So I did," said Sir William, "but when I went home and told my wife she said: 'Why, William, what on earth do you think that we can do with you messing about the house all day?' So you see I was obliged to come down to court again."

A beautiful German peasant girl disappeared at New York the other day. She was tall and strong, blue-eyed and yellow-haired. She wanted to know at once if there were any letters for her. The postmaster at the pier, after getting her name, said, by way of a joke: "Is it a business or a love letter that you expect?" The girl faltered. "A business letter." "Well, there's nothing here," said the man, after looking over the assortment. The girl hesitated. Then, blushing as red as a rose, she said: "Would you mind just looking among the love letters, now, sir?"

Of Manuel Garcia, the famous centennial musician, who died a few days ago, it is told that a very rich woman offered the master any price if he would only teach her daughter. He refused, knowing well he could never obtain serious work from her; but, as the mother persisted, he hit upon a compromise. He asked the woman to be present during a lesson. The lesson began. The pupil, who seemed to the listeners an already finished singer, had to repeat passage after passage of the most difficult exercises before the master was satisfied. Mother and daughter exchanged horrified glances, and looked on pityingly. The lesson finished, the master bowed the women out, and, in passing the pupil, the young girl whispered to her, "It would kill me!" Senor Garcia, returning from the door, said contentedly: "They will not come again, thank you; mon enfant, you sang well."

In 1869, when Charles Lever was consul at Trieste, he paid a visit to England. On his arrival he called on Lord Lytton. The two novelists chatted for some time, and at length Lord Lytton said: "You will have an opportunity presently of meeting your chief, Clarendon. I expect him every moment." Lever was aghast. He recollected suddenly that he had left Trieste without obtaining formal leave. He endeavored to excuse himself to Lytton—he had to be off—he was very sorry, but—While he was explaining, the Minister for Foreign Affairs was announced. "Ah, Lever!" said Lord Clarendon, in surprise. "I did not know you had left Trieste." "No, my lord. The fact is," said the ready Lever, "I thought it would be more respectful if I came and asked your lordship personally for leave."

An Italian laborer was killed while at work on a dam at the pulp-mills, Millinocket, Me. At the hearing before the local justice there was found in a pocket a roll of bills containing $25, and bidden in one of the bootlegs was found a dirk knife. As there was no probate court within many miles of the town, the judge was at a loss to know what disposal should be made of the money. Finally he hit upon the solution. The court took charge of the money and fined the corpse $25 for carrying concealed weapons.

The Kaiser once said that of all the good stories his brother, Prince Henry, brought back from America, none amused him more heartily than this: As the German boat bearing the prince came up New York harbor hundreds of boats crowded close, and from the deck of one unpretentious river boat came a hail in megaphone tones: "Hey, Henry, how's Bill?"

Jones had come home about two in the morning rather the worse off for a few highballs. As soon as he opened the door his wife began upbraiding him for his conduct. Jones went to bed and when he was almost asleep could hear her scolding him unmercifully. He dropped off to sleep and awoke after a couple of hours, only to hear his wife remark: "I hope all the women don't have to put up with such conduct as this." "Annie," said Jones, "are you talking again or yet?"

Sir Robert Ball, after a lecture on "Sun-Spots and Solar Chemistry," met a young lady who expressed her regret at having missed the lecture. "Well, you see," he said, "I don't know that it would have interested you particularly, as it was all about sun-spots." "Why," she replied, "it would have interested me extremely, for I have been a martyr to freckles all my life."

A simple-hearted, ingenious, young German by name of Louis Schultz, living in Hoboken, became engaged after a brief acquaintance to a young maiden whose reputation as a coquette was well known. One of Louis's friends on meeting him one day said: "You don't mean to tell me that you are going to marry Minnie Blanche?" "Sure," replied Louis, "for why not?" "Why, she's been engaged to every young man in Hoboken." "Vell," slowly answered Louis, "Hoboken ain't such a big place."

The plans for what promises to be a most magnificent temple of art have practically been completed, and it is expected that the idea of F. M. Smith and F. C. Havens to erect an art gallery on one of the most commanding points in the beautiful Piedmont hills, at a cost of $1,000,000, will be speedily realized. Mr. Smith, the "Borax King," intends the building as a memorial to him.

PERSONAL.

Notes and Gossip.

A chronicle of the social happenings during the past week in the cities on and around the Bay of San Francisco will be found in the following department:

The engagement is announced of Miss Edna Montgomery of this city to Lieutenant Edward A. Sturges, Fifth Cavalry, U. S. A. The wedding will take place in October.

It is announced that the wedding of Mrs. Rebecca McMullin Belvin to Mr. Francis J. Heney will probably take place next spring.

Miss Ethyl Hager will have as her attendants on the occasion of her wedding to Mr. Lansing O. Kellogg, on September 5th, Miss Alice Hager as maid of honor and Miss Anita Harvey and Miss Helen de Young as bridesmaids.

Mr. and Mrs. John F. Boyd will entertain at a large tea this afternoon (Saturday) at their home in San Rafael, in honor of the debut of their daughter, Miss Louise Boyd. Among those assisting in receiving will be Mrs. A. W. Foster, Mrs. Carter Pomeroy, Mrs. George Gibbs, Miss Ethel Tompkins, Mrs. Benjamin Dibblee, Miss Natalie Coffin, Miss Genevieve Harvey, Miss Janet von Schroeder, Miss Sara Coffin, Miss Claire Nichols, Miss Bessie Ashton and Miss Janet Coleman.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Annexed will be found a resume of movements to and from this city and Coast, and of the whereabouts of absent Californians.

Mr. and Mrs. John Dahlgren and Miss Katharine Martin arrived last month from New York and are to remain until October at their summer home at Santa Cruz. Mr. and Mrs. Francis Graer are also at Santa Cruz with Mrs. Dahlgren.

Mr. and Mrs. Peter Martin, who have been living at Burlingame, will come to the city shortly to spend some time at the home of Mrs. Eleanor Martin on Broadway.

Mrs. Phoebe A. Hearst has returned to Paris after several weeks' travel through Holland.

The Rev. Dr. Edward A. Dodd and Mrs. Dodd (formerly Miss Lorette de Witt Allen) returned early this week from their wedding journey to Lake Tahoe. They will leave about September 1st for their home in Boston.

Miss Katrina Wright, who is at present in Japan with her father, Ambassador Wright, will arrive here in October, en route East and will spend a few weeks here as the guest of Dr. and Mrs. A. H. Voorhies.

Mrs. William Mayo Newhall, Miss Margaret Newhall, Miss Marion Newhall and Miss Elizabeth Newhall, who have been abroad since March, have recently gone from Italy to England for several weeks' stay.

Mrs. J. Downey Harvey, who has recently returned from a trip abroad, arrived at her home in San Francisco on Sunday evening last.

Mr. and Mrs. William H. McKittrick and Miss Redmond, who have been at the McKittrick ranch, "The Meadows," near Bakersfield, during the winter, are at Santa Barbara for the summer, having taken a cottage there.

Mrs. J. W. Keeney, who has been East for several months, is at present the guest of her sister, Mrs. Harding, at the latter's country place in the Catskills.

Miss Sophie Coleman and Miss Lucy Gwin Coleman have been recent visitors at Santa Cruz.

Mr. Edward M. Greenway is spending the month of August at the Hotel Rafael.

Mr. and Mrs. Pelham Ames, who have been living in Oakland since the fire, have recently come to town and have taken a flat on Lyon street, near Sacramento, their own old home on Taylor street having been burned.

Mrs. James Cunningham and Miss Sara Cunningham have arrived from the East and are at their home on Broadway. The duration of their stay in California is rather indefinite.

Mr. and Mrs. Parker Whitney, Jr., are spending some weeks at Lake Tahoe.

Mrs. F. W. Dohrmann and Mrs. B. Paulsen, who have returned from Europe, are staying at Dr. Kaspar Pischel's country home, The Hillocks, in Ross Valley.

Mrs. Lucy Otis, who has been at the home of her son, Mr. James Otis, on Broadway, since the fire, will go to the Knickerbocker on Fillmore street and Pacific avenue, on September 1st, to spend the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Crocker and their family returned on the Hongkong Maru on Monday last from a three months' trip to Japan.

Miss Elsie Sperry has returned from several weeks' stay at Sag Harbor as the guest of Mrs. Frank Havens.

Mrs. Beverly MacMonagle, who has been traveling in Europe since the early spring, is in Switzerland for an indefinite stay.

Charles S. Fee, general passenger agent of the Southern Pacific, has just returned from Chicago, where he has been attending various conferences.

News has been received of the arrival in France of Mrs. Llewellyn Jones, Miss Grace Llewellyn Jones and Lieutenant Jere Burnett.

Mrs. Ives and Miss Florence Ives, who have been at Cloverdale for several weeks, are now at Del Monte, where Miss Ives will compete in the golf tournament.

Miss Helen Woolworth, who left shortly after the fire for Europe has been touring Switzerland, in an automobile, with Mr. and Mrs. Pope of New York.

Mr. and Mrs. Elthian, Miss Annie Ide and Mr. Bourke Cochran have been spending some days at Lake Tahoe.

Mr. P. N. Lilienthal, manager of the Anglo-Californian Bank, has gone on to New York to rejoin his family, whom he left at the Atlantic sea coast immediately after the fire of last April, when he hurriedly returned to San Francisco.

Mr. Julius Kruttschnitt, director of operation and maintenance of way of the Harriman roads, after a stay of several weeks in the city, has gone to the McCloud, where he will join his family. Later he will proceed to Portland and thence across the continent to Chicago.

W. C. Cox and W. F. Bond of Goldfield, Nevada, are stopping at the Hotel Imperial.

Chas. H. Segerstrom and wife of Sonora were registered at the Hotel Imperial last week.

A. N. Hedgpeth of Santa Cruz is in town this week and is stopping at the Hotel Imperial.

Mrs. A. N. Drown, who had been ill for a number of months past, and who was taken to Southern California recently, died at Santa Barbara on Monday, August 13. Her husband and her two daughters, Miss Newell Drown and Mrs. Samuel Boardman, were in constant attendance until the last. The funeral services will take place in this city from the family home, 2550 Jackson street. The deceased lady leaves a large circle of friends and relatives who will mourn her loss.

Mr. George Crocker, who for seven years past has made his home in New York, has presented to the Episcopal Mission of St. John's Church, Ramsey, N. J., a handsome pipe organ in memory of his wife, who died two years ago. While the church was being built, Mr. Crocker was having constructed for himself a mansion near the H. O. Havemeyer farm at Ramsey, and both buildings have just been finished.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Harry Melggs (nee Miss Edith Merry) at San Jose de Costa Rica, has been brightened by the advent of a son.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Wright (nee Miss Linda Hamilton) has been brightened by the advent of a daughter.

H. R. Braden, who for fifteen years has been in the service of the Southern Pacific Company, in this city, first as secretary to General Passenger Agent Horschburg and afterward in succeeding positions of increasing responsibility until he was given charge of the advertising department of the railroad, has resigned his office to engage in business for himself. In partnership with C. M. Bolte, for a long time superintendent of the mechanical department of the Sunset Press, Mr. Braden will devote his efforts to the building up of an advertising and printing business. Before leaving the offices of the Southern Pacific, Mr. Braden was presented with a handsome desk by his associates, and numerous testimonials of regard.

Profiting by the experiences of the five many new San Francisco buildings will have a small elevator in the rear of the store, and at night all books and records will be loaded on to a car, and from the elevator to the front of the basement will be a track, on which the car will run through the basement and into the fireproof vaults, which will be under the sidewalk.

Albert P. Rose, a well-known specialist in tea, died in Los Angeles not long ago. On one occasion 200 varieties of tea were steeped and placed before him, and by taste, he was able to tell the name, quality and value of each.

The first death in Westminster Abbey since Henry IV died there in 1413 occurred a few days ago. The Rev. Mr. Shepherd, of West Kensington, fell as he completed an address, and died immediately.

WHAT PRESS CLIPPINGS MEAN TO YOU

Press clipping information is information you can obtain in other ways. As a business aid, Press Clippings will place before you every scrap of news printed in the country pertaining to your business. They will show you every possible market, and little for your goods, openings that you would never hear of in the ordinary way, and they give you this information in a fresh and valuable form.

If you have a hobby or wish information upon any subject, press clippings will give you any subject or topic, and press clippings will give you all the current information printed, and in a fresh and valuable form.

The cost for any purpose is usually but a few cents a day.

THE INTERNATIONAL PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

the largest press clipping bureau in the world, reads and files 55,000 papers and other periodicals each month, and even if you are now a subscriber to some other clipping bureau, it will give you to investigate our superior service.

Write for our book about Press Clippings and our Daily Business Reports, and ask about The International Information Bureau, which supplies complete manuscripts or material for addresses, essays, lectures and debates, and complete and reliable information upon any subject at a reasonable cost. PERSONAL.

Army and Navy.

The latest personal notes relative to army and navy people who are or have been stationed at Pacific Coast points:

Rear-Admiral W. T. Swinburne, U. S. N., relieved Rear-Admiral Caspar F. Goodrich, U. S. N., on August 10th, at Seattle, on the command of the Pacific Squadron, Rear-Admiral Goodrich having been detached and ordered home. It is understood that Rear-Admiral Goodrich will succeed Admiral Sigsbee, U. S. N., upon the latter's retirement, as superintendent of the Naval Academy at Annapolis.

Major-General Arthur MacArthur, U. S. A., commander of the Pacific Division, accompanied by Mrs. MacArthur and by his aide-de-camp, Captain Frank L. Winn, U. S. A., went to Monterey early last week and remained two days to present the medals to the winners of the Division Small Arms Competition.

General Stephen P. Jocelyn, U. S. A., Mrs. Jocelyn and the Misses Jocelyn, who are spending the summer traveling in Europe, have recently arrived in Dresden. Services over the body of the late Rear-Admiral Charles Train, U. S. N., who died suddenly at Chefoo, on August 4th, were held on August 10th, on board the U. S. battleship Ohio at Yokohama. Rear-Admiral Train's body will be carried directly to Washington, D. C., for interment.

Colonel John A. Lundeen, U. S. A., Inspector-General of the Pacific Division, who has been in Alaska for the past two months on a tour of inspection, returned to San Francisco on Thursday of last week. During Colonel Lundeen's absence, Colonel John P. Wissler, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., was Acting Inspector-General.

Captain John Conklin, Jr., Artillery Corps, U. S. A., who recently arrived here from the Philippines for his examinations for promotion, left during the week for Riley, Kansas, where he will take his examinations.

Captain Roderic O'Connor, assistant surgeon, U. S. A., went down early this week to the Presidio of Monterey for temporary duty with Companies I and K, Tenth Infantry, U. S. A., en route from his post to the transport Logan. On the sailing of the Logan Captain O'Connor returned to his proper station at the Army General Hospital, Presidio of San Francisco.

Lieutenant Arthur MacArthur, Jr., U. S. A., and Mrs. MacArthur, who returned recently from the Orient and have since been the guests of Lieutenant MacArthur's parents, General Arthur MacArthur, U. S. A., and Mrs. MacArthur, returned to San Francisco on Friday of last week on a visit to Mrs. MacArthur's parents, Admiral Bowman H. McCalla, U. S. N., and Mrs. McCalla, at their home in Santa Barbara.

Mr. Geo. G. Carr has been the guest of Mr. John Stafford at the Presidio of Monterey. Mrs. Carr will return to Hanford for placing her son in Mt. Tamalpais Military Academy.

Ms. Walter G. Holbome returned to the Presidio of Monterey on Tuesday, where she is a guest of her sister, Mrs. Clifford, wife of Major John Stafford, of the 120th U. S. Infantry. Mrs. Holbome has been passing the past three weeks in San Francisco.

Lieutenant Raymond W. Briggs, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., left on Saturday last for Camp Tacoma, Washington, for duty during the maneuvers.

Lieutenant Yates Stirling, U. S. N., who is so well known on this Coast and who is attached to the U. S. S. Indiana, was recently reported to Washington, D. C., for his examination for promotion.

Lieutenant Edward H. Pearce, Seventh Infantry, U. S. A., on duty with the Twenty-Second Infantry, is transferred to the regiment.

The successful commissioned competitors in the Division Rifle Competition held here this month at the Presidio of Monterey were: Captain Harry L. Steele, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., First Lieutenant William B. Wallace, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., Second Lieutenant Smith A. Hays, Fourteenth Infantry, U. S. A., all of whom were awarded gold medals; First Lieutenant A. S. Cowan, Fourteenth Infantry, U. S. A., Captain F. G. Stritzinger, Twenty-second Infantry, U. S. A., Second Lieutenant A. G. Fisher, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., Second Lieutenant Alvin B. Baker, Engineer Corps, U. S. A., and Second Lieutenant Burt W. Phillips, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., all of whom were awarded bronze medals. The successful commissioned competitors in the Division Pistol Competition held at the same time were: First Lieutenant Aubrey Lippin, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., Second Lieutenant Arthur E. Ahrends, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., both of whom won gold medals, and First Lieutenant James G. Hannah, Tenth Infantry, U. S. A., a bronze medal. Captain William H. Chapman, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., made a score which entitled him to be Distinguished Pistol Shot eligible for the army competition. The small arms teams will compete at Fort Sheridan, Illinois, the rifle team reaching there today and the pistol team on August 22d.

Companies I and K, Tenth Infantry, U. S. A., which have been at the Presidio of Monterey for the past month for the Annual Division Small Arms Competition, returned on the transport Logan, which sailed on Wednesday last from this port, to their proper station at Honolulu.

The committee of five, representing thirty-five dollar-for-dollar insurance companies, has reported on a considerable number of bureau losses, and these companies can now make immediate payment of their share of the insurance. Among typical store and residence losses are the following:

Levi Strauss & Co., value of stock, $1,106,688.90; insurance, $825,000.
St. Francis Hotel, insured for $1,013,000; sound value fixed at $1,481,869.24; salvage appraised at $439,627.28; actual damage, $992,241.96.
Shreve building, insurance, $440,000; sound value, $544,156.51; salvage, $195,668.70; actual fire damage, $348,487.81.
Jacob Stern, residence, insurance on contents, $162,750; salvage, $116,377.50.
Mrs. Ethel Crocker, residence, value of building and contents, $586,653; insurance, $200,000; salvage $4,000.

The British War Office puts its seal of approval on the delayed first volume of the history of the Boer War which has just appeared, and the four volumes of the work will be endorsed "official." Many brilliant officers contributed to the book, but it is said that they are disgusted to find their efforts sadly mangled and emasculated in the printed pages. Colonel Henderson wrote the volume first but the War Office censors would not pass his work, and during their controversy with the author the gallant officer and really brilliant writer died. The volume as issued is not interesting or valuable, in spite of its five years of preparation, if English critics are right.

Southern Pacific clerks, trainmen, freight handlers and other employees who suffered losses in the late fire are to have about $40,000 distributed among them as a partial recompense for what they lost. Probably 150 of the local employees will get varying sums of $200, $300 or $400. No official is to get anything. The cases considered to be most deserving are where employees getting $100 or less a month had all their furniture destroyed or both furniture and homes.

It is estimated that the fares paid by the Americans who landed in England in a recent week amounted to five million dollars. During the next five weeks these enormous bookings will continue. Six thousand American excursionists arrived at Liverpool during the week-end. Including their return fares the 6,000 paid $1,250,000 to the steamship companies. As much as $2,000 for a single journey was given for a suite of state rooms.

It has been stated that 1,000,000 or more tons of structural steel will be required to rebuild the burned business area. Karl Eckerman, a prominent German engineer, says the whole district east from Larkin and Ninth streets to the water front would only take 500,000 tons of steel, if every building in the area had a steel frame. The area will be substantially rebuilt with not over 280,000 tons of the metal, he asserts.

Mrs. Gordon Robertson is teacher of golf at the Women's Golf Club at Mitcham, England, and is said to be the only woman in the British Isles who has chosen the occupation as a profession.

A notable item in the will of Susau C. Seymour, widow of the late Simon Seymour, is a bequest of $4,000 for the construction of a safety waiting station on Market near Powell street.

Brigadier-General Allen, chief of the signal corps of the army, sailed for Europe on August 6th, where he will investigate the signal service in various foreign armies preparatory to attending the international conference on wireless telegraphy which will be convened at Berlin, October 3. Charlemagne Tower, American ambassador to Germany, will represent the state department at that conference; Rear Admiral H. N. Manney, U. S. N., retired, will represent the navy; Gen. Allen will be the army representative and John I. Waterbury of New York, who is now in Europe, will represent the department of commerce and labor.

The Pope recently received the American pilgrims conducted by Bishop Gabriels, of Ogdensburg, N. Y. Bishop Gabriels read an address, in which he quoted President Roosevelt as saying: "Tell the Pope that I send him my profound regards. I have tried to treat Protestants and Catholics alike, as my latest appointments show. I will try to perpetuate this policy. This Republic will stand for many a century. I expect that there will be Catholic Presidents as well as Protestant. I trust that they all will treat each other as I have tried to do."

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

A safe bet is the one you were going to make and didn't. —Philadelphia Record.

Another motto for the packers: Omnia possumus omnes (We all can everything). —Punch.

"Did you run across anybody in that automobile tour?" "We ran 'em down first and then ran across 'em." —Baltimore American.

"Senator, a political job is pretty hard to work, isn't it?" "Not very," replied Senator Badger, "but getting it is." —Milwaukee Sentinel.

Generous Uncle—"I will make you a mouthful allowance, but, understand me, I will pay no debts!" Nephew—"All right, uncle. Neither will I." —Tales.

"If you ever cross my path again, beware!" said the man with the red face. "Why, are you going to get an automobile?" asked the other. —Yonkers Statesman.

Tommy—"Pa, what is the Isthmus of Panama?" Pa—"The Isthmus of Panama, Tommy, is a narrow strip of land connecting Central America with the United States Treasury." —Life.

"But," protested Mrs. Newlied, "I don't see why you ask 25 cents a half peck for your beans. The other man only wanted 15 cents." "Yes'm," replied the huckster; "but these here beans o' mine is all hand-picked." —The Grocer.

"Here! you, sir," cried the irate old gentleman, "didn't I tell you never to enter this house again?" "No, sir," replied his daughter's persistent suitor. "You said not to 'cross your threshold,' so I climbed in the window." —Philadelphia Press.

"Young Jolliem always says the right thing, doesn't he? He never seems at a loss for the proper reply." "Well, I saw him nonplussed once." "How was that?" "Miss Keene asked him if he thought she looked as old as she was." —Cleveland Leader.

"Why do you always persist in saying you will not be a candidate for office?" "Because," answered Senator Sorghum, "it sounds properly modest, and does not in the least interfere with my chances in case a nomination wants to come my way." —Washington Star.

"One of the leading papers yesterday referred to my husband as an eminent statesman," remarked the visitor, proudly. "O, I wouldn't mind a little thing like that," replied Mrs. Goldrox, encouragingly. "We are all slandered more or less." —Milwaukee Sentinel.

"Young man, I heard you kissing my daughter in the hall last night." "Yes, sir. But it was from a purely scientific standpoint, sir." "What do you mean, sir?" "I was merely trying to collect a few microbes for the medical faculty at my college, sir." —Milwaukee Sentinel.

"I spent a pleasant half hour in a barber's chair yesterday." "How was that?" "Listening to the barber's story of how his brother went suddenly insane and slashed a customer. The barber explained between strokes that insanity ran in his family." —Columbus Press-Post.

Gotrox—"What are your lowest terms as a son-in-law?" Count—"One million." "All right; I'll sign a check tomorrow." "And how soon shall I marry your daughter?" "Oh, you won't marry her; I'm going to hold you for a rise, and sell you to somebody else." —Life.

"Do you really mean to tell me," demanded Mrs. Hauskeep, "that you are a San Francisco sufferer?" "Yes, lady," replied Hungry Hawkes. "Yer see, folks has been sending so much grub out dere, dey've had ter neglect us deservin' cases nearer home." —Philadelphia Press.

"There must be some fake about that new trick of Sandow-Sampson's," said Tete de Veau. "What trick is that?" L'Oignon asked. "Why, the strong man closes and locks, unassisted and within five minutes, a Saratoga trunk packed by a woman for a week's trip to the seashore." —Home Journal.

Her Father—"But, sir, you are not the sort of man I should like for a son-in-law." Young Man—"Oh, that's all right. You are not the sort of man I should like for a father-in-law, but I'm not going to make your daughter miserable for life by refusing to marry her on that account." —Chicago Daily News.

"I want a concrete vault built. Cement the floor well. I don't want the gophers there; I want it to myself. Cover over with a good flange, then there will be no weeds to bother any one." Such are the directions that Maurice Walsh, of Oakland, left in his will for the erection of a vault wherein his remains might be interred.

"I suppose," said the old-time friend, "that your folks no longer feel the anxiety about social matters that they once experienced." "Yes, they do," answered Mr. Cumrox; "mother and the girls are now as busy keepin' other women out of society as they once were gettin' in themselves." —Washington Star.

One of the State legislators entered an Albany restaurant last evening and ordered a porterhouse steak. When the portion arrived it did not quite appeal to him as being sufficiently cooked. He called the waiter. "Would you kindly take this back to the cook and tell him to broil it a little more?" "Sure," replied he of the white coat. This is how the polite request was handed back to the cook: "Say, Bill, that fat guy backed away from this piece of horse. He wants a little more fire on it. Get a move on. See?" —Albany Journal.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

Strictly Germ-Proof.

The anti-septic Baby and the Prophylactic Pup
Were playing in the garden when the Bunny gambled up;
They looked upon the Creature with a loathing undisguised
It wasn't Disinfected and it wasn't Sterilized.

They said it was a Microbe and a Hotbed of Disease.
They steamed it in a vapor of a thousand odd degrees;
They froze it in a freezer that was cold as Banished Hope,
And washed it in permanganate with carbolated soap.

In sulfureted hydrogen they steeped its wiggle ears;
They trimmed its frisky whiskers with a pair of hard-boiled shears;
They donned their rubber mittens and they took it by the hand
And lected it a member of the Fumigated Band.

There's not a Micrococcus in the garden where they play;
They swim in pure iodoform a dozen times a day;
And each imbibes his rations from a Hygienic Cup—
The Bunny and the Baby and the Prophylactic Pup.

President Roosevelt and a Third Term.

Many important journals seem to be gradually coming to the conclusion that the President intends to succeed in 1908. The New York Herald is one of the latest to do so. The New York Sun and Harper's Weekly profess to be shocked and astounded at the belief that the President has "swallowed his words," to use his phrase. Henry Watterson of the Courier-Journal also thinks Mr. Roosevelt will be a candidate in 1908. Watterson was the first—some thirty years ago—to print the news of General Grant's candidacy for a third term. Mr. Blaine confided the secret to Mr. Watterson, who guardedly printed it, and was ridiculed therefor as a scandal-monger. Yet it was not killed, although Blair did much to stifle it; and Roscoe Conkling brought the third-term Grant movement four years later to the National Convention in 1880.

Mr. Watterson believes that President Roosevelt would be a weak candidate. If that is the case, he and his Democratic friends ought to encourage the nomination. They seem to be endeavoring to kill it. The Orleans Picayune thinks that the attempt to nominate Roosevelt would raise "formidable opposition in his own party." It suggests that the position of Blaine, Morton, and other prominent Republicans of that era toward the Grant boom would be imitated now by Republican enemies of Roosevelt.

It is our belief that Mr. Roosevelt is quite sincere in his desire not to be a candidate in 1908. We think he would like to be elected to the Senate from New York State, and that he will fill that position after vacating the presidential chair, if New York State elects the necessary Republican legislature. He may, however, be forced to accept the presidential nomination against his will. However, if he is not forced to do so, the Republican party will have to lay aside such possibilities as Fairbanks or Taft. Unless unforeseen events happen Bryan will be the Democratic nominee. In that event, no conservative Republican could successfully run against him. A radical Republican like La Follette would be necessary. It is not improbable that the ticket in 1908 may be La Follette against Bryan.

Rapid Redistribution of Property.

In the number immediately following April 18th, the Argonaut remarked that the disaster would bring about a marked readjustment of property, both real and personal; that thousands of workmen would be needed to reconstruct the burned buildings; that the owners of the land would be forced to pay to these workmen millions of dollars at much higher rates of wage than existed before the fire; that many of these land owners would find themselves unable to raise the money to meet the changed conditions; that although they might apparently be rich, they would really be land poor; that the workingmen would take away from the rich men much of the latter's "unearned increment;" that the man who possessed more land than he could build on would be forced by high taxation, low income, or no income at all, to sell to another; that these transfers of land and money would bring about sweeping changes; that these changes would involve the boundaries of the business districts; that they would go further, that they would bring about a revolution in the social and financial standing of the entire community.

These remarks did not please many people in San Francisco, particularly the large land owners. They seemed to think that matters would go on exactly as before; that the insurance companies would pay their fire losses in a few days; that this money would be more than ample to re-erect their burned buildings at once; that laborers and skilled artisans would work for exactly the same wages as before; that their new buildings would be erected reasonably and rapidly; that their former tenants would patiently wait until the old landlords' buildings were ready; that the former retail and wholesale districts would be owned and occupied exactly as before; that, in short, the whole of the vast tangle of San Francisco's disrupted and destroyed business network would be put together exactly as it was before. It was because we differed, and because we pointed out that these iridescent dreams were impossible of realization, that the Argonaut incurred the ill will of many of those land owners. We submit, however, that in this case the Argonaut is not it. We shall have to "pass the buck" up to the earthquake.

There may be some who consider that the foregoing statements are exaggerated. Not at all. They are cold, sober truth. The truth then was as unpalatable as the truth now. In times of great popular excitement to state things as they are is called "pessimism;" to state things as you would like to have them is called "optimism." Naturally the press and the people took the optimistic view; the press because it was the popular one, and the people because they sincerely believed it.

Again we may be asked, is it possible that sensible people could have believed all these things?—Indeed they did, and some of them were so hysterical that they believed, or affected to believe, that their land was worth more after than before the fire. But if any man believed or deluded himself into partly believing this, he has had a rough awakening. One need not fear violence now if he says that property is not worth so much as it was. The week after the earthquake it was distinctly dangerous to make such a remark. But if any man really thinks that land is worth more, let him go and attempt to negotiate a loan on real estate at any San Francisco savings bank.

Suppose such a man is a land owner who has patiently waited for three months, hoping to get his insurance money. He has not yet received it. He may have policies in several companies, one of which is insolvent, another of which is paying 50 per cent, another 75 per cent, and another pretending to pay "dollar for dollar," and trying to skin out at 85 cents. The unfortunate policy holder is holding off, hoping that he will get something by waiting, but conscious of the fact that he is losing interest on his vacant land and that he is not in a position to lose any more. Therefore, he determines to borrow the money to build some temporary structures, hoping to erect permanent ones later on, when he gets his insurance money. He goes to the savings bank. He is surprised to find with what a lack of cordiality he is received when he states his business. A few months ago the man who wanted to borrow money was received with effusion at a savings bank, while the man who wanted to deposit money was thrown out. Now the man who wants to deposit is received with the glad hand, while the man who wants to borrow gets the marble heart. If he finally succeeds in winning the ear of the president, he is surprised to find how heavily land has fallen in value and how much taxes and interest have gone up. He is told that when some three hundred millions in improvements have been burned and some six millions yearly must be raised in taxes, that the entire burden of raising these millions is thrown on the remaining property in a city; that the taxation is naturally higher; that as the value of the security has been impaired, the bank must get more interest. Further he is informed that the fairy tales of unimpaired land values when buildings worth hundreds of millions have been destroyed, are believed only by the reporters of yellow newspapers, and are prepared by them for the consumption of rich old dowagers, parietic plutocrats, and weak-minded sons of millionaires. Other people, he is told, know that burning down a city does not add to its value, and that land which has lost all of its earning power falls heavily in price.

After he has studied the situation carefully the former rich man comes to the conclusion that there are two courses left for him to choose from. One is to lease his property to some one who is more enterprising than himself, and who is prepared to plunge into the hurly-burly of a new town and take the hard knocks that the pioneers used to take forty years ago. The other course is to sell. Which of these two alternatives is selected usually depends on the temper and the temperament of the land owner. If he be so pressed for money that he can not meet the high prices for building materials and high prices for labor, he will be apt to sell. Then the question of price becomes a gamble. Outside of certain well-defined districts in San Francisco—such as Market street and the financial district—the value of land is something which no man can tell. Therefore, the purchaser of a large tract of land in San Francisco may be making a fortune, and then again he may be losing one.

The alternative of leasing the land seems to be the course usually preferred. And here another difference may be noted; the man who has inherited his land seems less disposed to enter on a strenuous struggle for the up-building of the former conditions than the man who has himself created his own fortune. In short, the sons of the rich seem to prefer to lease. The sons of their own works seem to prefer to build.

Another phase of the new San Francisco which was foreshadowed in these columns the week after the fire is this: many men here had reached an age and a condition of financial ease where they were thinking vaguely of retiring from business. In this country no man likes to "retire." There is no place here for the idler. When a man here retires, the first question among his acquaintances is: "What's the matter with him? Bright's disease? or locomotor ataxia? or paresis?" In short, they at once infer that either his legs or his brains are down and out. It is not uncommonly true.

But the great disaster jolted many men over the line. A number of firms have passed into the hands of the sons of the house. Others are now controlled by the former juniors. And many of the employees have seceded from old houses and have founded new ones. The advertisements which crowd the columns of the dailies are filled with unfamiliar names. Oddly enough, their advertising columns are much more crowded with local business than they were a year ago. This was inevitable—partly to let the public know that new men were in business, and partly to let them know where the business houses are, new or old.

Another factor in the present curious situation must not be overlooked. It is the presence in San Francisco of many men from other cities, not only rich men who have made fortunes in mining, cattle raising, and other industries all over the Pacific Coast, but also investors from Eastern cities. These men are here looking for bargains. They are by no means "suckers," and they are not easily to be hoodwinked. They are shrewd, sharp investors and they are in some respects superior to local investors, for they come here with open minds. They know and care nothing about what San Francisco used to be. They have their own well defined ideas of what she is going to be. Those of us who have lived here, either all our lives or for a number of years, can not fail to be affected by local traditions. But to these strangers local traditions are rubbish, and in the grand shake-up and hurly-burly which has followed the events of last April it may be that the investors from elsewhere are less handicapped than the rest of us in looking into the future.

The American Flag Falls.

A dispatch from Sausalito to the Chronicle says that "a ninety-foot flag flying from the revenue cutter Alert fell from its halyards yesterday afternoon, was blown away and lost. Strange to say, no one on board the vessel noticed the flag was gone until the gestures of the people on shore attracted the attention of the crew." We trust that this statement is an error, but if the statement is not an error, then there is an error somewhere. The error may be in the naming of the Alert.

Bryan the Democratic Leader.

Mr. Bryan has declared that it is too early to call him a candidate for the presidency. None the less he has assumed the attitude of a leader by demanding the resignation of Roger Sullivan, a member of the Democratic National Committee from Illinois, on the ground that Sullivan was fraudulently elected and that he represents corporations rather than the masses. Sullivan has declined to vacate his position, but the party generally seems to agree with Bryan. There is a movement to request Mr. Bryan to demand the resignation of Thomas Taggart, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, who is the owner of a hotel where gambling is permitted. Bryan has as yet taken no action. The Bryan boom continues to grow. Michigan and North Dakota have endorsed his candidacy since our last mention of him. Josiah Quincy, chairman of the Democratic State Committee of New York, says that both State and local Democratic organizations in the Empire State are overwhelmingly in favor of Bryan for the presidency. It is anticipated that the coming Democratic State Convention in New York will endorse him. Norman E. Mack of Buffalo, a member of the State Committee, announces that he will introduce a resolution to that effect. The Democratic State Convention of Massachusetts is also expected to endorse Mr. Bryan.

Its Interest Is Intercontinental.

Immediately after the great fire, when we appealed to our readers to send us such old copies of the Argonaut as they could spare, we met with an immediate and most gratifying response. For the first few weeks thereafter we received copies for our files from California, then from the Pacific Coast, later from the Middle West, and then from the States of the Atlantic seaboard. After the lapse of five or six weeks we began to hear from our subscribers in Europe. Even now, months after the disaster, we are still receiving Argonauts from subscribers scattered all over the globe.

We did not realize how wide-spread was the circulation of the Argonaut until it was thus borne in upon us by the receipt of these numbers. It is easy to forward packages in the United States, either by mail or express. It is not so easy when they must be sent thousands of miles across continents and over seas. Sometimes these packages have come by steamship lines in care of the purser. Sometimes they have been sent by Alaskan dog-sled until they reached the terminal points of steamship lines, and thence been carried by private hand to San Francisco. These packages have come from such remote points as South Africa, and Ceylon; from treaty ports in China and Japan; from various cities in the Dominion of Canada; from Central America and Mexico; from Australia and New Zealand; from Alaska; and last but not nearest, from Tahiti.

In opening the mail the other day we were reminded of this when we found a letter bearing a surcharged French stamp. We did not know—or perhaps it did not occur to us—that we had subscribers in the South Pacific Colony belonging to the Republic of France, those "Sunlit isles of Eden lying in dark, purple spheres of sea." But we were reminded that we have subscribers even there by receiving a letter headed "Etude de Maitre Auguste Goupil, Defenseur, a Papeete, Tahiti." It ran thus:

Editor Argonaut:—I am extremely happy to be in a position to help you by the forwarding of over 400 Argonauts, stray numbers dating as far back as 1893. I had put them by for future re-delection, but I can not resist your appeal of May 26th, and will henceforth console myself by thinking of the shortness of life, which might have precluded my re-reading them as I had once hoped to do.

Permit me to subscribe myself

One of your oldest French subscribers,

A. GOUPIL.

It was interesting thus to learn that there are in Tahiti advocates who plead at the bar according to the rules of the French courts. This we assume from the title "Maitre," which M. Goupil bears; the fact that he is a "Defenseur;" further, that what we would call his office is called his "Etude." It is quite natural that all these rules and titles in a French colony should follow the procedure of the French courts. But none the less it strikes one oddly to reflect that at the other end of a line of Pacific Coast steamships, plying between San Francisco and the South seas, there is a group of islands where everything is French. And what strikes us most oddly is that a San Francisco newspaper should have readers on a sometime cannibal island in the Pacific Ocean, once ruled by Queen Pomare, one of which readers subscribes himself "one of your oldest French subscribers."

On the same day, but not in the same mail, there arrived a letter from Yokohama, the writer of which began: "Just came down from Vladivostok, and as soon as I reached the United Club here, I looked for the Argonaut and was tickled to find it, even if it was in rags, or in wood pulp rather. It's almost like drinking champagne out of a beer glass." This letter was signed R. E. Haas, and the writer sent a year's subscription. In the morning's mail there came from Larkspur, Marin County, a letter from another Argonaut subscriber, enclosing the price of a year's subscription for the Argonaut "to be mailed to R. E. Haas, Vladivostok, Siberia." The same afternoon we received a letter Herbert Haas dated Torreon, Coahuila, Mexico, enclosing a year's subscription for "R. E. Haas, Vladivostok, Siberia." We made haste to notify the friends concerned about the Siberian exile, that he already just renewed his subscription, and that therefore we would return their drafts.

Is it not odd that a man should make the little leap 1500 miles from Vladivostok to Yokohama, and a letter 4750 miles to San Francisco, ordering Argonaut to be sent 6250 miles to Vladivostok; two further orders renewing his subscription should on the same day, one of them from Torreon, Mexico, 2000 miles from San Francisco, 6750 miles from Yokohama, and 8250 miles from Vladivostok.

By the same mail that brought the Vladivostok letter from Yokohama, there came another from the same city, part of which reads as follows: "I am sending by this mail a file of Argonauts which I will be of some service to you. During our three years' residence in Japan, the Argonaut has come like a breeze from home, and it gives us as much pleasure now as in the old days when we were living in San Francisco."

In the same Oriental mail there came a letter from Chefoo, China, which says: "As an old subscriber gives me pleasure to enclose you herewith bill of lading for one case containing all the old copies of the Argonaut that I have saved up. There are many numbers missing, but I hope that these sent will be of service to you in filling up incomplete volumes. Some of the are nearly complete."

On the same day there reached us a letter from Honolulu "protesting against the reported intention to move the office of the Argonaut from the Pacific to New York." This curious rumor seems to be generally oozing over the globe. As we have before remarked, it is without foundation. Another letter in the mail dated Ottawa; it renewed a subscription, adding that he had received every number issued since the fire. By the way, is more than most of our California subscribers can say. Our Ottawa subscriber goes on: "After reading the Argonauts, I send them promptly to a friend in South Africa, who greets them like an old friend. There is another long leap—from San Francisco to Ottawa, from Ottawa to South Africa."

In the packet which brought the letter from Tepic, Mexico, there came another, dated San Salvador, Central America; in this the writer, after very generously offering to forward his old Argonauts, apologizes for a limited number, saying: "After reading the Argonauts I have been in the habit of forwarding the numbers to my relatives in England, who express themselves as delighted with their perusal." This is signed A. A. Fielding. It is another instance of the Argonaut's intercontinental wandering—from San Francisco to Central America, from Central America to England. By the way, you know that the inhabitants of Central America do not consider it a continent by itself? In Spanish America the continent is never "North and South America," but always "Las tres Americas"—the three Americas, North, Central, and South.

By the mail which came from Tahiti we received a letter dated Condobolin, New South Wales, in which the writer renews his subscription and offers to send old numbers of the Argonaut. He, too, sends his numbers to distant points.

In short, the wave of returning Argonauts, some of which we sent out many years ago, seems to be returning now with greater force than the first waves which came from near at hand. People in the immediate vicinity of San Francisco had too much to think of after the great disaster of last April, to bother themselves with packing up old newspapers. The favorite place for such odds and ends is in the attic, and some people after the disaster were afraid to go into the attic and great many had no attic at all. Our more distant readers did not suffer from the disaster, but their sympathy is not lessened by their distance.

Is it not, after all, a curious thing that an unpublishing weekly newspaper, published in a sparsely on the Western rim of the great North American continent, necessarily devoted largely to local matters, and in some way appeal to people so widely scattered over the globe? Is it not strange that these people, of different blood, speaking different languages, following different customs, bearing different titles, reading different newspapers, bred to different beliefs, should yet, oddly enough, find some common meeting ground of interest in this little weekly newspaper?

New York State Politics.

The Evening Post has a correspondent traveling throughout the State of New York to investigate the political situation. Hostile as that journal is to the candidacy of William R. Hearst, it has been forced to acknowledge the fact that his boom is growing. It looks as if Mr. Hearst would become the nominee of the Democratic State Convention which meets at Buffalo September 25th. The Hearst contingent succeeded in fixing the place and date for that convention as they desired them. Hearst is said to be stronger in Albany County than anywhere else in New York State, and the date is earlier than that of the Republican State Convention, which his manager desired to precede. The Hearstocrats feel sanguine that they can elect the Governor of New York this year unless the Democratic vote should be divided. There has been talk of District Attorney McKim as the Democratic candidate for Governor, but Hearst captures the convention, Jerome will have to wait for his ambition. If Hearst is nominated it is believed that the Republicans will nominate Charles E. Hughes, who is looked upon as a very strong candidate.

Earthquake, Fire and Frisco.

In addition to the earthquake and fire, a new misfortune has come over our stricken city. It is that the world has taken to the use of the term "Frisco" as a shorthand for San Francisco. Here it has long been known that the use of this term was confined to drummers, barn-stormers, circus people, and other impossible classes. But now we learn that the term is commonly used throughout the United States. Carefully edited newspapers in the East invariably speak of us as "Frisco." We have therefore been initiated an attempt to check the use of this obnoxious term. It has won the support of the most powerful organizations as the Women's Christian Temperance Union and various other ladies' clubs. To escape this powerful alliance, we fear that "Frisco" is a bad lick. It is short, easily written, and saves time. But again, it is idiotic and ugly, which naturally makes it popular. We fear we are doomed to bear forever the name "Frisco." Still, we can take some comfort in the fact that there are others. There are three cities in South America which are never called by their correct names in North America. These three cities are in Brazil. One is the city of Belem in the state of Para: Belem is commonly called "Para." Another is the city of Recife in the state of Pernambuco: Recife is invariably called "Pernambuco"; and the third is the city of San Salvador da Bahia: San Salvador is invariably called "Bahia." Vessels arriving in the Brazils always call these cities, not by their own names but by the names of the states in which they are situated. This has been going on for many years. Long as the practice has endured, it grows none the less distasteful to their citizens, who sometimes receive the names with tears, and sometimes with curses. At such times names stick. How would we like to have the whole of San Francisco "California?" We are proud of our city, San Francisco, and we are proud of our name. But we would not like to have the city and the name hopelessly mixed up in the mind of the world as the San Francisco called by the State name rather than by her own.

However, it is useless to give names to cities, railways, or the like. People always dub them as they please. The railway from San Francisco to Santa Cruz was called the late Senator Fair was officially known as the "North Pacific Coast"; it was invariably called the "Fair gauge." The road running north through Marin county, built by Milton S. Latham, was officially known as the "North Pacific Coast" and it is invariably designated by the public the "Sausalito Narrow Gauge." The road running from Tiburon up through Sonoma county was officially known as the "San Francisco and North Pacific"; it has been known for thirty years as the "Donahue Road." The Donahues who built it and the son who succeeded them have all been in their graves for years, and the road has passed into the control of other men, but it is still called the "Donahue Road." The tall building at Third and Market streets, which went so successfully through earthquake and fire, is officially known as the "Claus Spreckels Building," but it has never been called anything but "the Call Building." The architectural freak which stands in New York at the corner of Twenty-third Street, Fifth Avenue, and Broadway, is officially known as the "Fuller Building." Not one New Yorker in a hundred thousand knows that name, and it is invariably called the "Flatiron Building." When Joseph Pulitzer erected the lofty skyscraper with its gilded dome in which to house his newspaper, the World, it was officially denominated the "Pulitzer Building," but was instantaneously baptized by the public the "World Building." Mr. Pulitzer was so nettled that he had agreements made with every tenant to the effect that all business cards, letter-heads, note-heads, etc., should bear the words, "the Pulitzer Building" in giving their address. This was done. Thousands, nay millions, of printed pieces of paper have fluttered over the world bearing in every direction the information that these business men were housed in the "Pulitzer Building." But there invariably come back letters addressed "the World Building."

So we may as well be resigned. "Frisco" is not pretty, but it apparently is our name.

How do you like it?

Direct Primary Voting.

Now that the primary elections are over many sincere and earnest men, Republicans and Democrats alike, are asking themselves what they individually had to do with the result of that ballot. So impossible is it for the individual voter to express his opinion concerning an individual candidate that many good and earnest citizens stay away from the primaries. This is often condemned as an evidence of "incivism," and as showing that such citizens are unworthy of the ballot. We do not think so. When a citizen realizes that it is impossible for him to have anything to say in the choosing of delegates to a nominating convention, why should he take the trouble to go through the form of choosing?

In the election just concluded there was no conclusive way in which a voter could indicate a preference for Pardee, Gillett, Hayes, Porter or Gage. Yet many of us had our preferences, and have them still. We are still as distant from any method of indicating them. We could not through the primaries have anything distinct to say about the choice of delegates. Now that the delegates are selected we can not have anything to say about the choice of a nominee by the convention. After the convention shall have chosen, all that we can do is to poll our votes for the candidate of the convention. He may be the choice of the people and he may be the choice of the machine. Whichever it is, we must vote for him or not vote at all.

Why can not California have a direct primary law? Such a law has now been in force in Minnesota for three or four years. Oregon adopted such a law two years ago, and at her recent primary election indicated her choice for Senator. Illinois has also put a direct primary election law into effect. There are some Oregon Republicans who claim that their primaries chose the weakest possible candidate for the governorship, and thus lost that office for the Republican party. It makes no difference: If the Republican party chose a nominee for Governor, he represented the party; if the Democrats elected their nominee for governor, he represents the people of the State. In short, what we contend for is that the people shall have an opportunity to express through the polls, at primary, state, and national elections who is their choice and what is their desire.

If we had a direct primary law in California it would be possible for every voter to express with his ballot his preference for every candidate on the ticket. He would have the privilege of choosing from the entire State all of his candidates, from Governor down to State Printer. As it is now, he has no choice at all; he is forced to choose between several sets of delegates, often named by back-room caucuses, generally by bar-room politicians. However poor may be the judgment of the people, it certainly must be better than the judgment of bar-room caucuses.

Is it too much to hope that the California legislature will give us a direct primary law? Another Pacific State, Oregon, has already tried it; the experiment is being favorably received in the Middle Western states; why should not California try it too?

The Gubernatorial Fight.

Precinct primaries and county conventions have not made it possible for any of the candidates to read their title clear to the nomination for Governor of California. With the State Republican Convention little more than a week away, there is nothing better than prediction based on probability to be discerned. The determining factor in the choice will be not superior qualifications, nor personal popularity in the candidate, but the furthering of ambitions only loosely knotted to the governorship. A United States senatorship, seats on the bench of the Supreme Court, and several lesser judicial positions will furnish dominating motives and trading combinations to control the final judgment.

In San Francisco, and even in Alameda County, the vote at the primaries was very light. This city had only 22,026 voters registered, and not one-half of these came out, only 10,933 ballots being cast. The forces of A. Ruef were successful in carrying all except the Thirty-Sixth District, which carries eight votes to the Republican convention. In whose favor the San Francisco delegation will mass its strength is as yet a problem, though it is asserted that J. O. Hayes of San Jose will be given a complimentary vote.

The Chronicle says:

Pardee can win without San Francisco. But with Gillett it is different. How can he afford to affront all the San Francisco delegates by practically declaring that he has no use for them. At the present outlook Gillett could not secure the nomination without aid from San Francisco.

In this connection, E. H. Hamilton, the special political writer of the Examiner, makes a declaration:

Abe Ruef is a candidate for the United States Senatorship from California to succeed George C. Perkins. A friendly Governor can contribute at least twenty-five votes in the legislature to a candidate for the United States Senate, if he so desires. It is not within the range of sound political reasoning that Ruef will ever consent to the nomination for Governor of a man who is not friendly to his political ambitions.

Another alleged senatorial sidelight is furnished by the same writer:

Perkins favors a northern man for Governor, and Gillett is his choice. The senior United States Senator is opposed to the selection of any man for Governor whose interests might favor the selection of a United States Senator—other than Perkins—from this section.

The earliest definite assertion of strength in the convention came from the Pardee camp, appearing in the Los Angeles Express:

Already a close estimate can be made upon the chances of all candidates for the Republican nominations. The following table shows Governor George C. Pardee far in the lead and needing only twenty-six votes to insure his nomination. Of a total of 825 delegates, 387 are pledged to his support.

The table appended gives Gillett 59 votes, Porter 36, Hayes 43, and puts down 99 as doubtful. In making up the total, 129 not assigned are said to be controlled by A. Ruef and 64 by Walter Parker.

As only 28 votes out of the Los Angeles delegation of 129 are claimed by the Pardee partisans there, it is evident that there are other interests in power. The Los Angeles Daily News says:

The Governor is conceded 300 votes on the first ballot, but, falling a majority, he can not hope to land, for among his 300 are many votes that will not go to him again, after paying political promises and pledges. Easily one-third of the Governor's support will go to Gillett on the second ballot, which will be sufficient to make the Humboldt county man the choice of the convention.

Col. George Stone, chairman of the Republican State Central Committee, is quoted as saying:

The people say "Pardee has made a good governor, but four years is enough for any man." Now, that is a silly sort of way to look at things. It seems to me, but you can't help it. The feeling is there just the same, and so Gillett will beat Pardee in the convention.

The San Francisco political correspondent of the Oakland Tribune offers a more specific assertion:

The "Organization" intends to nominate J. N. Gillett of Humboldt, and I believe they have the votes to turn the trick. The day the Governor refused to renominate Colonel John C. Kirkpatrick as harbor commissioner, he lost the support of William F. Herrin and the "Organization," and no matter what else he might do for the Southern Pacific he had committed the unpardonable sin.

Thomas B. Sullivan says in The Call:

Governor Pardee will have a solid delegation from Alameda County. He will receive it only on conditions that exact much, and will hold it only as long as the practical politicians see fit to permit him. The real power behind the State delegation and the man who will manipulate it as he pleases, except in one singular exception is Supreme Justice Henshaw.

The San Francisco correspondent of the Sacramento Union endeavors to show Gillett's strength by a process of elimination, and says:

Of course much will depend on the decision of the city and district bosses who will control the San Francisco and Los Angeles delegations, and on the direction in which Mr. Herrin's influence is exerted; but it is safe to say already that these men will also drift toward the most popular candidate—the man whom the people will vote for—and who, other things being equal, will prove strongest in pulling the remainder of the ticket through. Governor Pardee can not mobilize these influences because they fear he can not be re-elected; nor is it probable that Porter can get them, since he is not favored by the working classes who vote the Republican ticket.

Concerning Warren R. Porter's prospects, the following is taken from one of the daily articles by E. H. Hamilton in the Examiner:

Warren Porter's strength consists entirely of complimentary votes, because his followers, while enthusiastic enough, have felt all along that they had no chance to win out for their candidate. Porter was primarily in the fight to defeat Pardee, and he seems to have played quite a part in the Governor's undoing.

Seldom is a word said of the merits of the candidates. Here is one, however, from Governor Pardee's home city, which has not been echoed loudly. It appeared in the Oakland Blade:

A convention desirous of the election of its nominees should decline to re-nominate an incumbent who received but 6 per cent of his party's plurality, and whose administration of his office affairs has been such as to place his party on the defensive. Large expenditures call for great results, and the taxed wisely get curious!

On the other side is this fling at the governor's foremost adversary, from the editorial columns of the Oakland Enquirer:

The Sacramento Star published an interview with Congressman J. N. Gillett, who is a candidate for governor, in which Mr. Gillett is represented as declining to talk on State issues, and when asked about them replied that he hadn't had time to give these matters much thought. If Mr. Gillett is correctly reported by the Star, this is a somewhat amazing admission for a man who aspires to the position of chief executive of the great State of California. There are many important and vital State issues upon which a man who is anxious for that office ought to have definite knowledge and opinions.

With no positive announcements of change in the Democratic situation it is possible that the dark horse has been disclosed. State Senator Marshall Diggs, of Sacramento, has been brought forward by his friends, but the party leader in the capital city does not endorse the selection. Ex-Mayor Phelan and ex-Congressman Geary are still in line for nomination honors.

Private and Public Water Supplies

At a meeting of one of the improvement associations of San Francisco last week, F. E. Edwards made a report on the private water supplies existing in the Mission district which could be used as an auxiliary to the Spring Valley system in the event of that company's water mains being broken or in case a scarcity of water should supervene. Mr. Edwards gave the location of about twenty wells, cisterns, and tanks, together with the capacity of each, and much other valuable information. The improvement association voted that these facts should be laid before the Fire Department.

Very good. So it ought to be. But what is the matter with the Fire Department getting this information for itself? And why has the Board of Fire Underwriters never made any attempt to find out what facilities there are for extinguishing fire? These high-salaried gentlemen are supposed to look out for the interests of their companies. How well they have done so is shown by the fact that they were utterly ignorant of the existence of nearly sixty cisterns in the city of San Francisco, which if properly attended to would have saved the city. We do not expect much from the Fire Commissioners, because they are municipal officials. But the insurance men are not public officers, but are highly paid by their companies to look out for just such matters as these. In this they have failed—utterly, ignominiously failed; and now they are trying to saddle the result of their neglect on the unfortunate policy holders, who have nothing whatever to do with the matter of fire protection. After the crooked companies shall have finished swindling the policy holders out of their just dues, they still will have enormous losses to provide for. All of these are due to the inexcusable neglect of the Board of Fire Underwriters. The insurance companies will find it an expensive luxury to have retained these fat and well-fed gentlemen in positions for which they are unfitted. They badly need some new men to see that there is adequate fire protection for their companies' fire risks; men who, if they are not watchful for the policy holders' sake, will at least look out for the interests of the insurance companies' stock holders.

The Iowa Idea.

The unrest in Republican circles in Iowa over the tariff has not yet disappeared. When the delegates were elected for the recent convention it appeared that Governor Cummins had a small majority, but the "stand-pat" State Committee cooked up a scheme for counting out Cummins's delegates. This roused such a horrible roar in Iowa that the success of the Republican ticket was imperiled. The Republican members of the Congressional delegation, seeing their seats in danger, threatened the State Committee with repudiation by the entire party. Thereupon the stand-patters' scheme was abandoned. The convention then was apparently harmonious, although there was some vigorous hissing of Secretary Shaw.

The platform is a perfect marvel of a straddle. It commits the party "uncompromisingly to the American system of protection;" this to please the stand-patters. Further along it suggests that it would be well to adjust "the inequalities in the tariff schedules which inevitably arise from changing industrial and commercial conditions"; this to gratify the tariff reformers. Out of the quarrel both stand-patters and reformers emerge mutually dissatisfied. While an open bolt of the ticket is not feared, there will be little enthusiasm shown during the campaign.

The Assessor and the Supervisors.

The San Francisco Board of Supervisors, sitting as a Board of Equalization, last week attacked Assessor Dodge's assessment roll because he did not include in his assessment the buildings wiped off the face of the earth by fire on April 18th, 19th and 20th. Assistant City Attorney W. T. Baggett informed the board that "The Assessor should, on the first Monday in March, assess all the property in San Francisco. It was not in his power to strike from the assessment roll one hundred and fifty million dollars' worth of property. The Assessor and his bondsmen become liable for every dollar so left off the roll." Supervisor Wilson and Attorney Baggett were particularly vigorous in attacking the Assessor for this action. Assessor Dodge came back at them with equal vigor. The law, he said, demands that solvent credits, book accounts, bank balances, etc., shall be put down as they stood on the first Monday in March. But of property in general, both real and personal, it says that the Assessor shall put it down as he finds it between the first Monday in March and the first Monday in July. "Therefore," said Assessor Dodge, "the assessment is made on the first Monday of July, so far as the Assessor is concerned, when I turn over the books to this honorable Board. The property is listed as owned on the first Monday in March and as valued when I see it, perhaps in June."

The opponents of the Assessor then insinuated that there were many rich merchants whose stock was not assessed by the Assessor because it had been burned in April, but that they had since received the insurance money for the same and should have been assessed. To this the Assessor retorted: "You can not make one law for the rich and another for the poor. If you assess the rich man's stock, which is burned, you will have to assess the poor man's home, which is also burned. In all the years of my memory the Supervisors have never refused to wipe out the assessment of any man whose property was destroyed by fire after March 1st. What would you Supervisors have done with 70,000 applications for assessment reduction from the small property owners whose goods, homes and stores had gone up in the fire? How in two weeks' time could you gentlemen have examined 70,000 property owners?"

We do not know the law of this case, but we do know that Assessor Dodge has got hold of the hard common sense of it. Few of us like to pay taxes under ordinary circumstances, and none of us like to pay taxes on property which has been totally destroyed. As for saying we ought to pay taxes on the destroyed property, we are going to get the insurance money on it, though, but some of us have not got the insurance. We have paid taxes on the Argonaut property which was destroyed, but we have not received the insurance money.

At the end of this discussion with the Supervisor Board, Assessor Dodge very neatly left the matter "up to the Board." He said: "Gentlemen, you have heard the opinion of Assistant City Attorney Baggett; if you think it is law, and you think it is equitable, give me an order to assess the property burned on the 18th, 19th and 20th of April. I then shall have no choice but to do so, and the responsibility will lie where it ought to, with you."

Thereupon Assessor Dodge sat down, and the matter became plunged in silent thought. After having for some time, Supervisor Wilson made a motion to accept Dodge's assessment roll as he presented it, and it was passed unanimously.

Condition of San Francisco's Titles

That practically all of the public records to land in San Francisco were destroyed by the great fire of April is a fact of common knowledge. That thousands of suits will be brought to establish titles to these lands is also well known. But in what condition the contemporaneous records are is not so well known. A petition from an improvement association to the Board of Supervisors to provide funds to the County Recorder to rent a fire-proof building in which to keep the records. The petition states that the records at Geary and Gough Streets, where they are daily accumulating, is of wood, is inflammable, and that there would be great danger to new records in case of fire.

To this prayer no one can object. A fire-proof building for the records now would be valuable. A fire-proof building for the old records would have been invaluable. But the petition goes on to urge that "Recorder prohibit his deputies and the public from smoking in the building." This seems to us unnecessarily harsh. Why should a lot of hard working deputies be forbidden to smoke in a building containing records, even if the building is highly inflammable? As for the public, that is clear. They have no business to come into a municipal building smoking. But for the deputies we think such a rule is unnecessarily stringent. Suppose the building were to burn. It would not make so very much difference. When one considers that the old Hall of Records contained the accumulations of over fifty years, and that the present building has the records of only a few years, it will be readily seen that the risk is very much less. Let the boys smoke.

The Other Fellow's Park.

At various times we have had occasion to remark on the propensity among all of us sufferers to pass the buck along to The Other Fellow. For example, when we suggested that we ought to have broad boulevard city squares, and wider streets, everybody agreed that these things were highly desirable. But when it came to condemning property for the aforesaid wider streets, it was an equally unanimous desire that it should be on The Other Fellow's Street. Corresponding indignation began to be expressed over the high prices for rent, for labor, for lumber, and for structural materials generally, it was unanimously agreed that this was gouging, greed, and graft. But when it came to driving down the high prices, it invariably resulted in the suggestion that the scaling down begin on The Other fellow's gouge. When the employers indignantly demanded that the labor unions cease in their attempt to put high wages higher, the labor unions retorted by demanding that the landlords stop putting their rents as high as to drive the workingmen out of their homes into the street. When the landlords were appealed to and requested not to gouge their tenants by such preposterous prices for their flimsy, wooden buildings, and they peremptorily demanded that the lumber companies lower their rates. In short, it was always up to The Other Fellow.

The latest development in this line now concerns parks. In various parts of the city there are a number of temporary camps which are in an unsanitary condition, and the Relief Corporation suggested moving them to certain parks where there will be more room, and where wooden structures can be erected for their housing. One of the places suggested for such a permanent camp was Mission Park. The dwellers at the Mission have arisen in an indignant protest against putting refugees in their park. They held a mass meeting at Dolores and Twentieth Streets the other night, at which were present many of the property owners adjoining the park. In the speeches, as reported in the daily press, were these facts: "While the Mission residents have been noteworthy for charity, they still think that an arrangement should be made for these houseless people without encroaching on Mission Park. Many years in property facing the park now think that their movements would be misplaced were these refugee cottages to confront them. It should not be difficult to find a plot of ground sufficient to be used for such cottages anywhere else in San Francisco."

Exactly so. In short, the residents around Mission Park do not want to have the refugee cottages erected in their park, but they have no objection whatever to putting them on Some Other Fellow's Park.

Sectarian Education in Great Britain.

On July 31st the Birrell Education Bill passed the House of Commons by a majority of 192. It now goes to the House of Lords. No bill for many years has been so bitterly contested. Against it is arrayed the House of Lords, all of the Anglican Bishops, the heads of Anglican clergy whom they control, 14,000 priests, and nearly 30,000 teachers. The late government and the Conservative party generally also bitterly oppose the bill. In addition to the Anglican clergy Roman Catholics are opposed to it, while the Nonconformist leaders also object to it because it "concedes much to the other side." The bill declares that on January 1st, 1908, no denominational schools shall receive money from the public taxes; that all teachers in public schools shall be appointed by the local authorities regardless of their religion. These sweeping reforms are tempered by the following "concessions": Any school now in existence may be leased to that state, which will use it between 9 A. M. and 4 P. M. from Monday to Friday; at all other times it may be used for denominational teaching. Also a private school may remain denominational, provided the vote of four-fifths of the children vote in favor of it; where denominational teaching is given it must be paid for by the church giving it. This permits 100 per cent of the Jewish schools, 75 per cent of the Roman Catholic schools, 50 per cent of the Wesleyan schools, and 5 per cent of the Church of England schools to continue their denominational teaching. The bill is so drafted that its tendency toward undenominational teaching, and the concessions it makes to the various denominations are so sweeping, that it surprises Americans to find how bitter is the opposition which it has excited.

Marshall Field dodged taxes of a value to him of $100,000 a year. According to the census of 1900 the average earnings of skilled workingmen is about $400 a year. It thus required the earnings of 1,000 men each to pay the deficit to the community that Marshall Field honestly owed. In other words, says the Pittsburgh Courier, he took from the commonwealth of the city of Chicago every year, through the dishonesty of tax-dodging, the wages of 1,000 skilled workingmen.

When a passenger boards a car in Copenhagen he exchanges greetings with the conductor; a gentleman, on leaving the car, usually lifts his hat in acknowledgment to the conductor. When a fare is paid, the conductor drops it into his cash box, thanks the passenger, and gives him a little paper receipt. He offers change on a preliminary "Be so good," and the passenger replies with thanks.

POLITICO-PERSONAL.

Senator Tillman is stumping South Carolina, and his speeches are unusually lurid even for him. At Anderson last week he is reported as declaring that he did not know what the outcome of the negro question would be, but he did know that "there are not enough Yankees from Cape Cod to hell to keep us down."

Mr. Addicks of Delaware is one of those who are enthusiastic over the dollar idea in contributions to the Republican fund. The movement is particularly a hit with the rich men who have heretofore been made to pay handsomely for their party prominence. They are first in line, and all speak of it as a "grand idea."

In New York, where Charles A. Towne now makes his home, it is reported that Mr. Towne is willing to be Mr. Bryan's running mate on the Democratic ticket, provided that in the event of success he may become a member of the cabinet as well as vice-president. The New York World remarks: "Should Mr. Towne receive Roger Sullivan, the Democratic National Committeeman in Illinois, whom William J. Bryan recently condemned to excommunication, is out without a retort courteous though positive, and will hold his position as long as may be. Democratic primaries throughout the State are said to have elected delegates favorable to Sullivan.

Senator Dick has announced in Ohio that President Roosevelt has promised the assistance of members of the cabinet during the fall campaigns in that state. But Senator Penrose of Pennsylvania is apparently not so lucky. His indiscreet proclamation that Mr. Roosevelt would make four speeches in the Pennsylvania campaign was promptly followed by an official denial.

Daniel J. McGillicuddy, of Lewiston, Maine, who is the Democratic and Labor-Union candidate opposing Congressman Charles E. Littlefield, is said to be able and well known. President Gompers, of the American Federation of Labor, has made one speech in the district against Littlefield, and has sent General Organizer Stuart Reed to hold a series of meetings there in an effort to bring out a solid labor vote.

Richard F. Pettigrew of South Dakota, first and only delegate to Congress from the Territory of Dakota and known as "Frank Pettigrew" to every settler in his State before 1883, wishes to be the first Socialist to sit in the United States Senate as such. He has served two terms already. Being an eclectic in politics he was first elected as a Republican, afterward re-elected as a Demopopulist, and in three years will hoist the Socialist banner.

Prosecuting Attorney Jerome of New York has been through the South on a personally conducted tour, with numerous displays of attitude and oratory, and the Washington Post, in commenting on the facts, calls him a busy reformer with a tireless tongue and concludes its notes with this sentence: "The great State of New York and its great city have contributed so much to the corruption of public and private morals, that such a lecture as Mr. Jerome delivered to the Alabamans is grossly and most provokingly preposterous."

Francis J. Heney keeps up his vigorous prosecution of the land fraud cases in Oregon for the Government and they continue to yield important results. Willard N. Jones, a member of the Legislature in 1903, and a wealthy contractor and timber dealer, has been sentenced by Judge Hunt in the United States circuit court at Portland to one year's imprisonment in the federal penitentiary and to pay a fine of $2000. Upon the same suit Thaddeus Stevens Potter, a well-known Portland lawyer, was sentenced to serve six months in the county jail and to pay a fine of $500.

While the other candidates for the Republican nomination for Governor of New Hampshire have been conducting still hunts, Winston Churchill has been waking up the State, denouncing the ring and the railroad, calling for the abolition of the free pass, and an investigation of the tax system and its revision, and a number of other things political that men of the party have hardly dared to whisper. It is charged that the machine and the Boston and Maine railroad forces have settled on Charles H. Greenleaf to oppose Churchill for the nomination.

Speaker Cannon has conferred with the Republican leaders of Indiana and is cheered with the prospect that the vote of the State delegation will be given to him—if Fairbanks can not win. Eastern papers quote with seeming satisfaction a paragraph from the Sacramento (Cal.) Union, which says that Mr. Cannon's position "is that of a man of tradition and of ideas fixed in an old-fashioned mold, not that of an up-to-date man like Roosevelt, or Bryan, or Taft, or Folk. The nomination of Mr. Cannon would pitch the coming campaign from the Republican standpoint upon past issues and past ideas."

Hon. John W. Foster, formerly United States minister to China, is held in great esteem there and has been appointed one of China's two representatives at The Hague conference to meet in 1907. In his opening address as president of the last Mohonk Conference, Mr. Foster spoke strongly against standing armies and formidable navies. Referring to the fact that we are spending for the current fiscal year $375,659,791 for military purposes, or sixty-four per cent. of the total expenses of the government, Mr. Foster declared that "legislators who have been deaf to the appeals of the friends of peace and arbitration may meet a reckoning at the ballot-box."

Editorial paragraphers continue to discuss the moral and binding effect of President Roosevelt's early declaration against another term, and the New Orleans Picayune says: "Mr. Roosevelt was, no doubt, quite sincere when he declared that he would not accept a nomination for a third term, but no very skilful casuistry is required to support the contention that he is under no moral obligation not to change his mind in regard to that matter. He uttered the declaration on the night of his election, and no one had thought of exacting a pledge from him that he would not again be a candidate for the Presidency either before or after his nomination to that office. He has never yet made a pledge, he has only expressed an intention, not to accept a nomination to succeed himself." The Democratic nomination he will be the eighteenth resident of New York who has received votes for vice president in the electoral college, not including the nine distinguished citizens of New York who were voted for prior to the introduction of the present electoral system in 1802. The most recent of this long line is Theodore Roosevelt; next before him Mr. Whitelaw Reid; then Levi P. Morton, Chester A. Arthur, William A. Wheeler and Millard Fillmore. Considering the distinction, the ability and the character of these men whom Mr. Towne would seek to make his predecessors, is not his disparagement of this high office and his condescension toward it a little presumptuous?"

THE NATIONAL INSURANCE COMPANY.

The following correspondence is self-explanatory:

Oakland, August 1, 1906.

Mr. Jerome A. Hart,
Editor "Argonaut,"
Dear Sir:—

We are the General Agents of the National Insurance Company of Hartford, Conn. In your last issue, you made reference to the Company and its methods in a manner not warranted by the facts, thereby doing the Company and its officers a grave injustice. Such articles are not in accord with the well known reputation of your paper, and we know that if we can only get an opportunity to lay the facts before you, you will correct the injury that the publication of such an article has done the Company.

Yours very truly,
McNEAR & WAYMAN.

McNair & Wayman,
406 13th St.,
Oakland, Calif.

Dear Sirs:—

Your favor of August 1st is duly to hand. I have no desire to do an injustice to your Company. If, as you say, the Argonaut's statements have been "not warranted by the facts," I shall be glad to publish your statement of the facts, if it is within such limitations of space, etc., as our columns will permit.

Very truly yours,
JEROME A. HART,
Editor Argonaut.

Mr. Jerome A. Hart,
Editor the "Argonaut,"
My Dear Sir:—

Your communication of August the 2nd, in reply to ours of the 1st, relative to article appearing in the "Argonaut" as of July 28th received, and we desire to thank you for your courtesy in replying to ours and shall, as soon as time permits, take the liberty of running down to see you and talking with you in person relative to the matter.

All we can say at this time is that you have rubbed it into the old NATIONAL pretty hard and there was no occasion for it, and we desire to advise you, forcibly, that the NATIONAL OF HARTFORD did not deny liability on the McKee claim, nor did any adjuster in the employ of the NATIONAL OF HARTFORD, nor did the firm of McNear & Wayman as General Agents. If suit has been brought, this office has not been advised by the court of such action, and we know nothing other than what appeared in the "Argonaut" and one of the daily papers last week. Both members of this firm are Californians, born and brought up in San Francisco, and we were with the dear old town heart and soul, and we believe that when the atmosphere has been cleared up a few months from now, and most of the losses have been settled, and the true condition of affairs relative to insurance corporations is known, you will gladly congratulate the NATIONAL OF HARTFORD on their attitude in the settlement of all claims with the insured in San Francisco.

We will state that the unfortunate part of it is that an article such as appeared in the Argonaut is either copied or the Argonaut is purchased in large numbers by some of our dear friends and sent out to the various agencies of the NATIONAL, and coming from the columns of the good old Argonaut it looks pretty good, so we believe, in justice to the National, as well as other corporations, that you should always attempt to investigate conditions pretty thoroughly before publishing these statements.

Yours very truly,
McNEAR & WAYMAN,
General Agents.

A LETTER'S EXPERIENCE.

Told By Itself.

I have existed but a few hours. I was born this morning on the red velvet lid of an ebony writing-desk. A woman wrote me into existence, and as I grew under a fine gold pen, I first perceived the tips of slender white fingers whose regular sway back and forth gave me a delicious sensation. Then I distinguished the face bent above me, a pretty face, pale and sad, with great, gray eyes under which were black circles, rosy, wet eyelids, but white lips. Her hair fell in disorder over her forehead, curling behind her ears down to her shoulders. My first lines, in a slanting English handwriting, were to this effect:

Had passed a miserable night, impossible to sleep, strange dream, and awoke trembling, pity and mercy asked in the same line. Then the ball of the night before was spoken of, she had been very unhappy and had left full of presentiment although he was there. "Why was this?"

She leaned on the desk, her head on her hand, and fell into a reverie. Her sleeve fell back, and I felt the perfume of her warm, soft arm penetrate me. She remained thus some time, her beautiful, large eyes full of sad thought. Suddenly two tears gathered, and I began to understand the sense of the words, "Why was this?" The tears trembled on her eyelids, then ran down her cheek. The poor little woman sighed, and returned to me.

He had been very neglectful at the ball, and she had caught his eye only once or twice. . . . The pen began to write rapidly, the words were scratched off, sentences followed each other without punctuation, a passionate love filled my pages in a retrospective glance. "The transport of the first days," doubts, timidity, the avowal, first kisses! Then the day when jealousy was awakened so terrible, yet so charming, terror, agony, if ten minutes late, the promise of eternal fidelity, renewed vows—all this as the eyes rained tears and the pen went on impetuously, tightly held in the thin fingers.

My four pages were full, when someone entered the room. I disappeared quickly inside the desk. I fell among a pile of letters, faded flowers, and debris of all sorts. In one corner lay a white cravat, twisted around a little dried-up bouquet. It was of corded muslin, and made me suddenly think of a certain date, of which I speak later.

When I was taken out of hiding, the young woman was dressed ready to go out, with a thick veil covering her red-lidded eyes; she added two words, "Come tonight," and then I waited impatiently for a name that I expected to see, when I felt two fresh warm lips pressed so passionately against me that the paper crackled. Then a flower was slipped between my leaves, and I was shut up in an envelope and addressed, and the— Ah, I can not say for sure what happened; my impressions are vague. I was put in a pocket later, where I found a little handkerchief damp with the tears I had seen wiped away. We were together until once more I was brought forth but to fall into a vile box, where I remained all alone. It had an opening on top from which I could see people passing to and fro. I was kept here a long time, and thought I should never get out again, when thump, a heavy mass fell on me, then another, and still another. I was nearly stifled under the load. A hideous yellow envelope fell on my side, as if to crush me out of existence. Perhaps it contained some villainous news, some hypocritical lie, some message of evil, and I, yet palpitating from the fine English handwriting on my pages, had to be mixed up with all this.

A key clicked in the lock, crick crack, an enormous red hand plunged into the box, and, taking the packet, disappeared, and came again. Twice I slipped between his big fingers—I was too delicate for such handling—but I was seized at last and crumpled up in a bundle tied with string. Then I was carried along till we were surrounded by voices, scratching of pens, and I was seized anew by a hand that pressed something dreadful upon me; I received two dire strokes right over the poor little flower between my pages.

When I came to myself again I found myself on a chimney-piece, the room filled with shadows of the dying day. At length, after a long wait, my envelope was torn open and I was glanced over rapidly by two superb but icy-cold blue eyes, so dry and hard that they gave me a shock. Only my first lines were read—he seemed to divine the rest—and then he threw me roughly on the chimney-piece again, the flower fell unheeded to the floor—I saw it no more. The one who rejected me so unkindly was a very handsome man, tall and well made, with curly, blonde hair and long, carefully trimmed beard. He was elegantly dressed, and his hands were white and delicate.

As I lay in an uncomfortable position close to a chandelier, the man, evidently forgetful of my existence, devoted his attention to tying a white cravat (the mate of the one in the desk), and no doubt at this very moment my dear friend who sent me forth this morning was wondering how I was being received. Oh, if I could only efface all that she had confided to me! He re-read me, however, after a time, and little by little memory awakened in turn over the history contained therein, but his expression remained hard and cold. Reproaches, tears, heart-throbs, all were unavailing. I heard him murmur, as he paced up and down the room: "If I go, there will be more tears, and what is to be done? It is not my fault that I do not love her any longer. I am decided. I can not go to-night. I will write and tell her so. I will say"—and he wrote.

What a difference over this morning, when I saw a sweet woman's face bending over me, feverish with emotion caused by thoughts of him, and this man seated before a table searching his brain for phrases to fit; but the words would not come any more easily than the ideas. He tore up six pages before finishing three lines.

I tell you all this from the bottom of a drawer where I am lying. There are letters, and faded flowers, and ribbons all around me, and I recognize the perfume of my tear-stained pages. Where shall I be to-morrow? What will become of me? This is my thought as I dream of the black eyes full of tears and the cold blue eyes that have ceased to respond.—Translated for the ARGONAUT from the French of Jules Case.

The filing of plans for alterations of the city home of John Jacob Astor at 844 Fifth Avenue, New York, show that the central wall which bisects the grand staircase was erected at the command of Mrs. Astor to separate her portion of the gray stone palace from that occupied by her son and family. Two of the Astors—John Jacob and William Waldorf—own the Astor House jointly. Of the Waldorf-Astoria, William Waldorf Astor owns the Waldorf side, while John Jacob owns the Astoria portion, and these twin hotels are divided by such a partition wall as existed in the Astor home, where the mother and son live side by side.

Professor Curie, the famous discoverer of radium, was knocked down by a dray and killed at the outlet of the Rue Dauphine on the Qui Conti in Paris. This has the reputation of being the most dangerous crossing for pedestrians in the whole city, which is saying a good deal. Since the beginning of the year thirty-four accidents have occurred at this corner. The Municipal Council has at last decided on the only practical solution of the difficulty—namely, to widen the street. A member said this crossing had been a danger spot for two centuries.

Captain Knowles, superintendent of the life-saving service, at Providence, R. I., kept his men working, uninterruptedly, for one hour and forty-five minutes, in the effort to restore to life a man who had been under water nearly half an hour before the body was rescued and taken ashore, his boat having capsized. The efforts were successful, though the unfortunate's limbs were stiff, teeth were clenched, and body cold and purple as a plum, showing that there was no surface or local circulation.

It is noted that the newspapers of Italy have recently entered on a period of marked prosperity. The first in circulation and enterprise is the Evening Courier of Milan, with 120,000 circulation and an equipment of American Hoe presses. The Tribuna of Rome is next in circulation and influence, with an output of 100,000 copies daily. The Mattino of Naples follows, with 80,000, and the radical Messenger of Rome, with 60,000.

Five hundred English teachers will be brought to America this fall and winter on educational tours, the plan being to represent every class from the kindergarten and defective senses instructors to professors in England's greatest universities. Applications are being made by teachers in all parts of the United Kingdom for a chance to take part in the excursions.

The Czar's new automobile was bought in Hungary for $20,000. It is a superb vehicle, containing three separate compartments—one for a private room, another for a bathroom and the third for attendants and the baggage. The machine is capable of running sixty miles an hour. It may be superfluous to add that the automobile is steel-clad inside.

Neapolitan cab horses are all stallions of a diminutive breed. They are driven without a bit. The bridle carries a device for closing the nostrils, operated by the reins.

Laborers in Germany go to work at 6 o'clock in the morning and work until 6 at night. This may have more to do with beating Britain in the world's markets than the tariff.

"Forbidden" is a familiar word abroad. In Italy it is "vietato," in Germany "verboten," or more politely "untersagt," and in France "defendu."

When Love Passed By.

I was busy with my plowing.
When Love passed by.
"Come," she cried, "forsake thy drudging;
Life's delights are few and grudging;
What batb man of all his striving,
All his planning and contriving,
Here beneath the sky?
When the grave opes to receive him
Wealth and wit and honors leave him—
Love endures for aye!"
But I answered: "I am plowing.
When with straight and even furrow
All the field is covered thorough,
I will follow."
Love passed by.

I was busy with my sowing,
When Love passed by.
"Come," she cried, "give o'er thy toiling;
For thy toil thou hast but molling—
Follow me, where meadows fertile
Bloom unsown with rose and myrtle,
Laughing to the sky;
Laugh for joy the thousand flowers,
Birds and brooks—the laughing hours
All unnoted fly."
But I answered: "I am sowing.
When my acres all are planted,
Gladly to thy realm enchanted
I will follow."
Love passed by.

I was busy with my reaping,
When Love passed by.
"Come," she cried, "thou planted'st grievous
Ripened sorrows art thou sheaving.
If the heart be fallow, vain is Garnered store. Thy wealth of grain is Less than Love's least sigh.
Haste thee—for the hours fast dwindle
Ere the pyre of Hope shall kindle
In life's western sky."
But I answered: "I am reaping.
When with song of youth and maiden,
Home the hock-cart comes, full-laden,
I will follow."
Love passed by.

I had gathered in my harvest,
When Love passed by.
"Stay," I called—to her, swift speeding,
Turning not, my cry unheeding—
"Stay, O Love, I fain would follow,
Stay thy flight, oh, fleet-winged swallow
Cleaving twilight sky!
I am old and worn and weary,
Void my fields and heart—and dreary.
With thee would I fly,
Garnered woe is all my harvest.
Sad ghosts of my dead hopes haunt me,
Pierce regrets, like demons, taunt me—
Stay!—I follow!"
Love passed by.—Solomon Solis-Coke

Song.

Why so pale and wan, fond lover?
Prythee, why so pale?
Will, when looking well can't move her
Looking ill prevail?
Prythee, why so pale?

Why so dull and mute, young sinner?
Prythee, why so mute?
Will, when speaking well can't win her
Say nothing do't?
Prythee, why so mute?

Quit, quit, for shame! this will not move
This can take thee here;
If of herself she will not love,
Nothing can make her:
The devil take her! —Sir John Suckling

Song.

Follow a shadow, it still flies you;
Seem to fly it, it will pursue:
So court a mistress, she denies you:
Let her alone, she will court you.
Say, are not women truly, then,
Styled but the shadows of us men?

At morn and even shades are longest;
At noon they are or short or none;
So men at weakest they are strongest.
But grant us perfect, they're not know
Say, are not women truly, then,
Styled but the shadows of us men?
—Ben Jonson

A Renunciation.

If women could be fair and yet not fond,
Or that their love were firm, not fickle still
I would not marvel that they make men bond
By service long to purchase their good-will.
But when I see how frail those creatures are,
I muse that men forget themselves so far.

To mark the choice they make, and how they change
How oft from Phoebus do they flee to Pan
Unsettled still, like haggards wild they range
These gentle birds that fly from man to man
Who would not scorn and shake them from their nest
And let them fly, fair fools, which way they list

Yet for disport we fawn and flatter both,
To pass the time when nothing else can please
And train them to our lure with subtle oath.
Till, weary of their wiles, ourselves we ease
And then we say when we their fancy try,
To play with fools, oh, what a fool was I!
—Edward Vere, Earl of Oxford

An engineer died at his post on a fast express train running from Boston to Philadelphia recently, known how long the dead hand rested on the throttle as the track was clear for many miles. Not until the train were entering Philadelphia like a whirlwind did the man discover that the engineer was dead.

NAVY SAVED THE WATER FRONT.

Fire-Boats, Destroyers, and Revenue Cutters Brought Blue Jacket Aid—Wireless Messages Efficient.

The work of army and navy officers in the early days of the San Francisco disaster is written of with understanding and appreciation by Edwin Emerson, Jr., who was a war correspondent in Manchuria during the Russo-Japanese war, and qualified to judge of military ability and achievement. In the current double number of Sunset, Mr. Emerson has an article, "Handling a Crisis," which is comprehensive and forceful, presenting many incidents and views that have not become familiar. The work of the navy officers and their men is described in especially pleasing terms:

The most valuable aid was rendered by the navy. But for the heroic work of a band of blue-jacket fire fighters from the navy, it is doubtful whether San Francisco's water front and ferry terminals could have been saved. Without the ferries for an outlet, the panic-stricken people, straining across the bay to Oakland, Berkeley, Alameda, and Sausalito by the hundred thousands, would have found themselves pent in by a wall of fire and driven back to the shelterless regions of the peninsula.

The ordinary telegraph and cable service was paralyzed at the start, but the air was soon throbbing with messages imploring aid:

When the news of the fire in the city reached the navy's wireless station on Mare Island, Admiral McCalla at once sent to San Francisco the two fire-boats, "Active" and "Leslie" with all the available hose, many thousands of feet long, manned by Lieut. Freeman of the destroyer "Terry," with his crew.

At the same time the "Preble," flying the Red Cross flag, was dispatched with surgeons, nurses and medical supplies. She dashed over ahead of the fire boats, and thenceforth was kept busy carrying the injured to the Government hospital on Yerba Buena Island.

Meanwhile the fire boats put into Pier 8 at the foot of Howard street, and running their hose lines out detected five streams on the fire. At one time they had run five thousand feet of hose up Telegraph Hill over a distance of seven blocks, finally losing one thousand feet of hose from the heat. At the same time they supplied city fire engines with fresh water brought by the "Sto Komo" from Yerba Buena.

Danger from the flames and flying sparks continued as long as the great fire leaped or crept north, west, or south:

For three days and nights these gallant sailors fought the fire incessantly from Fisherman's Pier below Telegraph Hill on the north to the Hay Dock on Channel 26 to the south. As the Board of Harbor Commissioners expressed it in an official resolution sent to Admiral McCalla: "Had it not been for their great assistance, we should never have been able to save an almost intact water-front for San Francisco." Afterwards, the Secretary of the Navy took official cognizance of this splendid service and rendered public commendation to Lieutenants Freeman and Bertholf, Midshipman Fild and Assistant Paymaster Mel, with the crew under them.

Six hundred miles down the coast was the flagship of the Pacific squadron, and a mysterious summons brought her in two days to the still burning city:

On the morning of April 18th Admiral Goodrich, on his flagship "Chicago," was cruising about twenty miles off San Diego. About eight o'clock an unsigned wireless message came down out of the sky. It read:

"Earthquake at 5:24 A. M., San Francisco, nearly demolished city. Call building is down and Palace Hotel, both telegraph offices, Wells Fargo building, all water pipes burst. City fire department helpless. City is in flames."

The "Chicago" responded as if an enemy had hove in sight. The cruiser was put under forced draught and moved forward at the rate of twenty-one knots. She arrived early Thursday evening and anchored off Fort Mason together with the "Marblehead" with their ship's batteries ready to land. An officer proceeded to army headquarters. General Funston requested that the landing force be held on board until next morning and that the marines then report to Col. Karmany of the Marine Corps, and the sailors to himself. This was done. Two hundred blue-jackets and sixty marines were landed early Friday morning. A naval officer in command of a beach party took command of the wharf at Fort Mason, crowded with refugees and relief stores.

A natural division of responsibilities and protective measures was the result of a meeting of the three forces: On Saturday Admiral Goodrich, after a conference with General Funston and the municipal authorities, agreed to take charge of the entire water-front of the city with his squadron. The flagship thereupon went alongside Pier 24, the "Marblehead" alongside Pier 16, the "Boston" at Pier 8, the "Paul Jones" at Pier 17, and the "Princeton" at Pier 7. All the revenue cutters in the harbor were placed under the Admiral's command. By Sunday the entire water-front, from Fort Mason to the Pacific Mail Dock at the foot of First street, three miles in length, was patrolled by blue-jackets, with a guard at every wharf.

The signal service of the navy demonstrated its value early in that time of confusion and incapacity:

For the first two days after the flagship anchored off Fort Mason all official messages to Washington and the outside world were sent by the "Chicago's" wireless apparatus through Mare Island. A naval signal party was landed and wigwagged messages down to the flagship for transmission to Mare Island. Up to that time General Funston had no telegraphic communication. The only message that it was found impossible to send by this means was a request from General Funston to the commanding officer at the Monterey Presidio, ordering reinforcements to San Francisco. Failing to get this message through promptly Admiral McCalla, commandant of Mare Island, sent the destroyer "Preble," which made the run to Monterey in five hours. This was a highly important service in view of the utter demoralization of both the Western Union and Postal Telegraph service.

Greatest of necessities, pure water for blistered, parched and homeless sufferers, was brought by navy tenders:

When a scarcity of drinking water was reported in the burning city, Admiral McCalla sent lighters with 50,000 gallons of water each to Fort Mason wharf and the Potrero district. Three squads of blue-jackets saw to the proper distribution of the water to thousands of thirsting refugees. Besides this work the navy men also took a hand when it came to the final emergency step of dynamiting buildings so as to check the progress of the fire.

H. G. Wells, the imaginative yet profound English writer, has a formidable indictment of American civilization in a recent number of Harper's Weekly. He says: "Just think of it: This richest, greatest country the world has ever seen has over 1,700,000 children under 15 years of age toiling in fields, factories, mines, and workshops. . . . In the South there are now six times as many children at work as there were twenty years ago. Child labor is increasing yearly in that section of the country. . . . This is the bottomest end of the scale that at the top has all the lavish spending of Fifth avenue, and the joyous, wanton giving of Andrew Carnegie. . . . These working children cannot be learning to read—though they will presently be having votes—they can not grow up fit to bear arms, to be in any sense but a vile computing sweater's sense, men. So, miserably, they will avenge themselves by supplying the stuff for vice, for crime, for yet more criminal and corrupt political manipulations."

Not alone in San Francisco is the erection of concrete buildings increasing. An important change is noted in the East and the New York Sun in a recent issue calls attention to a remarkable situation in the building industry there. Within the last few weeks the cost of common brick has dropped from $14 per thousand to $5. All other building materials have also decreased in value, but not to the extent of brick. The effect of this fall in values may be appreciated when it is stated that it makes a difference of $10,000 in the cost of construction of a typical six-story flat house on a thirty-seven and a half foot lot. The value of newly erected buildings has been seriously affected. The cause of all this trouble is that new and formidable competitor in the building field—concrete construction. It is believed the values of brick and other materials will be still further reduced.

When it was asserted in Paris that the monument to Zola, now certain, would contrast strangely with the pieces of classical sculpture in the Tuilleries Gardens, it was pointed out that in England "they honor their heroes by undressing them. They stripped Wellington of his clothes, his hat, his boots, his braces, and set him up in Hyde Park as an Achilles. All over England statues are to be found of modern warriors, statesmen, or scientists, who, thanks to a practical application of the nude, can be placed next to a Hercules or an Antinous without appearing grotesque."

New York City's budget next year will be $116,805,490.37—more than the total amount spent by the six next largest cities—Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Baltimore, Boston and Cleveland. Although its population is only twice Chicago's its government costs four times as much. New York's expenditures exceed those of any foreign city. The London Council uses only $50,000,000 a year. Parish expenditures do not bring the total to the New York figure. The expenditures of the German Empire are less than five times as great; those of Spain only a quarter larger.

HOW THE MINT WAS SAVED.

Employees Aided by Army Men Fought Fire With Blue Vitriol.

Harold French has recorded the desperate struggle against the waves of fire that beat upon the Mint from all sides, made by forces that for a time seemed doomed to failure, and his story in the June-July number of Sunset is brief yet vivid:

Surrounded by a sea of indescribable devastation, the United States Mint stands like the Rock of Gibraltar, looming above the leveled landmarks of the City of the Argonauts. Acres of debris-covered sandhills, hideous with tortured steel frames twisted into fantastic figures, encompass it. For seven hours a sea of fire surged around this grand old federal edifice, attacking it on all sides with waves of fervent heat. Its little garrison was cut off from retreat for hours at a time, had such a course been considered by those on guard. Over $200,000,000 in coin and bullion were stored in its vaults and for the preservation of this prize, a devoted band of employees, reinforced by regular soldiers, fought like berserkers until the baffled fire-fiend fled to the conquest of stately blocks of "fire-proof" buildings.

The Mint was constructed in 1874 of granite and sandstone blocks, well calculated to resist fire from without. Located on the northwest corner of Mission and Fifth streets, it occupies a little island of federal domain in the heart of the city, from which it is isolated on the south and west by a narrow avenue, named after the Mint. A block northward, Market street grouped its grandest department stores and office-buildings. Within its walls were enough inflammable materials to feed a furious conflagration. Iron shutters shielded the lower floor, but the windows of the upper story, on which are located the refinery and assay department, were exposed. Also, a tarred hip-roof over the refinery constituted a weak spot in the defense. The Mint sustained slight damage from the earthquake although its massive towers showered the roof and court with bricks. After the fire had swept past the Mission street side, and the certainty of its returning from the north became apparent, Captain of the Watch Haws, then in charge, ordered everything on the roof that would burn thrown into the court. Soldiers and Mint employees worked with utmost haste throwing great timbers and tank-staves into the yard. Here are located some thirty tanks of blue vitriol, whose crystalline surfaces were soon covered with debris, into which increasing showers of cinders fell. Master Mechanic George McLoughlin, after a swift and thorough examination of the fire-fighting apparatus and machinery, took command of the fire-fighters assembled on the roof. Of these, forty were Mint employees, assisted by a detachment of Coast Artillery, ably commanded by Lieutenant C. R. Armstrong of the Sixth Infantry, whose cool-headed judgment contributed largely to the successful defense of this national treasure.

When cinders fell in showers among the debris-piled yard, this officer advanced a line of hose where others feared to go, and where the slender stream failed to reach, he extinguished the spreading flames with buckets of blue vitriol, though scattering acid spray drenched his uniform and half-blinded his eyes. Fortunately, the Mint possesses an artesian well ample in supplying this emergency. Engineer Brady discovered that his pump was broken by the earthquake, yet after swift, effective work, he succeeded in making rapid connections just in time to supply the building when water was most needed. Just as the mint was almost isolated, Superintendent Frank A. Leach arrived from Oakland, after a thrilling dash through falling walls and blazing blocks. His timely arrival encouraged his men to redoubled efforts.

The Mint presents a scorched and glassless front on the north and west, and the towering smokestacks are to be torn down, but the building is intact and the plant unharmed and ready for a resumption of work. On the 23d of April the vaults were opened and $700,000 was transferred to an Oakland bank. Several million dollars more followed in a few days, relieving greatly the money stringency.

Superintendent Leach has received glowing messages from Washington referring to the saving of the Mint. Secretary of the Treasury L. M. Shaw telegraphed: "Accept thanks for your heroic conduct and that of the men under you." Director of the Mint George E. Roberts sent the following: "Please accept for yourself and convey to those who assisted you in the gallant fight to save the Mint the thanks of the Department for your splendid services."

JO. JEFFERSON'S ART.

How He Acted, Adapted, Painted, and Made Friends, Told by Another Player.

Francis Wilson was one of the "All Star Cast" that presented Joseph Jefferson's arrangement of "The Rivals" in 1896 through a tour of thirty nights in cities of the Atlantic Coast and Middle States, and in which nine players, all eminent, grouped themselves about the loved and respected comedian who had deservedly won first place on the American stage. So much the public knew, but until Mr. Wilson's book, "Joseph Jefferson: Reminiscences of a Fellow Player," was published in April of the present year few were aware of the intimate acquaintance of the two men, the affection and admiration of the younger for the veteran actor, and the esteem with which that tender regard was held.

The volume supplements the critical work of William Winter and the autobiography of Jefferson, as the author notes in a brief preface, and is well worth while for its close and informal views, and its apparent accuracy, while its rambling discursiveness and wealth of anecdote make it peculiarly interesting.

Mr. Wilson's description of Jefferson's personal appearance is well done, and this, of the eyes of the actor, will recall to many the expression that endures in their memories of Rip, Caleb Plummer, and Bob Acres:

But the eye was the great feature of the face. There was mildness, sweetness, frankness, fun, jollity, and especially was there riveted attention in it when he listened—and no man to my knowledge ever listened better! Good health shone out of his eyes—and how they did shine; and what wonderful control he had of them, giving them, as his long professional practice had taught him, every shade of meaning and expression his fancy might care to depict.

Of Jefferson's delight in painting, and of his success as an artist, Mr. Wilson writes with genuine interest, describing the exhibitions of the actor's pictures in Washington, and giving engravings of some characteristic examples of his skill. A souvenir effort and its making is thus described:

He painted with his fingers, pieces of rag, ends of blotting paper, feathers, etc., to get the proper effects. It must not be supposed he discarded brushes; they were used to lay in the colors. When I had last seen him, in Washington, he was making hirc trees on the canvas with his palette knife. This day the backbone of a feather was used. The soft part of the same article dipped in paint and drawn across the picture, produced the branches, limbs, and leaves.

"What's the swiftest time in which you ever painted a picture?" I asked.

"Two minutes."

"What?"

"Two minutes—for Judge Howland at a dinner recently. He passed me his card and timed me."

"Here's a card," I said; "do let me witness how quickly you can make one for me."

Some ink was spilled into the top of a soap-dish for him, and with a piece of blotting paper which I tore off the pad on his table, he in one minute and a half produced a little picture which he called "A Memory of the Catskills." He declared the picture had sky, mountains, valleys, trees.

But one other pursuit held attractions for the genial comedian, and there are many stories of that diversion:

Acting was his profession, painting was his pastime. He had a great passion for both. When he acted, and especially when he did not, he painted. When he did neither, he fished. He was an ardent disciple of Izaak Walton. I have heard ex-President Cleveland, who was often Jefferson's companion of the fly and rod, say he never saw any man get greater joy out of the sport of fishing than Joseph Jefferson, and that the mere un-tangling of a line seemed a philosophical pleasure to him.

Apropos of fishing, the story is told of a woman approaching Jefferson, who, comfortably clad and wearing an old sombrero, sat on the wharf at Palm Beach, watching his line. The good woman, mistaking him for a well-known character whose business it was to supply bait, asked, as she was directed:

"Are you Alligator Joe?"

"I plead guilty to 'Joe,'" said Jefferson, looking up at her quizzically, "but I deny the 'Alligator.'"

Jefferson often told an anecdote which Mr. Cleveland acknowledged had a basis of fact:

One of the best stories I ever heard in connection with Cleveland and Jefferson was that of a visit the ex-President had paid between his two administrations to the comedian at New Iberia, Louisiana: desiring to see an antebellum cabin, Jefferson conducted him to one, inhabited by an old mammy who might have been sixty or a hundred, for all one could judge. The place was without any ornament except a campaign lithograph picture of Cleveland.

"Mammy," said Jefferson, "whose picture is that?"

"I doan' know fo' sho," was the reply, "but I think it's John de Baptis'."

Reminiscences of theatrical life of course are numerous in the book, and many actors are quoted. This of burnt-cork beginnings:

Jefferson thought he was one of the first men to black his face after the appearance and success of "Jim Crow" (T. D.) Rice.

"I suppose," said Mrs. Drew, "there are very few men in this company who have not at one time or another been associated with minstrel performances."

"I played 'Bruder Bones,'" said Mr. Jefferson. "Everybody knows I was in the minstrel business," Goodwin exclaimed. "Yes," I remarked, "because we were there together." "Well," joined in Crane, "I was on the tambourine end with Campbell's minstrels."

"I remember telling this at Lawrence Barrett's house at Cohasset, where the rest of the party consisted of Edwin Booth and Stuart Robson. Booth then told how he and the comedian J. S. Clarke were minstrels in their younger days, and he followed this up by declaring that he used to 'pick a little on the banjo.' I laughed, and Booth inquired the reason. I added, 'Oh, nothing much; only Booth and the banjo seemed such an odd combination.'"

Both Jefferson and Wilson found delight in plays on words, and many puns, good and bad, are appreciatively quoted. This is one of the best examples:

"Joe Jefferson is up here drawing the worst houses you ever saw." So wrote John Sefton to his relative, Mr. Barton Hill. But the houses which Jefferson was drawing were on canvas. The comedians, Sefton and Jefferson, were summer neighbors in Paradise Valley, Pennsylvania, the valley in whose peaceful shades Jefferson first met the suggestion of Rip as a possible character for himself.

A barn was to be removed, and Jefferson objected because he thought it too picturesque to be destroyed; but if it had to go, he declared his intention of making a painting of it, and his doing so gave the facetious "Jemmy Twitcher" Sefton occasion for the jest.

In his love of nature Jefferson took many sight-seeing trips, and saw most of the scenic wonders of the West:

In October, 1892, Jefferson was planning a trip to California and told me that he intended to revisit the Yosemite Valley. I recommended him to leave his climbing of the Glacier Point Trail until the last day of his visit to the valley (a trail built since Jefferson's visit twenty years before), as, having done it recently, I believed that it was an inspiring vantage-point from which to say farewell to the many glories of the Yosemite. He interrupted me with:

"Oh dear, I couldn't do any climbing! I tried it once and nearly disgraced myself. My wife was in front and, as were all of us, on horse or mule-back. My mule seemed to be meditating a jump over the precipice at every step. As he leaned farther and farther out, I grew more unhappy and my head more uncertain. I didn't like to be the first to cry 'Halt,' and you can imagine what a relief it was to me when I heard my wife say, 'I can't ride any longer, I must get down.' Slipping from my mule's back, I fairly screamed, with an impressiveness the remembrance of which makes me laugh even now. 'Gentlemen, this lady can go no farther.'"

Jefferson's taste in music is humorously illustrated:

As we rode down in the carriage from the theatre at Hartford, the subject of music was started, and Mr. Jefferson made a confession that will hardly bring joy to the worshippers of Wagner. He thought that quite the cleverest thing "Bill" Nye ever said was: "My friend Wagner's music is really much better than it sounds."

He went on to tell that his daughter, who is very fond of music, took him to hear "Lohengrin," and turning to him in the middle of the performance, her face radiant with enjoyment, asked him if he were not now glad she insisted on coming. "My dear child," he replied. "I wish we had gone to 'Tony' Pastor's!"

The line that once separated the variety stage from the legitimate is made apparent by this paragraph:

Jefferson was liberal-minded toward the drama of today. He thought the acting and actors of the present time equal if not superior to those of previous years. He said that all things progress, and it is narrow and unreasonable to suppose that such vital things as the drama and acting stand still. "The best talent on the dramatic stage," he said, "has come from the so-called variety or vaudeville theatre. I could not get an engagement at Wallack's at one time because I was regarded as the variety performer of my day."

The comedian often gave a humorous account of once meeting with the prize-fighter, "Joe" Coburn, in a restaurant in St. Louis:

Coburn swung over to the table where Jefferson was sitting, and said:

"I hear you and me's rivals dis-week?"

"Yes," answered Jefferson, "but I am glad, Mr. Coburn, it is not in the same ring."

One can readily appreciate the answer made by Jefferson to a suggestion of his business manager:

Jefferson's eldest son, Charles Burke Jefferson, named for Charles Burke, Jefferson's beloved half-brother, has been nearly all his life the business man and financial adviser for his father. Actuated, it is said, by the popular craze for spectacular effects, he once proposed to give "Rip Van Winkle" a new phase by introducing a real lake, mountain waterfalls, and mechanical contrivances for the disappearing gnomes, etc. He outlined the scheme glowingly to his father and asked him what he thought of it.

"I think," said Jefferson, "it is the biggest piece of impudence I have heard in a long time."

A current story described the meeting of General Grant and Jefferson, and the latter was asked if the account was true:

"Of course, it is—to a certain point, but the most humorous part of it is not mine," he answered.

"Oh, then you did meet Grant?"

"Yes, and he spoke to me as we were going up in the elevator of (I think he said) the Equitable Building. He greeted me by name, and we exchanged a few commonplaces, and then he said he did not believe I remembered him, and I had to confess I didn't, whereupon he said: 'My name is Grant. General Grant.' You can imagine how chagrined I felt on hearing the name, and I immediately made matters worse by sputtering out an apology and saying that I was not accustomed to seeing him with his hat on, which was equivalent to admitting that I had only seen him when he came to the theatre to see me!

Nor did I improve matters by asking him, in my confusion, where he was living, which all the world except my knew was in New York! The story is true as far as that, but some wit wonderfully improved it by adding I turned to Grant a few seconds later and said, 'By the way, General, were you during the war?' 'Oh, that's fine,' he laughed, 'and it is to be true.'"

The destruction by fire of "Crane's Nest," the actor's summer home at Zard's Bay, Massachusetts, is described and its rebuilding, into which went great deal of the Jefferson persona.

There Jefferson was as successful playing the part of country gentleman in any part of his professional life. Love of disputation finally deprived of the earver's privileges, because faint and guests were too frequently obliged to submit to tantalizingly "long while with poised blade and fork he his round, unvarnished tale."

Here is one of the few quotations which the actor spoke sadly of growing old:

As we passed through he pointed some lath supports made by himself to eugirdle his tomato vines. "The sad thing in old age," he said, "is the sense of expectation. You no longer look forward to things. Now a gain is all expectation"—and here, the ridiculous presenting itself to his mind said swiftly, with his characteristic smile—"and you often get a lot don't expect." Then resuming the serious vein, he continued: "Therefore have become a gardener. My boy, you are past seventy, don't forget to cultivate a garden. It is all expectation."

Jefferson died on Shakespeare's birthday, 1905. Mr. Wilson describes the comedian's last appearance on stage, his last meeting with the actor after that time, and the volume contains a photo-engraving of the gravestone that marks the grave at Sandwich, Mass. There are numerous engravings of Jefferson and others in character, and a valuable index.

The largest clean-up ever made of dredger in the Oroville gold fields is to have been secured recently, after twelve days' run, something over 1000 being the result. The Gold Dredging Company, a syndicate of Angeles capitalists, will soon be dredging their property at Diamond on Butte Creek. The company is capitalized at $500,000 and has 182 acres of land under control. Instead of the volving shovels, or chains of huckel is the intention to use a steam shovel such as is used on railroad work. The project proves a success, it will realize the dredge mining interest some localities, as the present type dredges cost all the way from $50,000 to $100,000, to build and install, the shovel will cost but $10,000.

Under a judgment of court some islands, rocks and points in the St. Lawrence River were sold at auction recently in New York. The total sum realized was $13,595. It is said that the Maple Island alone, which brought $7,000, is worth $25,000. The half the most valuable islands were struck to Guy Van Amringe, a New York attorney, whose purchases amounted to $11,565. He said he bought for himself. Few residents of the islands were present.

The rebuilding of San Francisco being delayed by the scarcity of both skilled and unskilled, and industries have been unable to start because of lack of men. The San Francisco railroad is gathering all the information possible about the kind and quantity of men needed, and this will be sent to ticket agents, who will be instructed to publish it in every town in the country. Twenty thousand men are wanted.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

George Irving, the last surviving nephew of Washington Irving, marvelously hale and active at eighty-two, is living in New York, engaged in writing history of the Irving family.

Joaquin Miller at his cottage in Saratoga, New York, is noticed by all observers for his fashion of wearing fringed chamois gauntlets and tucking his trousers into his knee-high boots.

The bulk of the vast fortune of the late Alfred Beit, the diamond king, will be inherited by his brother, Otto Beit. Mr. Beit's wife is an attractive American woman, a native of New Orleans, and connected with some of the best families in Louisiana. She was Miss Lilian Carter.

It is now settled that there is to be a contest over the will of the late Russell Sage, the nephew, James H. Sage, announcing that Joseph H. Choate has been retained for this purpose. Mr. Choate is advanced in years, but he remembers the Laidlaw case in which he fought so long to make Sage pay damages to his clerk, who was wounded by a Norcross bomb.

Emperor William of Germany had for his imperial yacht in his cruise along the Norwegian coast the sumptuous Hamann-Amerikaner liner, Hamburg. The Kaiser wore civilian clothes at all times, avoided all talk of politics, and changed his those privileged to sit at his table.

There should be no thought of favoritism. The one royal prerogative that is never foregone is the demand that no one shall address him until spoken to.

Mrs. John W. Mackay and her grandsons are at a quiet little village near Balmoral Castle. By the King's special permit, Mrs. Mackay was given a view of the private apartments in the castle. One of the royal retainers on the estate Mrs. Mackay purchased for her a quaint glass dish and a cushioned cup which the Queen was accustomed to use. Although comparatively near her son's shootings, Mrs. Mackay will not visit him; nearly all his guests will be men. She will go to Germany for a new cure for sleeplessness.

William English Walling, who married Anna Strunsky, the Jewish writer, and is the grandson of the late William E. English of Indiana, inherited much of the wealth that tempted the Democrats in 1880 to place Mr. English at the tail of their presidential ticket, and he is now spending it in St. Petersburg on the Russian revolution. It is reported that Mr. Walling's associates have been the most radical and active leaders of the revolutionary party members of the terrorist group, who have come back in swarms from the colonies of exiles since the Czar's manifesto of last October.

Captain Alex McLean, the "Sea Wolf" of Jack London's tale of the North Pacific seal fisheries, and the man who in the schooner Carmencita—a vessel without a flag or country—caused British and American patrol boats no end of worry last summer, is now running in and out of Vancouver on the little tug, City of Tupeila. Last season's voyage of the Carmencita was a failure, financially and in every other way, the schooner having been seized and sold in order that the wages of her crew might be paid. All this is given incidentally in a matter-of-fact item in the shipping news of a San Francisco daily paper.

Mrs. Russell Sage is a descendant of Miles Standish. Her maiden name, Olivia, was also that of her parental grandmother, Olivia Standish. Notwithstanding Mrs. Sage's great wealth and interest in humanity, she has reached the age of 76 years without ever having been abroad. Mrs. Sage was Miss Margaret Olivia Slocum. She was educated in the Emma Willard school at Troy, then called the Troy Female Seminary. In her early life she was a school teacher, and that fact probably accounts for her interest throughout her long and active career in young women. She was married at Waterville, N. Y., in 1869. Mrs. Sage is the most intimate friend and adviser of Miss Helen Gould, having been a mother to the latter since she lost her parents.

Maitre Lahori, the great French pleader who made a name for himself in his defense of Dreyfus, has added much to his fame in the defense of Major John McBride, who fought with the Boers against the English. The Civil Tribunal of the Seine confirmed its decree granting Mrs. McBride a judicial separation from her husband. The trial developed much bitterness between the reputed Irish Joan of Arc and the Irish Boer hero. Maitre Cruppi, also a distinguished lawyer, endeavored to prove that McBride had wasted his time in dissipation in the United States instead of lecturing to help the Irish cause, and he extolled Maude Gonne's life as a continual sacrifice for everything Irish. On the other hand, Maitre Lahori read letters testifying to McBride's patriotism, honor, military ability and sobriety, and asserted that "the Irish Joan of Arc" was of English parentage, and has not a drop of Irish blood in her veins. "She is subject to hallucinations," he said, "and believes that she is the incarnation of an ancient Irish queen."

Freight Traffic Manager William Sproule, of the Southern Pacific Company, has resigned his position to accept an even more important place, and what is assumed to be a much larger salary than the one of $20,000 annually that he gives up. Mr. Sproule will be manager of traffic of the American Smelting Refinery, American Smelting Securities Company, and their numerous allied interests, which cover railways, steamship lines, smelters, and mines in various parts of North and South America. For twenty-four years Mr. Sproule has been with the Southern Pacific, working his way up from a clerkship to the head of his department. His departure will be regretted by his associates and numerous San Francisco friends.

VANITY FAIR.

The wedding tour of Mr. and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, which began four months ago and had included several of the European capitals, was completed the second week of the present month.

When the steamship St. Paul of the American line arrived at New York, she was met by the dispatch boat Sylph, which had been sent here from Oyster Bay by President Roosevelt, to meet his son-in-law and daughter, who were passengers aboard returning from a most triumphal visit abroad.

The Longworths, on the return trip, were fully as much a feature as they were on the outward voyage, and were the center of many merry parties, participating, as they did, in all the festivities on board, and it was with genuine regret that their fellow voyagers saw them go down the gang plank to the launch of the yacht that was to transfer them to Oyster Bay.

It is evident that Mrs. Longworth is interested in the political career of her husband:

There were a couple of young women from Ohio on the liner, who made it their business, as soon as they had met Mrs. Longworth and properly gushed over her, to tell her that an attempt was to be made to elect Longworth for re-election at the coming fall election.

Mrs. Longworth's eyes flashed at the information, but she quietly answered: "Oh, is that so? Well, let me tell you that if they beat Mr. Longworth they will know that they have been in a fight."

Eight years ago another young American woman was the recipient of notable honors in London, almost equal to those shown to Mrs. Longworth. The following paragraph, which appeared in the Argonaut in August, 1898, recalls the particulars:

Miss Helen Hay, the eldest daughter of the American ambassador to London, has had many honors showered upon her in London recently. She was selected for the honor of opening the public gardens which have been laid out on the site of the long disused graveyard at the rear of Robert Browning's hall at Walworth. Miss Hay performed the ceremony with grace and ease, the key with which she unlocked the gates being graven with the American and British flags and the arms of the settlements. Only a few days subsequent to this, at the big state ball at Buckingham Palace, Miss Hay danced in the royal quadrille. This is a distinction seldom granted to such a young unmarried woman.

Even in Europe the critics of feminine appearance are ready to admit certain charming qualities displayed by Americans.

Raoul Auernheimer, a well-known Viennese author, has been comparing the French women and American as he sees them at Carlsbad. At a distance, he says, they are easily confused, they look so much alike, for it is the pride of the Amerikanerin to dress like the Parisiennes, and both wear "blossoming hats" whose colors match their dresses to perfection. But as they approach the difference is manifest. The French women display a weakness and lack of strength; those from the land of Uncle Sam are "steel springs that never bend," and they walk—in Carlsbad at least—with a "splendid carriage which tells of lifelong gymnastics." But it is with a dying fall that he ends his rhapsody by remarking that after all the American woman is only a Parisienne who has just emerged from cold storage. It must be taken as a consoling fact that the race is only between the French and Americans, with the Austrians, Italians, English and Russians nowhere.

In London the latest is a bill of fare which you may eat. The sheet on which the edible menu is "printed" is made of the sugar tissue paper used on the bottom of macaroons, while the lettering is made of cake frosting.

The London eater who "invented" the edible menu card has been honored by the patronage of the King. The King "commanded" the caterer to teach his chef to make the edible novelty, and the King's chef produced it for a dinner at Windsor Castle.

There was much laughter as the King's guests discovered that their menu "cards" were good to eat. They promptly ate them. Some of the guests were grieved to discover that in eating the menu they ate some had French with it, for the chef spelt consomme with only one m.

An incident of commencement day at Dothem Hall, the famous seminary for young ladies, is described in a recent issue of the Minneapolis Journal:

"Papa," said the pretty girl in white, "let me present you to Miss Dothem, our principal."

Miss Dothem beamed on the old man. "I congratulate you, sir," she said, "upon your extremely large and affectionate family."

"Large and affectionate?" he stammered.

"Yes, indeed," said Miss Dothem. "No less than twelve of May's brothers have come steadily during the winter to take her driving and sleighing, while the two older ones were most assiduous in escorting her to the theatre twice a week."

The stars of the national banner differ in glory, according to the view of the observer, as has been noted in the South and West.

Recently a Northern doctor of many sciences and philosophies, who is now teaching in a Southern university, was being pranced and lorded through the capitol of the State by a host who happened to be feeling that day like the distinguished contemporary of Ben Hill and Alexander Hamilton Stephens. The doctor said that he had never been borne along niftily by so many grand manners in his life. Unfortunately as they passed the State flag he squinted at it instead of gazing reverently, and asked what flag it was. "Sir!" exclaimed his erstwhile genial host, in a tone of deep indignation, "is it possible that you presume to teach in a Southern State and do not recognize the emblem of her glory when you see it?"

"But," protested the astonished victim, who is a native of Wisconsin, "would you recognize the flag of Wisconsin at sight?"

"No, sir! I would not. There is nothing remarkable about Wisconsin that her flag should be so well known!"

While lecturing a number of army reserves in Magdeburg, an inspecting captain was interrupted by Dr. Schmidt, a prominent young lawyer, who blew his nose loudly. Dr. Schmidt was at once arrested and thrown into jail during the training period. When that time had passed Schmidt brought suit against the captain, but the court took the view that in blowing his nose and in his subsequent conduct Schmidt plainly showed that he had no military esprit de corps and sentenced him to ten days' further confinement.

Tired of Hartje; tired of Thaw; tired of John D.; tired of Mr. and Mrs. Corey, tired of scandal, divorce, dirt, indecency, red lights, high life, says the Dayton Journal, and it feelingly continues: Tired of manufactured sensations. Tired of reading of badness instead of goodness. Tired of publishing it. Tired of feeding nauseous doses to healthy minds.

STAGE GOSSIP.

Edwin Steevens was one of the attractions in Keith and Proctor's Twenty-third Street vaudeville theatre. New York, last week.

Nance O'Neil is going to the Far East for all. Ira Jackson, who has signed for three years, has strong backing for the star, and will provide new scenery and new plays for her tour. She will play throughout the West next season, and at its close will sail from San Francisco for Australia and the Orient.

California's eminence as the birthplace of prominent actors and actresses gets a new boost when one looks at the list of "A Strenuous Life," the new Richard Walton Tully farce. William Morris, the star, is one of California's native sons, and so are Hugo Toland, Elliott Cooper, Jackson Carlyle and Wilson Carlyle, and there are two native daughters in Lillian Albertson and Charlotte Daudridge.

Melbourne MacDowell has been engaged by William A. Brady to play the role of Javert in Wilton Lackaye's dramatization of "Les Misérables."

"The Man from Now," the successful musical fantasy that introduced Harry Hargraves as a star on Broadway, has in its cast Gilbert Gregory and Phil Brandon, former members of the Tivoli opera company.

Honorable Henry Lyndhurst Brace, son of Lord Aberdare, lieutenant of a Hampshire regiment, and popular with many titled English women, in spite of his father's violent opposition, is determined to marry Camille Clifford, an American actress who has appeared in "Gibson" parts in musical comedies in London. This is the gossip of Mayfair circles, where it has been considered an "impossible" engagement.

Harrison Grey Fiske has returned to New York from his sojourn in California and a tour of the Northwest to begin preparations for the presentation of "Bertha Kalieh" in a play in English to New York. This play is "The Kreutzer Sonata," adapted by Langdon Mitchell, author of "Becky Sharp," from the Yiddish of Jacob Gordin. "The Kreutzer Sonata" was written by F. Gordin for Mme. Kalieh before she came to the American stage, and she acted in it for a number of seasons in New York with success. Wagenhals & Company brought out the play August 14th at the Manhattan Theatre with Blanche Walsh in the leading role, and legal contest has begun over the right to the drama.

Reginald De Koven's latest opera, "The Student King," will open in Boston at the Tremont Theatre on October 1st, remaining until "Madame Butterfly" arrives.

Ellen Terry's farewell American tour will consume four months. She will appear in George Bernard Shaw's "Captain Brassbound's Conversion," in which she plays Lady Cecily Wainfleet. Miss Terry will also be seen in "Nance O'Neil" and "The Good Hope."

It is not surprising that American actresses with personal charms are anxious to visit England. Social victories of the kind catalogued in the following paragraph from a London paper are never achieved in America: "Miss Maxine Elliott, the beautiful American actress, will pay a round of visits to country houses in Scotland before returning to London in September. After the Regatta Week she will be Mrs. Mabel's guest in Scotland; then Lord Rosebery's at Dalmeny, afterward the richness of Sutherland's at Duorochnish. She will come south for Doncaster Race Week and will be one of Mrs. Arthur Wilson's house party at Cranby for the St. Leger races. Then she goes to Somersetshire as guest of Lord and Lady Alington at Crieheil. Miss Elliott was greatly admired at Lord Rosebery's royal ball at Berkeley square last week. She was presented to the Princess of Wales, who was charming to her. The talented American is welcome to some of the most exclusive English houses, but, strangely enough, although she knows the leading Americans here, she is not on intimate terms with them."

Nat C. Goodwin, the comedian, has bought a house at Beach City, near Los Angeles, and intends to make his home there when he is not on the road.

President Harry de Veaux of the Actors' National Protective Union announces that Madame Sembrich, the prima donna, had deposited with the union $11,000, collected for chorus singers, actors and others, who lost their wardrobes during the San Francisco disaster. The money will be deposited as soon as demands are made.

William Joshua Patterson, who has married Fay Templeton, the actress, is the president of a contracting firm of Pittsburgh, and a widower, 42 years of age. His first wife was a Miss Boggs of Allegheny, a member of a wealthy family in that city.

Mme. Galski, who comes to this country for a brief tour in the fall, is automobiling with her husband in Germany, "trying out" a big purple touring car whose cost represented at least two arias and three or four lieder. Mme. Sembrich, likewise with her husband, is simultaneously resting and gardening at a country home near Dresden. Sembrich's American concert tour is scheduled for late in the winter.

It is understood that the Lambs have decided to relinquish their claim on the beautiful summer home of the late Charles H. Hoyt, in Charlestown, N. H. The will of the comedy playwright bequeathed his house to the Lambs' Club as long as that society kept it in repair and wished to retain possession. Otherwise it was to be handed over to the Actors' Fund as a summer home for retired players, to be run as "The Lambs' Pastime," and, in case this provision also failed, it was to become the property of the town. Though the estate itself is very beautiful, the town of Charlestown is an out-of-the-way locality, totally unfit to be a midsummer rendezvous for professional men. It is a village of perhaps a thousand inhabitants, lacking many of the essential qualifications for a popular resort.

Director Heinrich Conried of the Metropolitan Opera House is doing some great hustling in Europe this summer. To replace the scenery and properties of twenty-one operas, and the 1,024 trunks of theatrical costumes swept away by the great fire in San Francisco in April last is no easy task. Before he had been a day in Vienna scenic artists and costumers had begun the work. They saw before them orders aggregating nearly a million kronen, or $200,000. Mr. Conried placed a few orders for ballet costumes in Paris, as the French understand those things better, but for everything else in the way of theatrical costumes Vienna was chosen. Mr. Conried arrived in Vienna May 17th; on the following day, according to the press agent, he was received in audience by Emperor Francis Joseph; the next day he was in Berlin, and the succeeding days, one each in Hamburg, Wiesbaden, Frankfurt, Paris, London, Paris, Munich, and Dresden, a good record for ten days.

Still another opera based on the story of Robin Hood will be produced in London next October. The British Museum and Nottingham Castle have been ransacked for their records and "pointers," and an attempt has been made in the play to rebuild the mediaeval time—the "Merrie England" of youthful imaginings. The love story of Maid Marian and the craft of Prince John are the elements of the play.

The Orpheum.

An engagement of more than ordinary interest to local playgoers is that of Margaret Wyehery, who will make her first vaudeville appearance in San Francisco at the Orpheum this Sunday afternoon. In the riding act of Mlle. Therese Renz will be presented one of the New York Hippodrome features, with her snow-white stallion, Mazeppa. Mayme Remington and her "Black Buster Brownies" will also be new to this city. The Oliveira trio will make their first appearance in America. May Boley and the "Polly Girls" will continue. Mary Norman, the delightfully artistic entertainer, will present another of her original monologues, Arthur Deming, the favorite minstrel, will change his songs and stories, and Terley, the man with the changeable face, and Orpheum motion pictures, showing the latest novelties, will complete an excellent program. Attractions of every description are to be found on the grounds of the Chutes, where the Orpheum is located.

OFFICE OF

TOBIN & TOBIN

Attorneys at Law

The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society

San Francisco, Aug. 17, 1906.

TO THE PUBLIC:

On August 8, 1906, in the performance of our duty to mortgagors of

The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society

we issued to them a letter which, among other things, contained certain statements concerning the unfair methods adopted by the London & Lancashire, Orient, English-American Underwriters and State of Liverpool Insurance Companies to evade the payment of their honest debts to their policy-holders in San Francisco.

On August 17, 1906, those companies published an advertisement addressed to the public in which, under the pretence of answering the letter, they sought to divert attention from their dishonest methods by attacking us. Unable to accuse us of unfairness or lack of integrity, they have said in their usual indirect way that we are attorneys and as such we are retained by many people to collect debts from those who honestly owe and dishonestly refuse to pay our clients.

Their only answer to the six specific objections we made in our letter is as follows:

1. We stated: "The above named companies represent that they are well able to pay San Francisco losses in full."

They replied that they are able to pay their losses in full, but nowhere do they assert that they have done so; nowhere do they promise that they will do so. This alone is a complete refutation of their own answer. It is within the knowledge of their own adjusters and officers, as well as the public at large, that they have repeatedly refused to pay more than 90 per cent on numerous claims after every possible deduction has been made therefrom for damage by earthquake, depreciation, etc.

2. We stated: "Their local managers have resigned because of the practices adopted by their adjusters to evade the payment of liabilities of the companies."

They replied by a weak attempt to justify their practices and indirectly suggested that the men hitherto for many years trusted with their vast business were ignorant and unfit for such trust.

3. We stated: "The attorney for the adjusters has stated within the last week that they have NOT ADJUSTED a single loss."

They replied that they have adjusted and paid and therefore the attorney could not have made the statement. Mr. Reed, their attorney, has not denied that the statement was made, nor have the companies explained that what in their advertisement they call adjustments were really cut rate compromise settlements, and that Mr. Reed meant by adjustments, the legal determination of the amount of liabilities of the companies on which suit might be founded. Mr. Reed, their attorney, made this statement, and his statement is true.

4. We stated: "They have knowingly denied all liability for claims on which their liability was beyond question, and by persistently adhering to their fraudulent statements they have frightened policy-holders into accepting from 50 to 90 per cent of the amounts due them."

They replied that they denied liability absolutely only in half a dozen cases—that is to say, they have in only half a dozen cases out of about 3000 put their creditors in a position to sue them by absolute denial, but they have orally denied their liability and have told their creditors that they had better take 50 cents on the dollar or 60 cents on the dollar than run the risk of a suit. In this connection it is proper to state that the only reason they refused to deal with clients represented by Mr. Sanderson of our office, was because in the performance of his duty he advised his clients and ours not to compromise their claims because of such practices.

5. We stated: "By reason of their practices The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society regards their new policies of insurance as of doubtful value and will therefore refuse to accept the same as security for its loans."

They replied that other banks would accept their policies on future business, even though they had not honestly paid losses under policies of their past business and even though they now make no promise to honestly pay those losses. We doubt if property owners themselves will be so short-sighted, and we know that banks will not.

6. We stated: "As attorneys we cannot counsel the acceptance of less than the amounts legally due from these companies."

They have not replied that they would pay amounts legally due, and therefore we see no reason for changing our views.

In conclusion we beg to state that the present plight of these companies, and particularly The London and Lancashire, excites commiseration. Formerly one of the great insurance companies of the world, it now stands before the public in the guise of a disgraced and discredited character seeking to preserve by a policy of contemptible evasion and repudiation its reputation for honesty and fair dealing.

LITERARY NOTES.

The Work of George Gissing.

Twenty-six years have elapsed since the appearance of George Gissing's first book in 1880, and in that time just twenty-six books have been issued bearing his signature. These highly finished novels, particularly his "New Grub Street," "Thyrza," "The Nether World," and "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft," have won to him an admiring group of discriminating readers who acclaim him the brightest satellite of the mid-Victorian stars, Dickens, Thackeray and Eliot. Those to whom George Gissing is one of the truest artists of the generation he served, will read eagerly the reminiscential and intelligently critical survey of his work by Thomas Secombe, which is prefixed to "The House of Cobwebs and Other Stories."

The natural bent of Gissing's talent, Mr. Secombe observes, was toward poetry and classical antiquity. But the compulsion of the twin monsters, Bread and Cheese, forced him to write novels, the scene of which was laid in the one milieu he had thoroughly observed, that of either utterly hideous or shabby genteel squalor of London. His start in literature was made under pitiful conditions. He lived in cellars and garrets. He ate his meals in places that a road-worn tramp would have disdained. "His breakfast consisted often of a slice of bread and a drink of water; four and sixpence a week paid for his lodging. A meal that cost more than sixpence was a feast." Thus it was that this highly strung idealist produced much of his work. The image often recurred to him, in his later days, when he discussed champagne vintages with his publisher, or was consulted as to the management of butlers, by the wife of a popular prelate. But he trudged along undiscouraged, sustained by two ideals. One was his passionate idolatry of Dickens—Dickens, the writer, Dickens, the humorist, Dickens, the friend of the outcast. The other was a scarcely endurable longing to visit Greece and Italy. When for the anonymously published "Demos" he received fifty "jingling, tingling, golden, minted quid," Gissing tells us, he "chanced to hear some one speak of Naples—and only death would have held me back. I wanted to see the Tiber, the Clitumnus, the Aufidus, the Albani Hills, Lake Trasimene! The mere names in Roman history make my blood warm."

"By the Ionian Sea" is the result of his visit to the classic lands of his heart's desire. While in Italy, in 1901, he wrote the study of Charles Dickens. "It is an insufficient tribute to Gissing to say that his study of Dickens is by far the best extant. . . . Every syllable is precious, reasonable, thrice distilled and sweet to the palate as Hybla honey," comments Mr. Secombe, enthusiastically. Gissing believed Mrs. Gamp to be the quintessence of literary art. Try, he urges, "to imagine Sarah Gamp as a young girl."

The influence of Dickens is noticeable in many of Gissing's novels, notably "Thyrza." He is, however, more morose than the creator of "Pickwick," although his pessimism is rarely more than on the surface, and, as has been pointed out, his approximation at times to the confines of French realistic art is of the most accidental or incidental kind.

The stories in the present volume, "The House of Cobwebs," are the expansion of moods and the outcome of material indicated in his novels. They are written with his always scrupulous and artistic workmanship, and possess all his characteristic mannerisms. The title story, "A Poor Gentleman," and "Christopherson" are particularly delightful.

London Fashionables in Fiction.

The dominant idea in Morley Roberts's novel, "The Idlers," is that man is the quarry, and the idle women in London's smart set are the pursuers and the seducers. The book is cleverly written, and contains the curious, engrossing quality of interest that attaches to a detailed recital of the underground doings of the English fashionables. Although Mr. Roberts does not assume the tone of a reformer, the inference is that he has a moral to convey. But while it is true that he may provide innocent young squireens like Jack with a weapon of wisdom with which to parry the attacks of such Messalinas as Renee, there is a lack of reticence in describing the liaison between Mrs. Buckingham and her degenerate captain which causes us to disagree with that reviewer who pronounced "The Idlers" to be a work of great ethical force. Detailed bestiality, in our opinion, can not advance the cause of morality.

Published by L. C. Page & Co.; price, $1.50.

A Princely Romance.

Barring the fact that John Reed Scott's hero is a prince by legitimate birth, "The Colonel of the Red Hussars" is a lineal descendant of "The Prisoner of Zenda." Mr. Scott has, in lesser degree, some of Anthony Hope's qualities, aptness and wit in dialogue, an easy flow of narrative, readiness and ingenuity of invention. He has also contrived to invest his leading characters with something of the glamor appertaining to those of the Blood, which the hero, as by right divine, always spells with a capital letter. There is, of course, an imaginary kingdom in Europe, a wily and unscrupulous heir-presumptive, a beautiful adventuress, and a couple of goo-goo lovers who bill and coo with a tenderness that is rather too juvenile for the thirty-year-old hero.

New Publications.

A new edition of Wessely's French-English and English-French Dictionary has been issued. The work has been rewritten, improved, and greatly enlarged by Edward Latham, whose aim has been to steer clear of out-of-the-way words contained in larger volumes, and to avoid the meagreness of smaller. There are numerous helpful cross-references between words of similar, or opposite, meaning. Published by E. P. Dutton & Co., $1.25.

Washington's "Farewell Address" and Webster's Bunker Hill orations have been republished in a handy little volume for use in schools, by the Macmillan Company. William T. Peck, Sc.D., has supplied the introduction and notes.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

Among the books announced for publication this fall are "John Sherman," by Congressman T. E. Burton; "Sophy of Kravonia," by Anthony Hope Hawkins; "The Americanism of Washington," by Dr. Henry Van Dyke; "Queen and Cardinal: A Sketch of the Life and Companions of Anne of Austria," by Mrs. Colquhoun Grant; "The Call of the Blood," by Robert Hichens; and a practical novel, "The Leader," by Mary Dillon.

"The Long Day," a novel by an anonymous woman writer, has been an important factor in the working out of Trowmart Inn, the new hotel for working-women, soon to be opened in New York.

President Eliot of Harvard does not view the amassing of wealth by the "favored few" with alarm. His book on "Great Riches" is soon to be published.

It is interesting to see how a critic of novels will write when she herself produces one. Miss Mary Moss, whose reviews of fiction in the Atlantic have won the admiration of the discriminating, is the author of "Felix Gwynne," which Messrs. Henry Holt & Company will publish in September.

William Jennings Bryan has written an answer to "Letters from a Chinese Official," which attracted wide attention. Mr. Bryan's book, soon to appear, is said to be full of faith in American ideals and will be titled, "Letters to a Chinese Official."

"The Heart That Knows," by C. G. D. Roberts, soon to appear, is a novel dealing with the fisher and sailor folk of the Tantraman Marsh region about the head of the Bay of Fundy.

The Illustrated Catalogue of this year's Oxford exhibition of historical portraits will be issued from the Oxford University Press immediately. It contains more than fifty portraits of English historical personages who died between 1714 and 1837.

Death of Mrs. Craigie.

Mrs. Pearl Mary Teresa Craigie (John Oliver Hobbes) died in her sleep some time during the night of August 12th, aged 40 years. Her death was totally unexpected, she having been perfectly well when she retired. Mrs. Craigie had just arrived in London after a fortnight at her home, Steephill Castle, Ventnor, Isle of Wight.

Mrs. Craigie was born in Boston, Mass., November 23, 1867, being the daughter of John Morgan Richards. She was educated under private tutors and in 1883 went to Paris to continue her studies, afterward becoming a student of University College, London, under Professor Goodwin. She began writing while yet a child, her first story, "Lost, a Dog," having been published in The Fountain when she was nine years old. Among her best-known books are "Some Emotions and a Moral," "A Bundle of Life," "The Gods, Some Mortals, and Lord Wickenham," "The Herb Moon," "The School for Saints," "Love and the Soul Hunters," and "The Flute of Pan." Miss Richards was married in 1887 to Reginald Walpole Craigie, from whom she obtained a divorce and the custody of her child in 1895. All her literary work was published under the name of John Oliver Hobbes.

A pair of bushy whiskers shoved themselves into the money-order window and the voice behind the whiskers said: "Gif me a money orter."

The clerk shoved him out a blank ap-ecation. When it came back, filled out, the clerk said:

"Here, this isn't right. It's for Dres-en, Germany, and you've got it 'on a domestic blank. You want a foreign link."

"Vell!" said the voice behind the whiskers, "vy didn't you gif me a for-en blank?"

"Why didn't you ask for one?"

"Mein gootness," said the voice, be-hind the whiskers, "do I look like I vated a domestic blank?"

The little one chanced to sit near a te containing apple parings. After a g wait, during which no offer was ade of hospitality, the child finally orted out, "I smell apples."

"Yes," responded the lady of the use, "you smell those parings."

"No, ma'am," was the solemn reply the youngster, "I smell whole ales."

A woman hurried up to a policeman at the corner of Twenty-third street in New York City.

"Does this crosstown car take you n to the Bridge toward Brooklyn?" demanded.

Madam, returned the policeman, "do want to go to Brooklyn?"

No, I don't want to," the woman elied, "but I have to."

Two old friends on the street, locking as, strolled slowly along, discussing vious topics. Personal ones were ched upon at last, and, after exchang-ing family solicitudes for several mo-ments, the Judge asked the Major:

And dear old Mrs. —, your aunt? S must be rather feeble now. Tell me, b, is she?"

Buried her yesterday," said the Major.

Buried her? Dear me, dear me! Is t good old lady dead?"

Yes; that's why we buried her," said t Major.

A lady visitor, wishing to be polite to th little son of her host at table, said:

What a pretty dimple you have. B-ay!"

You think that's a pretty dimple?" s the boy. "Mamma, can I show the e the one on my stomach?"

New York Central train was rapidly p-oching New York with Mark Twain one of the passengers, when a lady sing in the seat across the aisle leaned forward and asked:

Excuse me, sir, but will you kindly e me if this train stops at the Grand eal Depot?"

Madam," replied the humorist, "I ay so; I hope to Heaven it does, for if doesn't there will be a devil of a w k."

See at breakfast at a friend's, Phil-ly Brooks noticed the diminutive but r-ingly dignified daughter of the he e baving constant trouble with the la e fork that she was vainly trying to helle properly with her tiny fingers. In a spirit of kindness, mingled with m hief, the Bishop said:

Why don't you give up the fork, my de, and use your fingers? You know, fir rs were made before forks."

ick as a flash came the crushing re- to "Mine weren't."

heu Governor Head was in office in Hampshire, Colonel Barrett of the r-mor's staff, died, and there was an emely seramble for the office even w: his body was awaiting burial with m ary honors. One candidate ventured to ll upon Governor Head.

governor," he asked, "do you think would have any objections if I was t into Colonel Barrett's place?"

e answer came promptly: "No, I don't think I should have any objec-tions, if the undertaker is willing."

At a table d'hote in Baden was a young American couple, and oue lady was asked in conversation whether she liked Botticelli. The reply came some-what hesitatingly:

"No, I—that is—I'm afraid I've never tasted it. In fact," she added, "I know very little about foreign wines."

"My dear," exclaimed her husband, in a fever of expostulation, "Botticelli isn't a wine—it's a che-e-c-se!"

Later, amid other scenes, we repeated the story, to the great delight of a num-erous company. As the laughter sub-sided a voice was heard saying in accents of relief:

"Well! I'm glad to have that settled! I know I ought to be ashamed to confess it, but the truth is I've always vaguely supposed Botticelli was a sculptor!"

Charley Hands, of the London Daily Mail, went into a New York beanery for a quick breakfast. The eggs the waiter brought him appeared to be debilitated.

"Waitah," said Hands, in his best British voice, "these eggs carn't be fresh."

"Oh, yessir," said the waiter, "them's fresh laid—laid yistiddy."

"Very well," said Hands, as he moved back, "p'raps they are. But I will say this—the hen must have carried them about in her system a long time."

Mrs. Flint was a very stern woman, who demanded instant and unquestion-ing obedience from her children. One afternoon a storm came up and she sent her son John to close the trap leading to the flat roof of the house.

"But, mother—" said John.

"John, I told you to shut the trap."

"Yes, but mother—"

"John, sbut that trap!"

"All right, mother, if you say so, but—"

"John!"

John slowly climbed the stairs and shut the trap. The afternoon went by and the storm howled and raged. Two hours later the family gathered for tea, and when the meal was half over Aunt Mary, who was staying with Mrs. Flint, had not appeared. Mrs. Flint started an investigation. She did not have to ask many questions; John answered the first one.

"Please, mother, she is up on the roof."

General Carr, at the outbreak of the Civil War, left Troy to take the com-mand of a regiment. At Big Bethel his regiment had been halted for rest and refreshment and had not yet experienced the excitement of a skirmish. Confed-erates were in ambush, and from a safe hiding place they opened fire. Carr, so the story runs, instantly put spurs to his horse and dashed up to a group of offi-cers.

"They are firing upon my regiment!" he shouted. "My God! Now what is to be done?"

One day a colleague asked Uncle Joe Cannon what, in his opinion, was the main difference between the days of his youth and the present time.

"Well," answered Uncle Joe, reflect-ively, "when I was a youngster, a young man was satisfied to paddle his own canoe, but nowadays every one thinks he has a call to steer the ship of state."

A druggist, being in a hurry to get off to the ball game, made a mistake in com-pounding a prescription that contained arsenic, and in consequence of his error the patient died. When the druggist heard of the man's death, he struck his forehead with his clenched fist and groaned: "Wretch that I am—he was my best customer!"

The plans for what promises to be a most magnificent temple of art have practically been completed, and it is ex-pected that the idea of F. M. Smith and F. C. Havens to erect an art gallery on one of the most commanding points in the beautiful Piedmont hills, at a cost of $1,000,000, will be speedily realized. Mr. Smith, the "Borax King," intends the building as a memorial to him.

Arroyo Al on Literature.

I have read a Western novel in a ten-cent magazine, And I guess there's lots in Western life that I ain't ever seen: It was all about a cowboy, whose gun was set with pearl, And who loved a downright stunnin' type of broncho-bustin' girl.

I know the book is Western 'cause it speaks of chaps and spurs. And, when the men are talkin', the word damn oft occurs. And there's frequent bloodshed in it, and the hero kills the mōst; And the villain's full of bullets when he yields his orn'ry ghost.

Now, I've punched for many outfits, clear from Texas to the line And I never seen such doin's as this writer tells so fine: But I guess truth can't be looked for, when the magazines, they say, Has their Western fiction ground out down in Hackensack, N. J.

Notes and Gossip.

A chronicle of the social happenings during the past week in the cities on and around the Bay of San Francisco will be found in the following department:

The engagement is announced of Miss Mary Small, daughter of Mr. H. J. Small, to Lieutenant Arthur G. Fisher, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A. No date has been announced for the wedding.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Kahn announce the engagement of their daughter, Florence, to Mr. Leon Voorsanger.

At a reception last Monday at the home of Mr. and Mrs. George J. Stoll, on Benton street, Alameda, the engagement was announced of their daughter, Marie Louise Stoll, and Adam Brandes, son of Rev. and Mrs. William Brandes. No date has yet been set for the wedding.

The wedding of Miss Margaret Tutt, daughter of Mrs. I. E. Tutt, of Los Angeles, to Captain Carroll Falconer Armistead, Twenty-first Infantry, U. S. A., took place at the Pro-Cathedral of St. Mary and St. John's in Manila, on June 10th. The ceremony was performed at eight o'clock in the evening by the Rev. Mercer G. Johnson. The bride was given away by her mother and Lieutenant Milton A. Elliott, Thirteenth Infantry, U. S. A., was the best man. After the ceremony a reception took place at the Army and Navy Club. Captain and Mrs. Armistead went immediately to his station at Camp Connell, Samar.

At the wedding of Miss Evelyn Clifford and Mr. Sylvanus Cobb Farnham, which will take place at Trinity Church on Wednesday evening, September 19th, Miss Elsie Clifford, the bride's sister, will be her maid of honor and only attendant, and Mr. Eugene Farnham, the groom's brother, will be the best man.

The date of the Ide-Cockran wedding has been fixed for early in November, but whether it is to take place in Santa Barbara or at Burlingame has not yet been determined.

Dr. Raffaele Lorini, house physician of Hotel del Coronado, and Miss Carolyn Louise Chase, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Carroll Chase, will be married Saturday, Aug. 25th, at Derry, N. H. The ceremony will be performed at 3 o'clock in the Central Congregational Church.

The marriage of Miss Nannie King, daughter of Mrs. W. S. Townsend, and Dr. Peder Sather Bruguiere will take place in Reno, Nev. Miss King is very talented musically. She has a large circle of friends in this city. Dr. Bruguiere and his bride will leave Reno for Southern California immediately after the ceremony and will later travel extensively abroad.

The Italian Consul-General to San Francisco, Count Naselli, and Countess Naselli entertained at a reception on last Sunday afternoon at the Hotel Rafael, in honor of the officers of the Italian cruiser Dogali.

Mrs. Frederick Funston entertained informally on Friday evening of last week at her home in the Cantonment of the Presidio San Francisco. Among her guests were Captain Nixon, U. S. A., and Mrs. Nixon, Captain Simpson, U. S. A., and Mrs. Simpson, Captain Kennedy, U. S. A., and Mrs. Kennedy, Mr. and Mrs. Cullen, Mrs. C. A. Devo, Mrs. R. H. Fenner, Captain Wren, U. S. A., and Mr. Allen.

Mrs. Lawson Adams was the hostess at a launch party recently at Belvedere, where she is making her home during the summer. About forty guests were entertained.

Captain Charles Plummer Perkins, U. S. N., and Mrs. Perkins entertained at luncheon on Sunday last on board the Pensacola at Yerba Buena Island, in honor of Captain Capomazzo and his aide, Lieutenant Cappelli, of the Italian cruiser Dogali. The other guests were Mrs. Malcolm Henry, Miss Eleanor Phelps, Miss Kitty Kutz and Dr. Smith, U. S. N.

Miss Gertrude Mills will entertain at a tea tomorrow (Sunday) afternoon at her home on Sacramento and Devisadero streets in honor of Miss Edna Montgomery whose engagement to Lieutenant Edward A. Sturges, U. S. A., was recently announced.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Annexed will be found a resume of movements to and from this city and Coast, and of the whereabouts of absent Californians:

Mrs. Adam Grant, who has been traveling abroad for a year past, was, when last heard from, in Lucerne and the date of her return to San Francisco is still indefinite.

Mrs. Milton Latham has returned from a visit to Mrs. William B. Collier at the latter's home in Lake country.

Miss Laura McKinstry who has been in the Philippines since the late winter, as a guest at the Ide home, returned to San Francisco on Saturday last on the transport Thomas.

Mr. and Mrs. E. J. Pringle have been at Del Monte recently for a brief stay.

Mrs. Lloyd Baldwin and Miss Grace Baldwin have returned to the city and are again at their home on Lyon street.

Mrs. E. J. McCutchen, who went abroad shortly after the fire, is spending this month in Switzerland.

Mr. and Mrs. Clinton Jones and their family went over last week to Ross Valley to spend a few months.

Mrs. Ernest S. Simpson and her daughter, Miss Fernanda Pratt, will leave in about a month for the East. Mrs. Simpson will return to San Francisco in the late fall, but Miss Pratt will remain in Boston during the winter studying music.

Mr. and Mrs. William Sproule will leave shortly for New York to make their home.

Mrs. Alfred Bjornstad has arrived from her home at Fort Snelling, Minnesota, and is visiting her mother, Mrs. John I. Sabin. A little later in the fall Mrs. Bjornstad will return to Fort Snelling, accompanied by Mrs. Sabin and Miss Irene Sabin, who will spend most of the winter there.

Dr. and Mrs. Redmond Payne, who have spent the summer at Mountain View, expect to leave in about a week for New York, where Mrs. Payne will spend the fall, while Dr. Payne travels in Europe.

Dr. and Mrs. Philip King Brown have returned to town after spending several weeks in Santa Barbara.

Mrs. T. W. M. Draper, Miss Elsa Draper and Miss Dorothy Draper are spending this month at Green's Inn, Narragansett Pier. They will probably return to San Francisco late in October.

Col. and Mrs. C. Mason Kinne, after being burned out at the Occidental Hotel, found refuge in Berkeley. They have returned to the city and are located at the southwest corner of Jefferson and Broderick streets.

Miss Sara Drum has returned from a stay of several months with her sister, Mrs. William Gerr Hitchcock in New York.

Miss Kathleen Thompson and Miss Teresa Thompson have returned to their summer home in Mill Valley, after a visit to their cousin, Rear-Admiral Henry W. Lyon, U. S. N., and Mrs. Lyon at Mare Island.

Miss Lizzie Blanchard, who has been the guest of friends and relatives here, has returned to her home in Santa Barbara.

Mrs. Herman Shainwald has returned from a six weeks' stay at Santa Barbara.

Mr. H. Morgan Hill of Santa Clara County is stopping at the Hotel Imperial on Eddy street.

The composers of the Bohemian Club are working hard in preparing their compositions for the annual Club concert, which will be given this year in the Greek Theatre. Messrs. Sabin, McCoy, Stewart, Redding and Vogt will all be represented on the programme. The performance will take place early in October.

Mr. and Mrs. James Steel Reid (formerly Miss Alberta Bancroft) are rejoicing over the advent of a little daughter in their home.

The members of the Philomath Club are urgently requested to send their September addresses to Mrs. Samuel Bissinger, 2129 Jackson St., at their earliest convenience. The first club meeting will take place at the home of Mrs. Sahlein, 1718 Jackson Street, September tenth, 1906.

The Japs Have Invaded the Western Addition

An object lesson of buying a residence where there are no restrictions is being exhibited daily. Chinese and Japanese are gaining foothold in the best parts of the Western Addition. Saloons are running full blast at the threshold of Churches and homes. Residence districts are being ruined as such because there is no protection the law affords. There is only one spot in San Francisco where only Caucasians are permitted to buy or lease real estate or where they may reside. Only one where stores and saloons and flats cannot be built. That place is Presidio Terrace. There you will obtain protection from the many nuisances that are now making life in many portions of San Francisco unbearable.

Del Monte Offers

During the reconstruction of San Francisco, Hotel Del Monte offers a welcome shelter to those desiring a home-like place for rest and recreation. The park-like grounds, the golf links, the flowers, the many walks and drives were never more attractive than at the present. The entire hotel has recently been renovated and improved, with steam heat, electric lights, hot and cold water, telephones in every room. Why not make this attractive resort near San Francisco your permanent home? Special terms for families. Address Geo. P. Snell, Manager, Del Monte, California.

WHAT PRESS CLIPPINGS MEAN TO YOU

Press clipping information is information you can obtain in other ways. As a business aid, Press Clippings will place before you every scrap of news printed in the country pertaining to your business. They will show you every possible market, big or little, for your goods, openings that you would never hear of in the ordinary way, and they give you this information as it is fresh and valuable. If you have a hobby or wish information upon any subject, press clippings will give you all the current information printed on subject.

The cost for any purpose is usually but a few cents a day.
THE INTERNATIONAL PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

the largest press clipping bureau in the world, reads and indexes 55,000 papers and other periodicals each month, and even if you are now a subscriber to some other clipping bureau, it will do you to investigate our superior service. Write for our book about Press Clippings and our Daily Press Reports, and ask about The International Infurna Bureau, which supplies complete manuscripts or material for addresses, essays, lectures and debates, and complete and reliable information upon any subject at a reasonable cost. Address INTERNATIONAL PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU Boyce Bldg., Chicago, Illinois, U. S. A.

PERSONAL

Army and Navy.

The latest personal notes relative to army and navy people who are or have been stationed at Pacific Coast points:

Major-General Arthur MacArthur, U. S. A. and his aide, Captain Frank L. Winn, U. S. A., returned officially, last week, the captain of the Italian cruiser Diavoli, which has spent several days in the port.

Lieutenant-Colonel Hugh L. Scott, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., arrived on the transport Thomas from Manila on Saturday of last week. Colonel Scott was formerly aide to General Leonard Wood, U. S. A., and went with him to the Philippines several years since, where he was a time Governor of Sulu, and latterly Governor of Jolo. Colonel Scott is going to West Point, where he will relieve General Mills, U. S. A., as superintendent of the Military Academy, the latter having been ordered to the Philippines.

Lieutenant-Colonel Crittenden, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., who remained at the Presidio of Monterey on duty at the Division Small Arms Competition, has sent his regiment at the maneuvers at Camp Tacoma, Washington.

Major John Stafford, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., has been placed on the retired list of the Army after more than thirty years' active service. Major Stafford is on duty at the Presidio of Monterey.

Major Carroll A. Devoil, U. S. A., Superintendent of Army Transport Service and Post Quartermaster, moved his offices on Friday last from the Presidio Dock to his new offices in the building formerly known as Fontana's warehouse, situated on Port Mason, on the north side of Point Street, between Van Ness avenue and Polk street.

Captain Frank L. Winn, U. S. A., returned on Tuesday of this week from several days' stay at Hotel Del Monte, where he was accompanied by his daughter, Miss Del Winn.

Captain W. H. Oury, Signal Corps, U. S. A., and Mrs. Oury arrived from Manila on the transport Thomas last week, and will be stationed at Benicia Barracks.

Captain Marcellus G. Spinks, U. S. A., and Mrs. Spinks, who have many friends in San Francisco, returned from the Philippines last week on the Thomas.

Captain Edward F. Geddings, assistant Surgeon, U. S. A., has reported at Department headquarters here, and has been assigned for duty at the Army General Hospital, Presidio of San Francisco.

Lieutenant Thomas E. Selfridge, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., who has been stationed at the Presidio of San Francisco for the last two years, and who is a member of a well-known family here, left on Thursday of last week for the Military Academy at West Point, where he is ordered as an instructor.

Lieutenant Frederick L. Dengler, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., has been detailed as Quartermaster and Commissary at Fort McPherson, San Diego, relieving Captain L. D. V. Hunt, Quartermaster, U. S. A., of those duties.

Lieutenant Solomon B. West, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., has had Yuma, Arizona, designated as his station, while he is on duty in connection with the Progressive Military Map of the United States.

Lieutenant John W. C. Abbott, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., and Lieutenant Guy B. G. Latta, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., are detailed as members of the general court-martial recently appointed at the Presidio of San Francisco.

Contract Dental Surgeon John A. McRae, Jr., U. S. A., has, upon recommendation of the chief surgeon of the department, been ordered to proceed from the Presidio of Monterey to Fort Rosecrans, San Diego, for temporary duty.

Miss Wren, the wife of Captain W. C. Winn, U. S. A., is at present at Ottawa Beach, Michigan, where she will spend the summer, probably returning to San Francisco in the late fall.

The following were appointed by Secretary Bonaparte, members of the court-martial which was convened at Mare Island to try Lieutenant Edward H. Dunn, U. S. N., on the charge of unbecoming conduct on board the training ship Independence: Rear Admiral Merrill Miller, U. S. N., Captain Charles P. Perkins, U. S. N., Captain Thomas S. Phelps, U. S. N., Captain Alexander McCrackin, U. S. N., Medical Inspector Frank Anderson, U. S. N., Commander Arthur W. Dudd, U. S. N., and Master David M. Potter, U. S. N. Captain Richard M. Cutts, U. S. M. C., is judge advocate of the court.

A general court-martial has been appointed to meet at camp near Three Rivers, Sequoia National Park, as soon as possible after August 22d, for the trial of cases as may come before it. The court is composed of Lieutenant-Colonel Joseph Garrard, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., Captain George B. Pond, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., Lieutenant Oliver P. M. Hazzard, Second Cavalry, U. S. A., Lieutenant John S. McCleery, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., Lieutenant William C. F. Nicholson, Seventh Cavalry, U. S. A., and Lieutenant Oscar A. Russell, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., judge advocate.

Among the articles in the July number of the Journal of the U. S. Infantry are "The Circum-Baikal Railroad," by Captain S. A. Cloman, General Staff, U. S. A., and "Mounting vs. Mounted Infantry," by Major William Lassiter, Fifteenth Infantry, U. S. A., both of these officers being very well known here.

Golf at Del Monte.

Golfers from all over California have come together at Del Monte to compete in the annual tournament for the Del Monte cups. Monday was men's qualifying day to determine who should be allowed to participate in the week's contest. The course was over 36 holes. Twenty-six players entered, with the result that the following 16 qualified:

C. E. Maud, 146; H. Spensblack, 153; L. Y. Hayne, 153; H. H. Sherwood, 169; Douglas Grant, 170; M. Dore, 174; C. H. Byington, 178; E. E. Baker, 178; G. J. Kaine, 179; R. G. Hanford, 180; C. H. Wingate, 185; D. M. Crabtree, 185; C. F. Crocker, 188; G. Hazelton, 189; G. F. Dunham, 190; J. S. Oyster, 192.

On the whole the play was above the average of former years. The ladies who will compete include Miss Alice Hager, Miss Florence Ives, Mrs. Walter S. Martin, Mrs. W. F. George, Miss Armsbery and others.

The "Family" Social Club has issued a call for the Midsummer Row, which is to be held at Rowdennan, in the Santa Cruz Mountains, September 1st. About 100 members are expected to attend. A special train will leave Third and Townsend streets at 1 p. m., September 1st.

Lewis Morrison died at St. John's hospital, New York City, August 12th, after undergoing an operation for a disease of the stomach. His daughters, Miss Isabel Morrison, Mrs. Richard Bennett, and his wife, Florence Roberts, were at his bedside. Mr. Morrison was sixty-one years of age, and was widely known as an actor, the associate of the famous members of the profession of his generation. For years he had headed a company every season, appearing in "Faust."

Manager George D. Dornin advises that the City Department of the Springfield is now open in the Kohl Building. The General Department will occupy its old quarters on the California-street side, third floor, as soon as rooms are restored, and furniture, now ordered, made ready. Temporary Department headquarters will remain for the present at 1112 Broadway, Oakland.

The Springfield is among the companies which are adjusting and paying policy holders' claims in the San Francisco disaster involving $1,600,000. The payment of this sum will leave the company's capital $2,000,000, its reserve for reinsurance (or unearned) premiums $3,132,531.00, as appears by its financial statement of December 31, 1905, intact, and a net surplus of over $400,000. The assets of the Springfield at the close of 1905 were $7,156,531.72.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

"What is a practical joke?" "One that you can sell for a dollar and buy bread with it."—Judge.

Mrs. Skinnum—"Why are you all hiding from Tommy?" Little Lizzie—"Tommy is the huteher come with his hill."—Philadelphia Record.

"That young widow says she is going to break her husband's will." "I thought she did that soon after they were married."—Baltimore American.

First Friend (on deck of ocean steamer to seasick companion): "Have you dined, old man?" Second Friend (faintly)—"On the contrary!"—Punch.

In New York—"Can't you think of some unusual thing to do to-night—something we haven't done before?" "We might spend the evening at home."—Life.

"That man never uses money in his campaigns." "No," answered Senator Sorghum, "he merely makes promises. He uses credit instead of cash."—Washington Star.

Hostetter—"Do you believe the automobile will eventually cause the horse to become extinct?" Bigger—"Yes, and every other living being."—Chicago Daily News.

The Parson—"When I became a minister, I gave up playing the piano." The Elder—"Then you became an expounder in a double sense of the word, didn't you?"—Yonkers Statesman.

Cholly—"I thought perhaps you had a preference for Bobby Jones?" Mildred—"Nonsense! You are just as welcome here as he is. Why, he is the most insufferable hore I know."—Judge.

"Why don't you get an automobile?" "My dear sir," was the answer, "I don't need it. I have a dog, three life insurance policies and a boil. I have trouble enough."—Washington Star.

Cieely—"Why don't you learn to swim?" Muriel—"There is no one to teach me." Cieely—"How about the boys?" Muriel—"Oh, they've all taught me before; different summers 'yon know."—Brooklyn Life.

Gladys (at the seashore)—Are you having as many proposals as you had last season?

Mayme (wearily)—Oh, yes, but they are all from the same men! He was engaged 'o last summer.—Detroit Free Press.

"But," protested the pert young housewife, "you ought to take off something for the holes in these doughnuts." "Very well, madam," replied the wise baker: "I'll allow you one cent each for the holes when you return them."—Chicago Daily News.

"What," asked the sweet girl graduate, "was the happiest moment of your life?"

"The happiest moment of my life," answered the old hachelor, "was when the jeweler took back the engagement ring and gave me collar buttons in exchange."—Chicago News.

Mrs. Windfall—Just imagine, Hiram! One of the sailors told me that this boat is now in communication with her sister ship! I wonder what the conversation is about?

Mr. Windfall—Humph! Most likely each is asking the other if her cargo is on straight.—Puck.

"Don't you object to your husband's poker playing?"

"Goodness, no! I like it. You see, he always plays with Mr. Jones, and Mrs. Jones and I are friends. If Mr. Jones wins she takes the money away from him and divides with me. If my husband wins I divide with her."—Cleveland Leader.

The two young men reached the door at the same time. "Is Miss Swellington in?" they asked. The maid, Norah, looked at them and shook her head disconsolately. "She's in to wan av ye an' out to th' other," she said at last; "but th' two av' ye coming together has got me so tangled Oi'm blest if Oi know which is which. But come roight in both av ye, an' Oi'll ax her to come down an' pick ye out."—Judge.

"I presume, sir," began the young man timidly, "that you will consider it very presumptuous for a fifty-dollar railroad clerk to apply for your daughter's hand in marriage."

"Not at all, my hoy," responded Senator Slickguy kindly. "I dare say your side grafts are quite remunerative."

To Study Up.

To some far wood I'll stray today
And squat beside a tree trunk,
And there I'll try to learn me of The habits of the chipmunk.
—Concord Chronicle.

Speculating.

If I'd sow on my huttons
And give myself a shine,
And with henzie remove the sheen
From these old togs of mine;
If winter, spring and 'summer,
I'd let my skin go hare
Instead of blowing money in
For foolish underwear;
If I should cut the laundries
And leave off wearing sox,
And tote my lunch to work with me
In a cast-off pasteboard box—
I wonder if in methode
Like these I should engage.
I'd ever pile it up as high
As did old Russell Sage.
—Philadelphia Press.

Popular Poetry.

When the world seems cold and dreary,
Just you say, "Skiddoo!"
Say to Fate, when weak and weary,
"Twenty-t'ree fer you!"

Rondeau on Suffrage.

The Suffragette has come to stay.
To that event we may as well
Make up our minds, her strident yell
Is heard amongst us every day.
Poor Man at present is at bay.
Endeavoring in vain to quell
The Suffragette.

In time, no doubt, she'll get her way
(When that will be no man can tell),
But—pray divulge not where I dwell—
Woman does not deserve, I say,
The Suffrage Yet!
—London Punch.

Oakland real estate dealers furnish to inquirers statements of sales that show an advance in the price of realty in various parts of that city of from 100 to 300 per cent in the last four months. The demand continues active, though building is not nearly as extensive as two years ago.

Wherever the English language is spoken and babies are born, there Steedman's Soothing Powders are called for.

Land adjoining the Odd Fellows' Home on the Feather River, near Chico, and belonging to the river, is now believed to cover gold deposits and a dredging company offers $30,000 for it. It cost the Odd Fellows $8800 when purchased.

MOTHERS BE SURE AND USE "MRS. WINSLOW'S Soothing Syrup for your children while teething.

—NEXT SUNDAY GO TO BYRON HOT SPRINGS. You can leave Friday afternoon or Saturday morning, returning Sunday afternoon or Monday morning. Two days at the springs, and the entire expense of the trip is $7.50. This includes the railway fare, transportation from railway station to hotel and return, a delightful ride of two and a half miles, accommodations at the beautiful Byron Hot Springs Hotel, and use of the wonderful mineral baths, all for $7.50. Across California street from Miss Flood's house is the property of G. A. Breton, who also expresses a most decided disinclination to giving up his land for public purposes. Mr. Breton, however, entertains the most generous views concerning the land belonging to the University of California, which is immediately across Mason street from his own. "That old Art Gallery," says Mr. Breton, "used to cut off all my eastern view. I think it would be a splendid thing for the city if the University of California land were made into a beautiful park with sloping lands, beautiful boulevards and winding roadways."

This alluring prospect does not at all commend itself to President Benjamin Ide Wheeler. When interviewed, he was thus reported: "The holdings of the University of California will never be converted into a park. It is held for a specific purpose, the maintenance of an Art Institute; failing that, the property reverts to the donor. Nob Hill could be terraced and made accessible by winding roads. As for the University's holdings, it would be a brilliant opportunity for some millionaire to come forward and place on the hill a monument to art and present it to the State through the University. It would be an everlasting testimony of his generosity and his love for the beautiful and ideal. But, of course, the trustees could never give away or sell our property."

As we remarked in the beginning of this article, the unanimity concerning Nob Hill's beautification is phenomenal, but it seems to prevail entirely off Nob Hill. As for the dwellers there, they are unanimous only in one thing, which is, that they are determined not to turn their property over to public uses.

Again we are regretfully forced to conclude that the proposed beautification of Nob Hill is only another exemplification of the unreason of The Other Fellow. We have had it already in The Other Fellow's Lot, The Other Fellow's Street, and The Other Fellow's Park. And now the dwellers on Russian Hill, Rincon Hill, Pacific Heights, Presidio Heights, University Mound, Twin Peaks and Strawberry Hill are unanimously in favor of improving Nob Hill. But the Nob Hill holders will not consent. They are quite willing to sacrifice all or any of these other hills, but not their own. In short, it is another case of freely and generously giving to public uses The Other Fellow's Hill.

Home Rule for the Transvaal.

The granting of self-government to the Transvaal—so bitterly opposed by Rudyard Kipling in his recent unpoetic outburst—has crystallized into a new constitution which was laid before the House of Commons on July 31st. It provides for a legislative assembly of 69 members elected by universal manhood suffrage for five years. An upper house of 15 members is to be appointed by the Crown for the first parliament, and will thereafter be elected by the people. The ratio of representation has been allotted according to voters rather than according to population. By population it would mean a Boer majority, as the Boers have large families. By voters it would mean a British majority, as the British bachelors have none. The British population is mainly made up of thousands of unmarried men working in connection with the mines. This Boer majority will disappear before very long, however, by the natural increase of population, then there will be a British majority in the House. The importation of Chinese labor must stop on November 15th next, and thereafter servile labor is prohibited by the constitution. So the Transvaal outranks our Panama Canal zone.

Race Suicide and Murder.

Within the last few days there have been arrested in San Francisco a quartet of young thugs, only one of whom is out of his teens. These precocious criminals have been holding up men and women in the darker portions of Golden Gate Park, which now contains many pedestrians nightly, owing to the presence there of the refugee camps. Several robberies have been traced to this quartet, and a week ago they were run down by the police after they had held up Fred Mulinix and Miss Plise, who were out for a stroll. The attack was most cowardly. Two of the thugs walked rapidly ahead of the young couple, the other two remaining in the rear. The two young bandits in front then suddenly turned, held pistols at the heads of the two promenaders, and bade Mulinix throw up his hands. He did not comply, but attempted to grapple with the robbers, whereupon one of them shot him. The unfortunate man fell dead. The four murderers took to flight, but were arrested after a couple of days and are now in jail. As three of them have confessed, it is to be presumed that they will be speedily tried. As they are old enough to be murderers, it is to be hoped that a jury may consider them old enough to be hanged.

This is not an isolated instance of semi-juvenile crime. There have been several cases recently in San Francisco. Only a few months ago a similar band of precocious criminals held up a young workman across the bay. He also, as a result of the assault, was shot and killed. In this case the youth accused of having fired the fatal shot was tried twice and acquitted. It is to be hoped that no such thwarting of justice may take place in this case.

Of these four young murderers now behind the bars in San Francisco two are from orphan asylums and two are the children of respectable workmen. The mere fact that two of them are foundlings or orphans shows that their parents would not or could not provide for them. If the parents would not provide for them they were unfit to have children. As for the other two, the fact that they now stand in the criminals' dock charged with murder also shows that their parents were not fit to have charge of children. For men and women who become parents of criminals are largely responsible for the criminality of their children. Not entirely, for the murder taint may skip some generations, and a criminal great-grandfather may possibly be the seed of a criminal great-grandson. But no one can deny that training has much to do with the repression of crime. No more need be said than to point out what we do with criminals. We put them under restraint, partly as a punishment and partly to prevent the commission of further crime. Correspondingly the child imbued with an abnormal cruelty which may develop into the lust for murder could surely be so disciplined and restrained as to render it at least not harmful.

But waiving all academic discussion of the power of parents to make good or bad citizens of their children, the fact remains that they are held responsible for their children, and justly so.

Juries in will cases almost invariably hold that the children of the rich are entitled to their share of the property of their deceased parents. The jurors reason that the parents were responsible for the existence of the child, and therefore that the child is entitled to his share of the parents' property. Jurors in criminal cases, with equal justice, hold the parents morally responsible for the conduct of their children; they even go too far in this direction, and let the child-criminals go scot free while blaming the parents.

The career of young criminals, whether male or female, is generally due to the parents. Criminal parents invariably have criminal offspring. Unchaste mothers rarely bring forth virtuous daughters. And while decent parents sometimes breed criminals, young criminals almost invariably are the children of parents who neglected their training or abandoned them altogether. Correspondingly the ranks of loose women are largely recruited from homes where they were neglected or allowed to run loose; many such women also come from public institutions.

And this brings us to the question, How many people are fit to have children and to rear them? In our opinion the percentage is small. The average human mother is not so well fitted to take care of her offspring as a mare is of a colt, and in most cases the woman does not do it half so well. The average mother knows so little about her infant's body that she is unwise enough to give it in infancy foods which it can not digest because it has not yet developed the necessary glands for digesting them. The list of similar crimes and blunders which the average mother commits against her infant is long. But this is sufficient to show what we mean. When unusually sturdy infants have run the gauntlet of motherly blunders, croup, and other infantile dangers, they reach an age when they require careful coaching concerning the care of the body. Do they get it? As the average mother does not know how to take care of her own body, she can give little training to her child. For example, the teeth of the children of the poor are almost invariably neglected. It is often the case with the children of the rich also, but they have a better chance, as they see more of the dentist. As to the children of the poor, gross negligence prevails among them concerning the care of the teeth, the mouth and the gums. It is innocent if deplorable negligence to their mothers' ignorance. We do not refer to the neglect of the tooth brush, but to other precautions which every dentist tells to his patients: adult dietary for young children—which is mothers give them—often leads to salivary calculus "tartar," to pyorea alveolaris, to diseased gums and teeth. One may see in the faces of thousands of girls who pour out of New York's downtown streets in the evening, great gaps in their teeth. Frequently, at the age of eighteen or twenty, many teeth are gone with the most rudimentary knowledge of the care of the mouth would have lasted until seventy. This may be ascribed to lack of a dentist's fee, for in all the cities there are free dental clinics.

The average mother knows so little about her child that she will poison it by putting into its stomach what its stomach can not digest for lack of certain juices. She will allow her child's set of permanent teeth to disappear almost as rapidly as its temporary teeth through her ignorance of the most simple hygiene. If this be true, what can she be expected to do concerning such matters as spiritual and moral training? Not very much, we fear. What right, then, has she to have a child at all? The large crop of criminals coming from the families where the mother is ignorant and weak and the father is ignorant and weak would tend to show that her right to have a child is more than questionable.

Our good President, Mr. Roosevelt, is very fond of talking about "race suicide." He recoils with horror at the idea of the birth rate falling off. He points with pride to our country's record for twins and triplets. He sends his autograph and his blessing to the latest lady who has just presented her husband with a pair of olive branches. But if what we have said is true, the average parent neglects not only the moral training of the child, but its most rudimentary care of the body. How many men and women are fit to become fathers and mothers? How many men and women are fit to have children after they have been born to them? The percentage is low.

It would be a better thing if Mr. Roosevelt and all the others who sit in high places would not encourage a mere increase of population so much as to encourage physical and moral improvement of that increase. They would not rejoice so greatly over the birth of a child but on the other hand to influence the people of this country to believe that 10 healthy children are better than 50 scrofulous ones, and that five healthy sane, normal and moral children are better than a hundred rickety, immoral, or criminal ones.

The State Election a Trading Fight

The last of the county Republican convention was held today, September 1, and next week the Republican Convention will decide who shall be the party hosts in California as candidate for Governor. The ante-convention fight is still triangular. Closer ination of the field commits observers to the belief that the Pardee and Gillett forces are nearly equal. 150 or more delegates who will turn to right or left in advance in line, obedient to the desires of A. F. Gillett, still uninstructed.

A single new development has marked the campaign. Mayor Schmitz has cast a shadow toward the Republican assembly which may assume obscuring proportions. Astronomically speaking, toward the other candidates he has projected a penumbra which may increase to totality. He is quoted as saying that he prefers an independent candidate rather than the choice of the party—this in the event that he should fully and finally relinquish his place as director of municipal affairs.

Newspaper comment and speculation continue to be local. This is from E. H. Hamilton, in the Examiner:

Ruef has said to some of his friends that he believes Schmitz would be the strongest candidate who could be nominated by the Republicans, and it is more than probable that the San Francisco boss would stick to his friend the Mayor, in case Schmitz should decide to run an independent canvass.

In this wise the Chronicle points out the difficulty of securing Ruef's votes for Gillett:

There is little doubt, if Gillett be nominated and elected, that Knight will bear in memory the turned him down for delegate to the State Convention from this city, which added fuel to their previous animosities. That Schmitz will stand with Ruef in this case against Herrin, or any one else, is believed by his political associates and followers. While the two differ in matters of policy, they are very loyal to each other.

However, those who play politics seriously are looking forward to the convention and its nominations. The electors of California will choose this fall, besides a Governor and Lieutenant-Governor, and the heads of the eight State Departments, a large number of important official representatives. Three justices of the Supreme Court, nine Justices of the District Courts of Appeals, eight Representatives in Congress, twenty State senators—from the various numbered districts—and eighty members of the Assembly, are to be elected, and almost every township in the State will have a home interest in the result. In consequence, trading opportunities innumerable will be created, and the probability of great surprises in the result is not remote. California has elected a Democratic Governor and a Republican Lieutenant-Governor on the same day, and is capable of almost any political eccentricity. The nomination for Governor will be made with a full understanding of these conditions.

The Independence League, a movement fostered by the Examiner, if not inspired solely by the forces of the paper, and as yet not formidable in numbers or influence, is alleged to be in the field of State politics as well as on the municipal camping-ground. Mayor Schmitz says blandly that the chances for the Independence League of the Democracy would be better with a Republican party. It is easy to see that Mr. Schmitz's Independent League would be glad to take advantage of a victory with him. The Examiner has "let the cat out of the bag" during the past week. The value of Ruef's forces in the Republican contest is enhanced by the fact that the nomination and election of two Congressmen, three appellate judges, numerous members of the legislature, and other officials of less honor but great opportunity, are in the hands of the political manager who is loyal to Mayor Schmitz. The Ruef side of the triangle is not easily broken at this writing.

Low Business of Insurance Companies.

In an insurance trade journal, the Pacific Underwriter, appears a table giving the amounts received in premiums by the fire insurance companies in San Francisco during the six months ending June 30th, 1906. A comparison of these figures with the corresponding period of last year will show the opinion held by the public of the various companies. While there may be reasons other than the decline of business in some cases, it remains that those companies which are meeting their losses squarely are writing the most new business. Companies which are piling up "salvage" and other credits against the unfortunate policy holders are far off from their record of a year ago. Companies like the Aetna of Hartford, the Connecticut of Hartford, the Liverpool and London and Globe, the Springfield of Marine, the Queen of America, the Royal of England, and others set forth below, have largely read their new business. Some of them have doubled their business, and one at least has trebled its business for the same period last year. Here are figures in detail:

Companies—	Premiums to June 30, 1906.	Premiums to June 30, 1905.
Aetna of Hartford.....	$ 47,896	$26,207
Connecticut of Hartford.....	23,317	20,795
Liverpool and London.....	25,029	17,859
Queen of America.....	35,000	18,302
Royal of England.....	40,832	22,946
Springfield of Marine.....	108,350	30,525
Union Assurance.....	61,403	47,559
Western Assurance.....	26,003	18,714
York and Zeland.....	31,344	17,351
British and Mercantile.....	41,442	23,868
Ethiopia of London.....	54,211	28,496
Empire State.....	10,299	4,179
Phoenix of London.....	37,356	26,565
Union of America.....	23,632	14,153
Commercial Union.....	92,360	47,583
United States.....	30,390	15,357
Union and National.....	19,138	11,693
London.....	34,724	21,864

The next table shows a list of the companies whose receipts for the first six months of this year have fallen off when compared with a similar period in 1905. This diminishing table is deceptive in a way, for the greater part of the premiums shown here were paid in to the companies prior to the great fire of April. If the receipts of these companies were pro rated for the six months according to the amount they have received since the fire, their receipts would be startlingly small. Here follows the detailed statement of a number of companies having diminished premium receipts:

Companies—	Premiums to June 30, 1906.	Premiums to June 30, 1905.
British America.....	$ 6,533	$ 8,304
Caledonian.....	19,522	27,888
Caledonian-American.....	4,329	5,412
Concordia.....	3,158	4,103
Delaware.....	4,627	6,271
Franklin of Philadelphia.....	7,363	10,790
German National.....	5,536	7,849
Germania of N. Y.....	15,035	25,830
German of Freeport.....	16,531	27,660
German of Peoria.....	1,998	4,037
Gilard of Philadelphia.....	4,213	7,722
Hanover.....	8,685	13,221
Nassau.....	2,330	4,328
National of Hartford.....	11,833	20,371
Northwestern National.....	1,169	4,862
North River.....	2,851	5,347
Royal Exchange.....	15,926	35,411
Security of New Haven.....	1,853	3,572
Teutonia.....	1,060	3,309
United Firemen's.....	1,930	5,255
Williamsburg City.....	3,058	9,860
Western of Toronto.....	6,907	10,343

Of these companies one of the heaviest drops is that noticed in the receipts of the Williamsburg City, which has taken in less than one-third of the amount it received a year ago. This is not extraordinary when it is remembered that this company is one of the most notorious welchers in the list of crooked companies, and that more suits have been brought against it by its policy holders than any other two or three companies put together. The German of Peoria has fallen off to less than one-half of its previous business. The German of Freeport has diminished nearly one-half. In both cases this may be ascribed to the attempt of these companies to force their policy holders to accept heavy cuts. The International of Hartford has fallen off to nearly one-half of its receipts a year ago; the Royal Exchange also has dropped to less than one-half. The Caledonian and a number of other British companies have also experienced a heavy drop.

It is only fair to state that some of the companies in this table are not accused of double dealings with their policy holders, but they carry earthquake clauses in their policies; so much litigation is apprehended from these earthquake clauses that persons seeking to insure naturally dread these complications, and seek other companies which do not carry these earthquake clauses.

Crabs, Lobster, and Watermelon.

A more or less veracious dispatch shocked the country the other day, giving the news that John D. Rockefeller was confined to his bed through "an overindulgence in watermelon." It is scarcely credible that a man worth one hundred millions should imperil his stomach with that seductive vegetable or fruit. For whether the watermelon is a vegetable or a fruit is a disputed point. It is like the tomato in that regard, for the classification of the canteloupe, the watermelon, and the tomato have led to much trouble at club dinners and have even separated husbands and wives. Watermelon trouble, however, is by no means linguistic alone; it is stomachic and intestinal as well, as Rockefeller has found. How alluring the watermelon must be in summer! The writer once knew an elderly lady, childless, widowed, rich, ever surrounded by adoring cousins, nephews, and nieces; this elderly lady possessed several millions of dollars, and yet she flew in the face of fate one midsummer day, in the broiling Atlantic latitudes near New York, by eating lobster, ice cream, and watermelon all at the same meal. We looked at her with startled eyes, for it seemed deliberately suicidal. But the millionaire widow only went to bed for a day or two, and soon recovered, to enjoy her meals and her millions. Still, why do these abnormally rich persons take such risks? Where a tramp or a poor seamstress is concerned it is comprehensible, but not so with a millionaire widow or a Rockefeller.

The Baltimore Sun the other day remarked in a mournfully reminiscent vein that in Baltimore it used to be considered suicidal mania to eat crabs and milk at the same meal. Now, however, the editor remarked, the practice was not at all uncommon and frequently was not fatal. Only a fortnight ago a professor of dietetics died suddenly in Atlantic City from eating boiled crabs. He is said to have boasted that his soft skin, good color, and clear eyes were due solely to his "primitive foods." He could scarcely get anything more primitive than a crab, for it is only one remove from carrion. About the same time the editor of Printer's Ink, a newspaper trade journal, was hard at work in his office on Friday noon, felt badly Friday afternoon, and died Saturday forenoon. The doctor said it was "acute indigestion," but his friends say that it was a luncheon on Friday of lobster and brandy.

Here on the Pacific Coast we have not so many crustaceans as on the Atlantic, and the tempting lobster in particular is absent. We have the crawfish in exchange, but he does not amount to much. Most of our oysters are transplanted, and our clams, are so coarse that they are almost uneatable. True, a very fair article of clam comes from the neighborhood of Tomales Bay, but the natives there are too lazy to dig them. Consequently the Tomales clam remains largely undigged and uneaten. A favorite method of crustacean poisoning on this Coast is for people to eat mussels, which are freely found in San Francisco Bay and at many other points on the coast. While they are not nearly so deadly as the lobster, they develop, if taken with care and in sufficient quantities, cases of acute colic which leave little to be desired.

We might suggest to Mr. Rockefeller another way of taking watermelon. It is common in those Southern States where they distill in the mountains the moonshine whiskey that maketh glad the heart of man. They cut a plug out of a large watermelon, remove the works, fill the watermelon with whiskey, and reinsert the plug. After the melon has passed the vigilance of Uncle Sam's revenue officers the natives take out the plug, consume the whiskey, and throw away the watermelon. This, compared with Mr. Rockefeller's method, is certainly much safer and said to be more agreeable.

Labor Setting Toward San Francisco.

The Argonaut may not circulate widely among the working classes throughout the world, but it recently printed an editorial about the high wages paid in San Francisco which is being published in newspapers circulating among those classes. We are receiving a number of letters of which we print a couple of New York samples. Here is one:

New York City,
Aug. 12, 1906.

Sir
I have seen your add in the world, will you kindly inform me of the address of any Bricklayers Boss in San Francisco, I will like to communicate with them, hoping to hear from you early.

as truly
JAMES. J. GHENT Bricklayer.

We would be more than glad to give to James the address of a bricklayer's boss in San Francisco, but we can not because James has neglected to append his own. It is true he has carefully placed "New York City" at the top of his note, but that is a vague and indefinite address. However, if James should happen to see these few lines, we beg to assure him that he will make no mistake in packing his grip, saying good-bye to his girl, and taking the train for San Francisco. When he arrives here he will not have to search long for the address of a "bricklayer's boss in San Francisco." There is no lack of bricks, brickbats, or bricklayers' bosses in San Francisco, but there is a marked scarcity of bricklayers. If James will hasten hitherward he may begin laying bricks at once at $8.00 per day, which is more than we pay most of our college professors, army officers, or clergymen.

To the next letter we cannot give so reassuring a reply. It runs as follows:

New York City, August 11, 1906.

To the Editor of the San Francisco Argonaut.
Dear Sir, Observing an account of Labor question in the issue of to-day's world, I would be much obliged to you, if you kindly would give me some information.

I am a single man (38) of good habits and character. A Jack of all trades and master of none, with good references as a fireman. Being a little short of money I would be willing to sign a contract with a concern, who has confidence enough in a reliable man to advance his railroad ticket.

Any advice that you could give me will be greatly appreciated and hoping to hear from you I remain

Yours respectfully
LEON BOWENS.

334 E. 41 Str
c-o Mrs. Ropp.

P. S. Speaks and writes English, French, Italian.

Leon tells us that he is a "jack of all trades." That is a calling which we have observed to be usually underpaid. If Leon is a good fireman, however, as he says he is, he can easily get a job. There is a good demand for firemen, although they are not so highly paid as bricklayers. We will be frank, however, with Leon and inform him that if he lands on the San Francisco waterfront and looks for a job as fireman, he can get it, but he will have the hottest time he ever had in his life. There is a little difference of opinion between the ship-owners and the seamen's union at present, and the mariners are engaged in "persuading" all seamen, stewards, cooks, and firemen not to accept jobs aboard ship until the strike is settled. The means of suasion which they seem to affect most is brickbats. There are millions of brickbats on and around the water front in San Francisco, and when the supply runs short the eight-dollar bricklayers will speedily make more brickbats for the four-dollar seamen.

If Leon, among the many trades of which he is a jack, can wield a hammer, can push a plane, can ply a saw, can fit gas and water pipes, can do any builders' work, and particularly if he can lay bricks, we would advise him to come to San Francisco. If he wishes to be a marine fireman we advise him to stay where he is.

The Situation in Iowa.

The recent row in Iowa at the Republican State Convention was followed by a reconciliation, but it was a purely perfunctory one. Much bitter feeling was left behind. The fact that Secretary Shaw was roundly hissed in the convention shows how bitter is the opposition to him, and it would seem to settle his presidential ambition. No man can claim to be a "favorite son" when he has been hissed in convention in his own State. The Iowa stand-patters are so infuriated over the renomination of Governor Cummins, and the very mild endorsement of tariff changes by the revision Republicans, that they are now threatening to bolt the Republican ticket and to support the Democratic nominee for governor. Senator Dolliver and the Republican Congressmen interfered in the fight in order to bring about harmony and incidentally to save their own seats. The stand-patters now talk about sending Senator Dolliver back to private life as a reward for his interference. His term expires next March. They also threaten to defeat all the Iowa Republican Congressmen except W. P. Hepburn, because they advocated the cause of the Cummins delegates as against the stand-patters' constituents. The Democrats in and out of Iowa are gazing on this family quarrel with unmixed joy. They hope to gain not only the Governorship but some of Iowa's eleven Republican congressional seats.

Inconveniences of Magazine Reading.

A machine for making magazines lie flat has been invented and installed—not in America, we regret to say, but in London. The process need not be described here. It is sufficient to say that the backs of the sheets are automatically so fastened together that they open much as a bound book does which has been sewed. The invention would be hailed with relief by the readers of American magazines. Most of our monthlies nowadays are turned out so cheaply, are made so uncomfortably and unreasonably thick, are so swollen and dropsical with "ads," and are so cheaply fastened together with wire staples as to render it difficult to open them flat enough to read them with ease.

We wish to say that our American magazine publishers should turn their attention to improving the mechanical features of their magazines in the way of careful typography and good binding. They display an inexcusable neglect of their reading matter. We do not speak here of its quality, but of its printing and of its arrangement. It is buried in masses of advertising, to which it is so frankly subordinated that the effect is disagreeable. If the publishers so plainly show their contempt for their reading matter, their readers are apt to share their feelings. In some of the most widely circulated periodicals, like Collier's, the Saturday Evening Post, and the Ladies' Home Journal, the dailies' detestable fashion is followed of beginning an article in the front of the magazine, and abruptly breaking it off to hide its ending in a labyrinth of advertisements. In the case of the dailies there is some excuse for this: they are made up late and hurriedly, and they must display their wares in bargain-counter style, or their purchasers will not buy. In the case of the weeklies and monthlies there is no such excuse. Their sole motive is greed of gain—they want to catch advertisers by putting them "alongside of pure reading matter."

To return to the question of cheap binding by wire-staple stitching. This method is an excellent one for periodicals and pamphlets which are so thin that they may be "saddle-stitched," or even side-stitched without taking up too much of the back; but when the reverse is the case the printed product absolutely refuses to open flat, and is so annoying as to be almost beyond endurance.

Another thing which would greatly add to the convenience of the magazine reader would be to place the table of contents where he could easily find it. The best place of all is on the front cover. As many publishers prefer that for ornamental cover designs, it may be considered that this position is unavailable. It would be an ideal place, for in this busy age few of us can waste much time in looking up the articles we want to read. But if the first page may not be used for the contents, why not the second? The answer is simple—the magazine publishers are all of them very rich, and hence they can not afford to lose the price of the advertisements that usually fill that page. The next best place would be the first page facing the cover. Why not use that for the contents? The same answer as before. These three perfectly obvious pages being disposed of, it makes no difference where the table of contents is placed, and that is usually where the publishers place it. A reader trying to find out what is in a magazine will often spend five minutes trying to find the table of contents itself.

While on the subject of what we do not like in the magazines, we confess that we do not like the foolish colored pictures. We know of no printing process, whether lithographic, xylographic, or zincographic, by which the artist's work in color can be reproduced artistically. It can be reproduced, but that is all. It can be reproduced well enough to please the unthinking, but it makes the judicious grieve. The chromo craze of some years ago, inartistic as the output was, produced better work in many respects than that now seen in the magazines. In fact, high-grade color work, much more deliberately done than the magazine work, is (artistically speaking) a failure. Edinburgh has for centuries been famous for its excellent printing; the Edinburgh firm of A. & C. Black has now for some years been turning out costly illustrated books in color. These contain reproductions in oleogravure, aquarellogravure, and pastello-gravure. Carefully as they are done, one can only say of them, with a sigh, that the originals must have been very good indeed.

As for the colored pictures in the current magazines, many of them are atrocious. It would not be fair to say that they are in the same class with the labels on tomato tins and biscuit boxes. But it is not exaggeration to say they are on about the same level with the color-printing coming with costly goods, such as Havana cigars, French prunes, Spanish raisins, and the like.

We have said but little about the reading matter in the magazines. To paraphrase Lincoln, for those who like that kind of matter it is probably just about the kind of matter that they would like. We do not mean to say that there is nothing in the magazines worth reading—that statement would be absurd. But we do believe that nearly everything in them worth reading is reprinted in book form—serial stories, travel sketches, essays. The magazines have come to be used by authors and publishers as the rough drafts for their books. Nearly everything in them which is worth reading is reprinted. Therefore nearly everything in them which is not reprinted is not worth reading.

This outburst of criticism against the magazines is due to the fact that the writer, who swore off in 1900 and resolved never again to read the magazines, has had a forced relapse. Unlike stopping smoking, the cessation of magazine skimming produces little immediate effect. After the lapse of a month or two, however, the reformed magazine reader experiences a certain feeling of mental well-being, like the recovery of physical tone after an illness.

Years elapsed, and the writer read no magazines, thought of no magazines, and even noticed no magazines, for if he saw them they looked to him like the colored comic pages of the Sunday newspapers. And this recalls the fact that when he was afflicted with the deplored magazine habit he used to feel after reading the zines very much the same as after reading the Sunday newspapers; to wit, like one who had endeavored to make a square meal of custard pie.

It is of course difficult to go through life without reading the daily newspaper, but it is quite possible to do so without reading the Sunday edition, and, word of a temporarily relapsed magazine reader notwithstanding, it is remarkable how much may be added to the pleasures of living by dropping both the magazine and the Sunday newspapers.

Loss of a Big Pacific Liner.

The Pacific Mail Steamship Company's fine liner the Manchuria, went ashore on August 20th on the island of Oahu, on which island is situated Honolulu. She struck on the windward side of the island where the coast is unusually dangerous owing to almost continual on-shore wind and the heavy seas. The steamer went aground along nearly her full length and lies broadside to the mainland. She struck about 200 feet from the main shore, about half-past five in the morning, in the midst of a heavy rain storm. The passengers were landed without panic and without loss of life. The officers of the ship remained on board after landing the passengers. The Manchuria is a screw, steel steamer of nearly 14,000 tons, 600 feet long. She is one of the finest and largest ships in the Pacific. The Associated Press dispatch says that the captain "mistook another point of land for Makapuu Point." One of the officers is quoted in the dispatch as saying, "We saw land which we supposed was Makapuu Point and altered our course half a minute. Twenty-five minutes later we struck." The Associated Press goes on to say, "The Manchuria was driven considerably out of her course."

Condition of the Relief Fund.

The following facts and figures concerning the condition of the Relief Incorporation and the fund for its disposal will be found of interest:

The grand total subscribed for the relief of San Francisco throughout the world was approximately $9,400,000. The exact figures, because of duplications and unreliable data, can not at present be obtained. The amount $5,557,394.76 has been received. There is to be about $2,500,000 on deposit in New York; $1,000,000 in Washington; $500,000 in Boston; and $300,000 in Chicago.

The following committees have the direction of the relief funds: Finance and Publicity, D. Phelan, chairman; Bills and Demands, M. H. de la Cruz, chairman; Camps and Warehouses, Rudolph Sprague, chairman; Relief and Rehabilitation, F. W. Doherty, chairman; Lands and Buildings, Thomas Magee, chairman. Ernest P. Bicknell is the representative of the National Red Cross society.

Chairman F. W. Doherty considers that the work will not be complete for a year. On August 1st he said: "In addition to $3,600,000 actually on hand there is about $3,000,000 floating about the country in pledges and unpaid subscriptions. The fund for the purposes will thus require all the money actually on hand. Provision must be made for the work of relief and rehabilitation and the expense of conducting the work. The expenses of the camps will for three months be at least $50,000 a month; for the Board of Relief $25,000; for the care of sick in hospitals, $15,000; for the sewing centers, $5000; for rehabilitation and all at least $250,000.

"There are, of course, many other items. For the three months these expenses will be from $350,000 to $400,000 a month. There are 10,000 families in the camps. At only $100 each, $1,000,000 will be required for them."

Then there are claims for goods confiscated or as the result of the fire, which will be paid for by the relief funds when additional money subscribed is collected. Of the 10,145 claims for confiscated articles, aggregating $2,536,085.35, amounting to $1,193,816.51, have been approved for payment; 1273 claims, amounting to $591,307.97, are under investigation, while 446 claims, amounting to $810,000, have either been rejected, reduced or donated. In addition to the 1273 claims under investigation there are 911 claims, amounting to $127,896.75, that must also be considered. This brings the total number of claims passed on by the committee of five up to 2184, aggregating $719,204.72.

The rehabilitation committee of the relief corporation has issued a statement showing that up to August 15th it had granted $293,605.85 for relief of the average amount of $80 to each applicant. The report in detail is as follows:

Total number of applications, 4466; individuals presented, 12,266; number of applications for relief, 333; for employment, 26; for tools, 679; for household reestablishment, 1774; for business enterprise for special relief, 1305; number of cases referred to others, 395; refused, 229; withdrawn, 171; not followed up, 3582; amount spent for tools, $25,095.6; household re-establishment, $166,632.35; for business enterprises, $67,123.55; for special relief, $37,694.30; total disbursement, $293,605.85; amount to be repaid, $166,632.35; cured, $65,953.60; secured, $928.85; amount repaid, $3894.90; bank balance, $8748.03.

Thomas H. Williams, president of the California Jockey Club, has offered to the refugees of San Francisco the use of the extensive grounds and all the buildings at Ingleside track. About 10,000 persons could comfortably be housed there.

It has been decided that a large building capable of accommodating 1000 persons, should be erected on the almshouse tract immediately, and that temporary barracks go up in various parts of the city, and that the barracks shall be occupied by refugees until permanent homes for the latter can be built. It had also been that attractive homes of three or four rooms, costing 1,000 or less, would be built by the committee and the refugees on the installment plan. Apartment houses were also to be erected and rented for comparatively little money. But within the past week the committee was warned by Chairman Dohrmann that these plans were carried out the fund would disappear in ninety days, so these plans were abandoned. A recent editorial comment on the distribution of the fund has been kindly. The New York Post says: "It may fairly be stated that the thousands who gave to various relief funds may rest assured that their object was attained and that, broadly speaking, the people in the stricken city have not suffered for lack of food, shelter, or clothing; that there has been no waste; and that, as a result of generous assistance and the faithfulness of those in charge of a begging and thankless task, there is now available a sum—more than $5,000,000—for substantial and really constructive relief work."

McKee vs. National of Hartford.

Last week we printed some correspondence between the agents of the National Insurance Company of Hartford and the editor of the Argonaut, in which the agents, on August 4th, said:

"We desire to advise you forcibly that the National of Hartford did not deny liability on the McKee claim, did not adjuster in the employ of the National of Hartford nor did the firm of McNear & Wayman, as alleged. If suit has been brought, this office has been advised by the court of such action, and we are doing nothing other than what appeared in the Argonaut week."

Without any solicitation on our part, we have now received from Partridge & Long, the McKee attorneys, the following communication:

"Law offices of Partridge & Long, 100 California Street, San Francisco, August 27, 1906.

"Jerome A. Hart, Editor of 'The Argonaut.' Sir:—The Argonaut of August 25th, you published correspondence between the agents of the National Insurance Company and yourself, concerning the claim of the McKee estate against the company. We notice that the agents deny all knowledge of any suit against the National. They further claim that no one representing the company denied liability on the McKee claim.

The facts are as follows: After the fire, proof of loss was filed with the National by the McKees, and on May 9th, the loss was adjusted by Mr. E. P. Farnsworth, acting as adjuster under the direction of the then manager, Mr. George D. Dornin. Subsequently Mr. Dornin resigned the agency of the National, and Eastern representatives of the company took up the claim. We were advised by the McKees that the National repudiated the adjustment and claimed that the loss was due to back-firing. On July 11th, we wrote the National that unless the claim was paid on or before July 16th, suit would be brought against that company to recover the amount named in the policy. To this letter, the National made no reply, and on July 19th suit was brought by the McKees, as plaintiffs, against the National Fire Insurance Company, said suit being numbered 1310 in the Records of the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco. Summons was issued in this action, and on or about August 1st, the National mailed to the McKees, a check for $12,000, being the amount named in the policy. The action still stands of record against the National and is to this day, pending, no dismissal having been filed.

Very truly yours,
 Long & Partridge,
 Attorneys for McKees.

POLITICO-PERSONAL.

"It must be confessed," says the Newark (N. J.) News, "that the Root boom doesn't respond as readily to absent treatment as the Bryan boom did."

Congressman S. C. Smith, of Bakersfield, has been nominated for re-election by the Republican Congressional Convention of the Eighth District of California.

Congressman James McLachlan, of the Seventh District of California, has been nominated for re-election by a unanimous vote of the Republican convention in Los Angeles.

The battleship Louisiana is undergoing alterations at the navy yard at Norfolk, Va., and will be fitted out for the special mission of conveying President Roosevelt to Panama.

Senator La Follette is reported as saying that Bryan will be the next President unless Roosevelt can be prevailed upon to run, and that he thinks the latter consummation may be brought about.

Congressman Littlefield of Maine, who is opposed by organized labor, will be aided in his campaign by Speaker Cannon, Secretary Taft, and others, and, if successful, will return to Congress a national figure.

Henry Gassaway Davis, of West Virginia, in 1904 candidate for Vice-President on the Democratic ticket, is now nearly 83 years old, but is being seriously considered for nomination as Representative in Congress.

President Roosevelt's personal influence is scarcely perceptible in Arizona. His letter advising the territory to come in with New Mexico has not affected the almost unanimous desire there for single rather than joint statehood.

Idaho is promised as spirited a campaign as Georgia has just passed through. Senator Dubois has been renominated by the Democrats and anti-Mormonism has been made the keynote of the campaign. Attack and counter-attack has already begun.

Attorney-General Norris, of Nebraska, has been nominated by the Republican State Convention for United States Senator, defeating the veteran Omaha editor, Editor Rosewater. The convention committed the party to the direct primary method of nominating officers.

William Jennings Bryan did not meet President Fallieres in Paris, but did receive a courteous note from the Foreign Office, saying that the president regretted the fact that Mr. Bryan's stay was so short that it did not give M. Fallieres time to return from Rambouillet in order to receive such a distinguished citizen.

In connection with the talk of nominating William Travers Jerome for Governor of New York, the Evening Mail says: "Mr. Jerome has lost much of his old 'foolish popularity,' but there is at least one thing that has not been lost—a wholesome fear on the part of his enemies for the man Jerome on the public platform."

Representative Nicholas Longworth, of Ohio, visited the headquarters of the National Republican Campaign Committee in New York and deposited one dollar as his contribution to the campaign fund. He said that he was a candidate for re-election and expected that he would win. It is reported that he will be opposed by organized labor.

Senator Thomas C. Platt was asked to write personal reminiscences of politics, and when, in answer to his query if the stories were to be truthful, the solicitor replied with enthusiasm that they were, he said: "Come round about twenty-five years after I am dead. It might be safe and proper to do it then, but not now. By all means not now."

Hoke Smith, former Secretary of the Interior in the cabinet of President Cleveland, has won his fight for the nomination for Governor of Georgia. His opponents were Clark Howell, National Democratic Committeeman and editor of the Atlanta Constitution; Colonel J. H. Estill, editor and owner of the Savannah Morning News; Judge Richard B. Russell, formerly of the Superior Court, and Colonel James H. Smith, of Oglethorpe county, in north Georgia, about the only millionaire farmer in the state. The contest was a bitter one, the Atlanta Journal, supporting Smith, formerly its owner, and the Constitution, filling their columns with personal abuse of the opposing leader.

"The astute men who, for their own purposes, are pushing W. R. Hearst forward as a candidate for Governor of New York," says the New York Evening Post, "are enjoying their seeming success. The clever intriguers who first got hold of the rich young millionaire and induced him to make his plunge into journalism, had no idea of anything more than a local sensation. But presently they began to prick up their ears, as local success came. Having thrilled the slums of New York, why not move on to conquer a national notoriety? So the Hearst Trust flew at the highest game, and in 1904 actually attempted to buy in the presidency. It is really capitalizing a mere name, a myth. 'William Randolph Hearst'—it is only a sort of trademark. Concerning the real man, as little as possible is allowed to escape. His whereabouts no one seems to know. He glides in and out of the shadow like a stage conspirator. In Congress, he was scarcely seen; never spoke and seldom voted. His opinions are not known, nor the source of them. No one supposes that he even sees half the stuff that is published in his name. Yet it is this faint and elusive personality, this man who gives every sign of being a rich puppet in the hands of promoters using him for their own objects, who gives his name to the Trust."

William Pinckney Whyte, United States senator from Maryland, who has just passed his eighty-second milestone, has never been inside a saloon, never smoked and never rode in a cab. He framed the instrument on which the unique government of the District of Columbia is founded. Twice chosen United States senator, he has also been governor, mayor, state senator, state representative, city solicitor, attorney general and state comptroller. He was defeated for the United States senate by the late Arthur P. Gorman and then succeeded Gorman at the latter's death. He was a member of the Maryland legislature when Gorman was a lad in Howard county.

Prohibitionists of California held their State convention in Los Angeles last week and nominated the following ticket:

Governor, James H. Blanchard of Los Angeles; Lieutenant-Governor, C. N. Whitmore of Stanislaus county; Secretary of State, Alexander Beck of Watsonville; State Treasurer, Walter A. Vail, Palo Alto; Controller, A. B. Taynton; Attorney-General, J. B. McCaslin, Long Beach; Surveyor-General, J. H. Kendall, Modesto; Superintendent of Public Instruction, P. S. Meade, Oakland; State Printer, W. J. Phillips, Los Angeles; Clerk of the Supreme Court, W. P. Fassett; Representative in Congress, Seventh District, Levi D. Johnson. The platform declares for prohibition, suffrage for both sexes on equal terms, compulsory arbitration of labor disputes, government ownership, and election of President, Vice-President and United States Senators by direct vote of the people.

Bordentown, New Jersey, once kept distinguished company. The ex-King of Spain and Naples, Joseph Bonaparte, lived there for sixteen years upon a magnificent plantation called Pointe Breeze, now vanished from the world of real estate. Lake Villa is still standing, where Bonaparte's daughter dwelt with her husband, Prince Charles of Canino and Musignano, and Linden Hall is in good preservation, where another prince lived, Charles Lucian Murat, nephew of the Napoleons, whose wife taught boarding school in Bordentown.

The book-stalls of Paris are on the coping of the Seine embankment. Here is the place for odd volumes. Books in vellum covers dating back to Gutenberg's time abound, etchings of the Revolution and an olla podrida of the amazing literature of France.

The Bricklayers' Union of Los Angeles has just gained as a member Samuel M. Hendricks, 99 years old. Hendricks has been a contractor in that city for twenty years. One of his five children, a girl, was born only four years ago.

Iron ties are extensively used on the German railroads. They look successful. The roadbed is certainly excellent. They are hollow and the edges set well into the soil and ballast.

THE CURATE OF CUCUGNAN.

A Dreadful Tale of Purgatory and Paradise.

The Abbe Martin was Curate of Cucugnan. Kind hearted, good as gold, he had a father's love for his Cucugnans; if they had given him a little more satisfaction Cucugnan would have been a paradise on earth. But alas! spiders spun their webs in his confessional, and on Easter Sunday the holy bread remained untouched in the sacred vase. The good priest's heart was tortured, and he prayed God continually that he might not die before bringing back to the fold his whole flock.

Now you shall see that his prayers were heard. One Sunday, after reading the gospel, Monsieur Martin ascended the pulpit.

"My brethren," said he, "believe me if you will: the other night I found myself—I, a miserable sinner—at the gates of paradise. I knocked; Saint Peter opened the door.

"Ah! it is you, my good Monsieur Martin," said he; 'what can I do for you?'

"Good Saint Peter, you who keep the Book and the Key, tell me (if I am not too curious) how many Cucugnans you have in paradise?"

"I can refuse you nothing, Monsieur Martin; be seated—we will see."

"And Saint Peter took his big book, opened it, and put on his spectacles:

"Let us see: Cucugnan, did you say? Cu-Cu-Cucugnan. Here we are. Cucugnan. My dear Monsieur Martin, the page is quite white. Not a soul—No more Cucugnans here than there are fish-bones in a turkey."

"What! None here from Cucugnan? Not one? Impossible! Look again, please."

"Nobody, reverend sir. Look for yourself, if you think I am jesting."

"And I, miserable I! with clasped hands, cried for pardon. Then said St. Peter:

"My dear Monsieur Martin, don't put yourself in such a state; it may do you harm. After all, it is not your fault. Don't you see, your Cucugnans must doubtless endure their short quarantine in purgatory."

"Ah! for pity's sake, great Saint Peter! let me at least see them—see and console them."

"Willingly, my friend. Here quick, put on these sandals, for the roads are not good. There, that's right. Now go on straight before you, always straight ahead. Do you see way down there where the road turns? You will find a silver door at your right hand, ornamented with black crosses. Knock, and they will open to you. Adieu! Take care of yourself and keep a stout heart."

"And I went on and on. What a path! I tremble to think of it. A narrow way, full of brambles, shining black beetles, and hissing serpents, led me to the silver door.

"Who knocks?" said a hoarse voice.

"The Curate of Cucugnan."

"Of what?"

"Of Cucugnan."

"Ah! Come in."

"I entered. A tall, beautiful angel, with wings dark as night, with garments shining as the day, and with a diamond key hanging from his belt, was writing in a large book—larger than Saint Peter's.

"Well, what do you want and what do you ask for?" said the angel.

"Beautiful angel of God, I want to know—I am very curious, perhaps—but have you any Cucugnans here?"

"Any—"

"Any Cucugnans; any people from Cucugnan. I am their pastor."

"Ah! Father Martin, is it not?"

"At your service, Sir Angel."

"You say Cucugnan?"

"And the angel opens his big book, wetting his finger to turn the leaves.

"Cucugnan," said he, heaving a long sigh; 'Monsieur Martin, we've no one in purgatory from Cucugnan.'

"Heavens! no one here from Cucugnan? Great Heavens! Where are they then?"

"Ah! holy man, they are in paradise. Where the devil do you suppose they are?"

"But I've just come from paradise."

"You've just come from there! Well?"

"Well, they are not there! Ah! good mother of angels!"

"What could you expect, my dear sir? If they are neither in paradise nor in purgatory, there is no help for it, they are—"

"Holy cross! is it possible? Can it be that Saint Peter has told me a falsehood? However, I have not heard the cock crow! Ah! poor me! How can I go to paradise, if my Cucugnans are not there?"

"Listen, my poor Monsieur Martin, since you are determined, cost what it may, to be sure of all this and to see with your own eyes, take this path, go straight ahead, running if you know how to run. Once there, you will know all. 'Tis the hand of God.'

"And the angel shut the door.

"It was a long path, strewn with red-hot coals. I reeled like a drunkard; stumbled at each step; I was dripping with perspiration, and panting with thirst. But, thanks to the sandals which good Saint Peter had lent me, I did not burn my feet. After much stumbling and tribulation, I saw at my left hand a door—no, a portal, an enormous portal, wide open, like the mouth of a great oven. Oh! my children, what a spectacle. No one asks your name there—no register—they go in just as you, my brethren, go into the tavern on Sundays.

"Great beads of perspiration stood on my brow, and yet I shivered with cold. My hair stood on end. The air had a burned smell, like roasted flesh—somewhat like the odor spread about in our Cucugnan, when Eloy, the blacksmith, burns the hoof of an old donkey, in order to shoe it. I lost my breath in the sickening, stifling atmosphere. I could hear a horrible clamor of sighs, howls, and groans.

"A horned demon called out: 'Are you coming in, you?' at the same time giving me a prick with his pitchfork.

"I? I am not coming in. I am one of God's people!"

"You are one of God's people? Then what do you want here?"

"I come—ah! don't speak to me, I can scarcely stand—I come—I come from a distance—humbly to ask you—if—if by chance—you might not have here—anybody—anybody from Cucugnan?"

"Ah! fire of God! why make yourself out such a fool, as if you did not know that all Cucugnan is here. Here, you blackbird, look and see how we treat your famous Cucugnans."

"And I saw in the midst of a frightful whirlpool of flames, Long Coq-Galine—you all knew him, my brethren—Coq-Galine, who got drunk so often, and beat his poor Clairon. I saw Catarinet—that little vagabond, with her nose in the air—you remember her well enough. But let that pass—I've said enough. I saw Pascal Doigh-de-Pois, who used to make his oil with the olives of M. Julien. I saw Babet the gleaner, who, in order to have her own sheaf made up quickly, took here and there a handful from other gleaners. I saw Maitre Crapasi, who oiled the wheel of his barrow so well; and Dauphine, who sold his well-water so dear; and Tortillard, who, when he met me carrying the host, went on his way, removing neither cap nor pipe, as though he had met a dog; and I saw Coulan, with his Zette, and Jacques, and Pierre, and Toni."

White with fear, the audience groaned, as they recognized—this one a father, that one a mother, brother, or sister.

"You see, my brethren," continued the curate, "you see, this can not continue. I have charge of your souls, and I must, I will save you from the abyss into which you are about to fall headlong. Tomorrow I shall begin the work, no later than tomorrow; and there'll be no lack of work. This is how I shall perform it. To be well done, all must be done in order. We'll proceed in rows, as they do at Jonquiere's when they dance. Tomorrow, Monday, I will confess the old men and women. That won't be much. Tuesday, the children. I shall soon get through with them. Wednesday, the young men and women. That may be a long affair. Thursday, the men. We will cut them short. Friday, the women. I'll say: 'No wandering from the subject.' Saturday, the miller—a whole day is not too much for him alone. And if by Sunday we have finished, we'll have reason to be thankful."

"You see, my children, when the wheat is ripe it must be cut; when the wine is drawn, it must be drunk. We've dirty linen enough—the question now is to wash it, and may it be well washed. Grace be with you. Amen."

What was said was done. They worked hard. Ever since that memorable Sunday the air is perfumed for ten leagues around by the virtues of Cucugnan.

And the good pastor, Monsieur Martin, dreamed the other night that he was climbing the starry way to the city of God, followed by his whole flock, in a splendid procession, surrounded by lighted candles, clouds of incense, and choir-boys chanting the Te Deum.

So ends the story of the Curate of Cucugnan.

—Translated for the Argonaut from the French of Alphonse Daudet.

The cotton spinners of Lancashire, England, raised a commission of experts to visit all the cotton-growing lands of the world and investigate the industry. Their report has been made, and it is to the effect that the United States must continue the source of the main supply. Egypt is proving as much of a disappointment as India as a cotton country, and it is generally agreed that our Southern States will lead in this important industry for many years to come.

A ROYAL MOTOR-CAR COMMISSION

English Opinion of Reforms Necessary to Quiet Public Feeling.

What is declared by one of the London papers "one of the most sensible, judicial, and practical" comments ever issued by a Royal Commission," has been made public in England. It is a report covering a thorough inquiry into the various questions connected with the use and abuse of what Americans call "mobiles" and Europeans term "motor-cars," a commission, which worked under the auspices of the Government, included such eminent persons as Lord Selkirk, E. R. Henry, chief commissioner of police, and Mr. Munro of the Home Office. Comprehensive as this report is not bulky, covering only forty large pages. The London Daily Chronicle says of it:

The report of the Royal Commission on Motor-cars ought to have as large a circulation as a popular treatise. It costs only ninepence, and there is hardly any subject so important to the public as the relations between the motorist and the public, which it does not most ably discuss, or on which, in most cases, it does not present the essential facts. Its appendix on foreign regulations, by Captain Bigham, its secretary, is alone worth the price of the book.

There is in England a law making the speed of motor-cars twenty miles an hour, and the commission recommends that this be abolished, offering arguments which are inferred from this paragraph:

The enforcement of the twenty-mile limit instead of the present law, are not, in fact, endangering the public. The object of the law should be not to restrict speed, because it is speed, but because and where it is dangerous or otherwise injurious to the public.

It is simply proposed that motorists in future should be charged with driving "to the common danger." It is believed, will commend itself to the public. The law may be better protected than before, and also the motorists save those of the "road-hog" variety. Some of the lesser recommendations are:

A twelve-mile speed limit in towns, villages, and dangerous places.

Stopping in case of accident or damage to be severely enforced.

Smoke and excessive noise to be offenses.

Increased taxation of motor-cars on a graduated scale is recommended, with a maximum charge of eight pence a year, and this provision is criticised, one editor suggesting a guinea extra for each horse-power represented above ten. The use of the money raised by these taxes is discussed with notable fairness:

It is recommended that the sums be handed over to a central department to be appropriated by it in aid of local cost, not of ordinary road repair, but in the construction of more durable and less dusty roads, and in the improvement of the main arteries of traffic.

The proposed new law will be urged in Parliament next year and no little interest may be anticipated from the view of the prospects outlined by the Chronicle:

Mr. Burns, in whose hands this will be, will certainly attach great weight to such a report as this, and a government certainly act without either favor or fear, and without any owners (who have increased by 80 per cent. in the last months!) may reasonably hope to be placed before the law on the same footing as other citizens, and be liable to punishment when they offend, not a fancy disability, conceived in error and enforced with prejudice, but against the rights of their fellow-citizens.

Motor-car owners, however, share a public opinion which the Pall Mall Gazette shows has been expressed in another line of engine-driven vehicles:

The extent to which the motor-bus has multiplied in the London streets is shown with startling clearness in the new official returns. All the ordinary motor-cars and motor-cycles put together produced 1,141 accidents in May and June, of which 347 led to personal injury and eight proved fatal. The motor-bus caused 790 accidents, of which 142 involved personal injury, and five had fatal results. The motor-bus has thus made a huge addition to the number of casualties, and one which, in proportion to the number of vehicles, must be called simply intolerable. There were 1,141 heavy motor vehicles in London on June 1 (including motor-cars as well as motor-buses), and the numbers given show that every individual motor-bus is involved in an accident more than six times a year upon the average.

EARTHQUAKE LOSSES NOT GENERAL.

Damage Exaggerated in the East—Insurance Man on Adjustments.

Nearly three columns in a recent issue of the Springfield (Mass.) Republican are given up to an interview with the general agent of an English insurance company who came from the East to San Francisco, arriving on Apr. 26, and who has returned home. It may be said that the Republican is one of the most respected and most widely circulated of New England newspapers, and that add to the satisfaction with which Mr. Medlicott's statements will be received by those who are qualified to judge. The opinions of the insurance man and some of his striking descriptions are quoted from the interview:

"I have the greatest admiration for the spirit of the people of San Francisco, and the fullest confidence in the future of the city," remarks William B. Medlicott, of Longmeadow, general agent of the eastern United States department of the Atlas Assurance Company of London, fresh from the experiences of a three months' stay amidst the wreckage of the shattered city. Mr. Medlicott, as representative of a company whose losses in San Francisco total over $5,000,000, and as member of a committee of five, the court of last resort when disputes against the "dollar for dollar" companies are concerned, was in a position to observe the situation in the ruined city, especially as regards fire insurance, and he has arrived at some very definite conclusions. One of these confirms the contention of President A. W. Dunn, of the Springfield Fire and Marine Insurance Company, who said that 10 years will have to pass before the stricken city recovers. Mr. Medlicott divides the 10 years into at least 15, and possibly 20. One assertion he makes, which will be news to many here, and that is that the reports of earthquake damage in the newspapers have been greatly overdrawn in almost every case. The officials of the better class of insurance companies, says he, believe that the earthquake was responsible for an actual loss of not over $10,000,000, and are going ahead according to that belief. The misunderstandings that have arisen between the insured and the foreign insurance companies, he finds, are due to the fact that the English and German officials have formed faulty opinions from the newspapers, and are unable to realize that it was the fire that did practically all the damage.

"Lost of us," said he, "have kept steadily in view, when investigating at San Francisco, the desire to know the truth, no matter where it leads, and even if it is entirely to the disadvantage of our companies. Some of the companies, of course, are taking every advantage they can, but they are losing by it. Already the companies which are settling their losses in a spirit of honesty are overwhelmed with applications for insurance. The dishonest companies have cut off their noses to spite their faces and they are beginning to realize what they have done to harm their future prospects throughout California and the West." The reinsurance situation, says Mr. Medlicott, is badly tangled up, and, as a result of the quarrels and misunderstandings arising from this condition the future will see comparatively little reinsuring done in San Francisco. Mr. Medlicott's ideas concerning the "heavenly Chinese" have undergone a great change. "I found the Chinese so honest in their statements as to their losses that not a single dispute arose over one of the Chinese claim. Not even in a case where a Chinaman carried over $200,000 insurance was there the slightest attempt to dispute the Chinaman's statements. On the contrary, he found that the Japanese are 'utterly unreliable' and full of trickery." In fact, he states that in San Francisco the Chinese are not so hated as eastern people believe, but that no Californian "has any use" for Jap.

In discussing the building situation at San Francisco, Mr. Medlicott said: "The most serious obstacle is the labor unions. San Francisco before the 'quake' was overruled by the labor people and is hampered by them now. The prices for labor of all kinds are simply awful, carpenters getting $8 a day and other workmen in proportion. In fact, many wealthy men feel that they can not afford to build because of the prices of labor. Structural steel is coming in very slowly and stone is scarce. Brick can be obtained rather easily, but reinforced concrete is to be the material. Lots of it is being used and still greater quantities will be consumed in the future. Lumber is fairly plentiful, the forests of Oregon and upper California supplying abundance of redwood timber. There is yet practically no building going on, for the temporary one and two-story structures don't afford considerable repair work on the steel-frame buildings, which were only gutted by the flames, is going on, but hardly any absolutely new permanent buildings are being erected. The exodus has apparently ended.

"Probably to no other influence is so much of the confusion that has arisen due as to the incorrect and grossly misleading reports that were circulated by the press all over the world as to the damage directly caused by the earthquake. There is before me a collection made by a news bureau of cuttings from eastern papers. I am safe in saying that not one in ten of them has any foundation in fact. Bad as the earthquake was and startling as are the evidences of its work that still remain, it was directly accountable for but a very small percentage of the fearful loss that has fallen upon San Francisco. I have talked with many old and conservative men who are in a position to judge as clearly as any one can, and the maximum figure given for the direct earthquake damage to property is $10,000,000 in the entire city. When we compare this with the fire waste that was probably fully 50 times as large, it shows why the San Francisco people so bitterly resent the placing of the earthquake before the fire in importance in the treatment of the losses. Of course if there had been no earthquake there might have been no fire; probably there would not have been. Certainly there is little likelihood that but for the seismic disturbance there would have been the 30 or more fires all at once. Nor would there have been the wreckage of the water supply system and consequent lack of fire-fighting facilities. Still, Chicago, Boston, Baltimore, all burned without an earthquake, and while we all believe the 'temblor' was the cause of the fire, we can not in any specific instance prove it. To a number of the stronger companies, therefore, it has appeared from the first that we must regard the earthquake effects as specific and not general in their relation to our fire insurance contracts. This last phrase can not be too strongly borne in mind in order to look at the situation justly.

"The difficulty for many of the insurance companies to regard it in this way is, as already mentioned, largely due to the erroneous impressions given home office officials by the early newspaper reports. One after another presidents and managers from the East and from England have visited the scene. I have talked with most of them, and all say the same thing. 'We understood the damage from earthquake was far greater than we now believe it to be.' We who have been on the ground from the first have realized this more and more. And one by one the companies are accepting it.

"On the other hand, there are still many companies that take the ground that the earthquake was the cause of all the loss; that conditions existed that no fire insurance policy was intended to protect against and that, in fact, to use a simple illustration, a part, at least, of each policy was shaken off by the 'quake.' To those of us first mentioned, this view appears wholly untenable and lacking in honor. Then there are others with a clause in their policies specially mentioning earthquakes and absolving the companies from any loss caused directly or indirectly from this cause. The burden of proof will be on them to show that any particular fire was caused by the 'quake.' Perhaps they can and perhaps they can not bring proof to connect the first and last conditions described. Again there are companies that are fighting for very existence, and, unfortunately, are ready to place salvages above honor. There are those, too, who regard the misfortune and need of the people as a just ground for advantageous trade and, like the 'three-ball' banking institutions, the greater the need the greater the discount.

"Our own scrap-book, or 'dope sheet,' as the boys call it, is beside me on my desk. It covers reports on 510 city blocks, and in some cases photographs accompany the reports. Some of these were taken during the period between the quake and the fire. Of course, valuable as such information is, the physical condition of most of the people during the three days of terror during the fire was such that much of the data is unreliable. There were, considering the conditions, a surprising number of photographs taken by the ever present camera fiends. As an illustration of the values that some of them put on their efforts, we were recently advised of a certain negative of a picture taken of a large plant where we were very heavily interested. A friend of the photographer called on us, told us what he had, described how the owner of the buildings in question was using every effort to get possession of the negative and all prints. Later he came in with what purported to be a small reproduction. His price, he stated, was $15,000. We did not trade. Later a detective was put on his trail to find out who he was.

"Occasionally in this mad scramble to secure what they think is a saving, the so-called 'six-bit' or 75-per cent companies, overreach themselves. Only this week I have dealt with two cases where certain companies boasted of their having taken up their policies for 75 per cent and 90 per cent of their faces on a certain loss that was in the hands of a committee for adjustment. Had they waited for the final settlement they would be better off today. There is too much rush, too little adjusting, too hasty settling. In our own case we were one of the first to be in shape to take up adjustments, and now have but few claims unadjusted aside from those which are in the hands of committees. The final winding up of them will be a long process.

"As to this stricken city there is so much in the papers that it must be an old story. I can only say that one who has not seen it and lived in it and been a part of its reconstructive conditions can never realize the immensity of the calamity. The first days of my sojourn there were days of no street cars, no lights other than tallow candles, no telephones, no water, of cooking done in the streets and soldiers patrolling with muskets on shoulders everywhere. I can say, though, that for quiet orderliness nothing more could be desired. The closing of the saloons doubtless contributed mainly to this. Every evening we have taken long walks, often for miles along the streets of the burned area, almost deserted, absolutely still. The weirdness of the scene, especially by moonlight, can never be forgotten. Everything that man had produced was utterly laid waste. Gradually the scene is changing. The one-story frame stores are rising everywhere among the ruins, the debris of brick and twisted iron is being removed and everywhere the confident, hopeful nature of the inhabitants is expressing itself."

Each in His Own Tongue.

Of poems published within the last fifteen years (says the Critic), three or four have at once become popular—none of them more so than "Each in His Own Tongue" by William Hubert Carruth, Professor of Germanic Languages in the University of Kansas. About this poem Mr. Carruth has received scores of letters from all parts of the world—some protesting, others lauding. With all its radicalism the poem seems to have found special favor with the Episcopalians. It has been quoted entire in a sermon in Westminster Abbey; also at Yale by Dr. Rainsford when addressing the undergraduates:

A fire mist and a planet,
A crystal and a cell.
A jelly-fish and a saurian,
And a cave where the cave-meu dwell;
Then a sense of law and beauty,
A face turned from the clod—
Some call it Evolution
And others call it God.

A haze on the fair horizon,
The infinite, tender sky,
The ripe, rich tint of the corn-fields,
And the wild geese sailing high—
And all over upland and lowland
The sign of the golden-rod—
Some of us call it Autumn
And others call it God.

Like tides on a crescent sea-beach,
When the moon is new and thin,
Into our hearts high yearnings
Come welling and surging in—
Come from the mystic ocean,
Whose rim our foot has trod—
Some of us call it Louging
And others call it God.

A picket frozen on duty,
A mother starved for her brood,
Socrates drinking the hemlock,
And Jesus on the rood;
And millions who, humble and nameless,
The straight, hard pathway trod—
Some call it Consecration
And others call it God.

At Tallulah Falls, Georgia, Louis Borris Magid, a German by birth, an Italian by descent and an American by choice and adoption, owns 3,500 acres of land, on which he has planted more than 200,000 mulberry trees, which are now from three to five years old and which are designed for the feeding of millions of silk worms. Mr. Magid has proved that silk can be produced as cheaply in America as in any other country and that the $100,000,000 or more expended annually for foreign silks might just as well be kept at home.

Many Filipino students, who come here at the expense of the Government to learn American ways for doing things, locate in New Orleans to give their attention chiefly to Louisiana, Mississippi and other Southern States where sugar, rice, tobacco, cotton and other crops suited to the Archipelago are grown extensively.

In Portland, Oregon, work is about to begin on tearing up the streets to put electric light and power, telegraph and telephone wires underground. The corporations interested will spend $500,000 carrying out the plans.

SKETCHES OF CALIFORNIA SPORT.

J. Parker Whitney Tells of Early Days with Rod and Gun on the Pacific Coast.

Those who hunt or fish and find unmeasured joy in the fields, the woods and streams, as well as in the excitement of the chase, may read entertaining records of such experiences in "Reminiscences of a Sportsman," by J. Parker Whitney. The book is, in fact, a collection of sketches contributed at various times to a sportsman's review, but, when brought together, the papers have an added interest in successive glimpses of a long and busy life which has held much more than sport. Mr. Whitney came to California when a boy and is still a resident of the State; he gained much of his fortune here, and now, at the age of seventy, he writes at his ease of his adventures with rod and gun, and incidentally of his travels over all of North America and Europe.

Mr. Whitney arrived in San Francisco in 1852, coming from New England in a passage of 142 days around Cape Horn, and landed with only ten cents in his pocket, but the sportsman of seventeen had his double-barrelled shotgun, revolver and double-edged hunting-knife, and was not dismayed:

Penniless though I was, my heart was most courageous. Was not the world my oyster, as with ancient Pistol, and could I not open it with my sword blade? My three elder brothers had preceded me in 1848 and 1849 to California, and two were engaged in San Francisco in profitable business, and I had pressing invitations to join them, but I had no taste for it. Had I not my gun, and could I not have more fun to my liking in the country? Besides, I had visions of lumps of gold said to be lying about at the mines, and hearing that near Auburn, in Placer county, over one hundred and fifty miles north of San Francisco, miners were making great pay, I went up there. How I got to Sacramento, which was en route, up the bay one hundred miles distant, I can not remember, but I do vividly remember that I walked up the distance of forty miles to the mines, and back to Sacramento again. The game I killed gave me welcome for meals and lodgings; welcome with the miners was more hearty in those days, when the professional tramp was unknown.

The sportsman's eye must be keen, and on that walk to the mines Mr. Whitney saw and grasped possibilities that others may have seen but failed to take advantage of:

The country beyond Sacramento to the placer mines of Auburn was the most attractive I had ever or have since seen, comprising valleys and moderate hills grown over with groups of live and white oaks, inhabited by quantities of magpies, robins, larks and other small birds. Beneath the trees were many quails and hares, with antelopes to be seen in the distance. It was mid-winter, yet the weather was bright and warm, and the temperature seldom fell to freezing. How trivial are the incidents which oftentimes become important in our after lives! The casual observation of a fellow foot-traveler who walked on with me for a while, that it was an ideal sheep region, gave a color to my thoughts, which half a dozen years afterward matured in my mind to the commencement of an industry there in which I engaged.

Arrived at the mines, the youthful prospector soon learned that the anticipated discovery of nuggets in profusion was a dream not to be realized, and he returned to San Francisco:

Here I again declined opportunities for business, and frequenting the markets and game stalls more or less, which interested me more than anything else,

I saw that game and birds, though plentiful, were fetching large prices.

Obtaining particulars of the sources of supply, I concluded that the situation was very favorable for adventures to my liking. Small table birds, quail, larks, snipe, robins, etc., were selling at five and six dollars per dozen retail: venison, sixty and seventy-five cents per pound; turkeys, ten dollars; chickens, three dollars; eggs, three dollars per dozen; butter, one dollar per pound. Here was my opportunity. I learned that the Santa Clara Valley, at the south end of the bay of San Francisco, was one grand field of birds, and that I could obtain three dollars per dozen for any kind.

Before engaging in his cherished pursuit of game, however, he saw an opportunity in trade which he felt that he could not afford to miss:

One day I saw on a freshly arrived ship from China a lot of canary birds, several hundred in a large cage on the cabin deck, which interested me, and which I found belonged to the captain of the ship, who had brought them over on a personal speculation, and that he had a lot of nested cages of bamboo to fit them out with for selling. I thought this a favorable opportunity for some work on my part, which ended in my purchase of the lot, birds and cages, for a thousand dollars, which gave the captain a good profit. I did not have enough to pay down for the lot, but easily arranged with the rotund navigator to pay down what money I had and the balance in installments, as I should take the birds away.

I then set at work putting up the cages on the deck, with a bird in each, and, with some assistance, carried the cages with birds to different stores I had arranged with, where they were exposed for sale, and being the first lot of this character to arrive in that budding city, my expectations were fully realized by rapid sales at full prices, and, although I shared liberally with the shop sellers, I considerably increased my capital.

Next, he put in operation his plan of hunting for the market:

My eldest brother, who was much opposed to my absurd scheme, as he termed it, and annoyed at my refusal to engage with him in business, learning of my proposed departure, made his appearance at the wharf just about as the boat pulled out, and vainly besought me to desist, which I positively refused, and also the pecuniary aid he proffered. As the boat passed from the wharf I stepped upon it, and my brother, as a dernier, tossed a twenty-dollar gold piece at my feet, which I promptly threw back at his own, and bid him adieu.

At Alviso, where I arrived before dark, I had no difficulty in getting credit for a good lay-in of powder, shot and percussion caps, the latter then being in use for the muzzle-loaders in vogue, and in the latter respect I was equipped with my much-treasured double-barrelled companion, which that night I placed for safe-keeping under my pillow when I retired. I pushed on two or three miles from the village to a farmhouse, plentifully surrounded by wild-mustard fields, where birds seemed plentiful. Here I engaged board and lodgings at eight dollars per week.

The following morning at daylight I was in the fields, and early in the afternoon had about three dozen assorted birds which, tagged, went off that day to my market customer. This pastime I followed for several weeks, and although I did not average my first day's shooting, I rolled up a pretty fair profit over my expenses.

After the excitement and wearing exercise of the shooting trips, the young hunter had to walk two or three miles with his game to the boat and then return home, and the work became something more than pleasure. Then came an opportunity for an agreeable change:

One day a man came along bleeding from a broken head, leading a spirited mustang stallion, which had thrown him, and offered to sell it, with the ordinary Mexican saddle and bridle, for $25. I had in view the joining of a small party of hunters who were killing deer and elk in the neighboring mountains for the San Francisco market, so I purchased the horse, and in a few days joined the mountain party, which consisted of four, my interest being one-half that allowed to the other hunters, and took up my abode with them at an open encampment in the mountain hills back of the San Jose Mission.

This party consisted of a German, a well-educated young Englishman, and two Americans. The latter were both from the State of New Hampshire, and one of them, Bennet, was a remarkably good and successful shot, very muscular, and noted for his adventures with and killing of grizzly bears. The latter were quite plentiful then in mountain regions about the Santa Clara Valley, in a region now taken up wholly by settlements, from which the grizzlies have been pretty effectually eliminated.

In the early days grizzlies were very plentiful about the valleys of the State, and John Bidwell, an early settler in the Sacramento Valley, gives frequent mention of them in his diary, lately published, and of seeing often from eight to ten in a single day. It was not uncommon in those early days to see large bands of elk frequently, and deer were so plentiful as to occasion cessation at times from shooting by the party I accompanied, from inability to transport to Alviso, the shipping station to San Francisco.

Roping a grizzly was one of the exciting incidents of hunting or stock-raising life at that time:

It was quite common in the earlier days of California for the Mexican riders, fearless and expert in the casting of the lariat, to surround a grizzly bear found in the open, and to hold him secure by numerous lines kept taut. Despite the enraged and frantic efforts of the bear, he became powerless while held by so many lariats straining in various directions from the pomells of well-enchained saddles, directed by the intelligent mustangs and their riders. When exhausted, the bear was despatched with a few shots or dragged to some stockade for a future bull and bear fight—a sport common in early days.

Annual hare coursing meets are held in Waterloo, England, and Mr. Whitney declares, after attending one of the meetings, that the prize-winning greyhounds there do not excel those of California breeding. He gives this description of coursing on a country estate:

Having a large grain field of several thousand acres on my place, enclosed about by a fence twelve miles in extent, where the land is pretty level, but rising on two sides moderately toward the center, and where the opportunity of witnessing coursing is excellent, has led me to make many coursing excursions upon it, extending over a series of years. The plan followed is for the participators to pass in carriage or mounted along one of the roads, flanked upon each side, well at the head, by a man with a couple of greyhounds in leash. The dogs are alert and eager, with pricked-up ears and quick-turning heads, scanning about them for sight of hare. Their impetuosity is difficult to restrain, and no feeble or inexperienced hand should manage the slips, from which, collared, the dogs may break away together, or be too hastily freed.

A hare bounds suddenly at one side, from its form, and the nearest couple of dogs is instantly freed, and go off like arrows in pursuit. Perhaps the hare has a good start—five or six hundred feet—and goes off in that bounding manner usual when disturbed by shepherd or farmers' dogs, a common occurrence, not enough to cause alarm, or even to give a dropping of the ears, which ply with emotion. Interim those arrow-like forms are nearly approaching and are coming on with before-unknown speed, and the hare, warned by its projecting eyes, like that of the frog, which turn to the rear, doubles its exertions with desperate efforts. But all in vain. The approach is faster than the running speed of man if the hare was still. When seizure is about to take place—for it seldom that one dog makes it on first run—the hare, nimble in the art of doubling, turns from his course, to right or left, while the leading pursuer, impelled by the impetus of his great speed, is carried on ahead, giving the hare a gain in distance. Herein comes the play of the second dog, one of which is likely to be in the rear, who takes the lead in pursuit. The first has gained a point in turning the hare, and may perhaps make the kill, or cure all the points from his superior and there may be a dozen of hare dolings before the kill.

In spite of his life-long experience with the gun in field and cover, from the moose runs of northern forests to the buffalo-feeding grounds once found on the great plains, Mr. Whitney acknowledges that he prefers fishing shooting. His account of Pacific Coast sport with rod and line is graphic, scientific as well, as it is conceded sporting authorities that he was first to the field to tell of the attractions sportsmen here, in mountain streams and in the open sea:

In 1892, in the month of June, while at Monterey on the California coast, about a hundred miles south of San Francisco, and visiting the hauls of the marine fishermen, as brought in principally by Italians and Portuguese, I was interested in observing more or less salt brought in, which had been taken with baited hooks on strong cotton lines. This interested me so much that I accompanied some of the boats which left at an early daylight hour, and a school of salmon had come into the bay, I saw a number of them taken, which was a revelation to me. The fishermen were on hand for any edible fish which might come along, sinking, trolling, as the case might be, for bluefish, barracuda, and flounders, for mackerel, sea bass, or salmon. The fishing was entirely with cotton lines, using small fresh fish for bait, which abounded in plentifulness.

I was strongly affected in contemplation of the field before me, and will give an account of my experiences in a remarkable arena, where the sportsman's king of fishes, the salmon, is taken in full vigor in the open, lustrous and eager in the pursuit of natural food, undiminished by the stinence and confinement incidental to river pool life, at the commencement of the long fast which ordinarily terminates its existence.

Aside from the sport in which Mr. Whitney has found such pleasure, he gives notes of his extensive travels, his mingling and acquaintance with many eminent men, his services as commissioner for Colorado at the Paris Exposition of 1867, and many unique experiences on land and sea.

What is said to be the largest amount of duty ever paid in a lump at the San Francisco Custom-house was paid a few days ago. The sum was $1,000.80, and it was the duty on sugar brought from the Philippines by the Sutherland. There were 147,000 lbs of the sugar, consigned to the Western Sugar Refining Company.

Frank J. Baker, civil engineer and surveyor, has a complete set of duplicates of the records and diagrams which were destroyed in the City Engineer's office at the time of the great fire, and wishes to sell them to San Francisco for $100,000. The records extend from 1822 to the present time.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Jack London is said to be one of a number of Socialists in Alameda who have incorporated a publishing company with a capital stock of $10,000, half of which has been subscribed.

Edward M. Ellis, a grandson of Red Cloud, the famous Sioux chief, is one of the young Indians educated at the Carlisle Indian School in Pennsylvania who have become recruits for the navy.

Lord Charles Beresford has sent a telegram to the press saying that the rumor published in a London morning paper of his impending resignation of the command of the Mediterranean fleet is absolutely untrue.

The Pope is said to be much troubled by gout, in almost constant pain, and is very much depressed. He has not the iron will power of Leo XIII, and feels the matter of being compelled to remain in the Vatican very keenly.

Charles Dana Gibson is seeking a studio in Paris, after a tour of the great art galleries of Italy and Spain. He acknowledged being a sufferer from rheumatism and would have returned to America but for the persuasion of friends.

King Edward is said to be in ill health and is now due for his annual visit to Weymouth. The king seems to have had a strong constitution, and though he is not now living to his mother's age—he is 65 this fall—he is probably good for several years yet.

Miss May Sutton has returned from England and is at Newport. She says she had a good time abroad even if she did lose the international tennis championship to Miss Douglass, and would like to have another try next year against the new champion.

Paul Philipoteau is remembered as the artist who painted the panorama of the battle of Gettysburg, long on exhibition in several cities. A few days ago the famous picture turned up at Shoshone, Idaho, but not on exhibition. It had been cut into strips and was used as a restaurant tent at the opening of the Shoshone reservation.

Miss Nadage Doree has sued William Loeb, Jr., secretary to the President, for false imprisonment. Loeb says it is a mistake; he had nothing to do with her unlawful incarceration. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch remarks that had Miss Doree been wise she would have taken the sure route to reach Loeb. She would have brought an action against the President himself. Then we should all have known that Loeb did it.

Lord Walsingham, who is not only an entomologist of renown and a member of many learned societies, but an enthusiastic sportsman, has just celebrated his sixty-third birthday. Merton Hall, Lord Walsingham's seat in Norfolk, is a well-known sporting property; but a quite different interest attaches to it as being the place where the babes in the wood were really done to death by a wicked uncle.

Sir Henry Hozier, who has just retired after thirty-two years' service as secretary of Lloyd's, said not long ago that the blackest day he could remember was in October, 1881, when 108 vessels were posted as lost in twelve hours. Colonel Hozier is a Scotchman and started his career in the artillery, subsequently exchanging into the life guards. He was a war correspondent throughout Prussia's campaigns with Austria and France, nearly losing his life in the former campaign by a spent bullet.

A cable to the Sun from Constantinople says the Sultan is suffering seriously from Bright's disease. The Sultan is usually succeeded by his eldest surviving brother. The nominal heir now is Mohammed Reschad, who is in his sixty-second year and is two years younger than the Sultan. He has lived obscurely, to which fact he probably owes his life. Other candidates supported by the palace clique include the Sultan's eldest son, Mohammed Selim, who is 36 years of age.

CURRENT VERSE.

A Prophecy Fulfilled.

(Verses on Dreyfus first published in 1898.)

Not in the cloudy mountain-top.
Majestic and alone,
Truth lifts her ponderous scepter up
And rears her awful throne;
But in the crowded market-place
And in the prison-pen—
Her judgment-seat is on the street
And in the haunts of men.

She hales the mighty to her bar.
She bids the low arise,
For craft and power are all in vain
To blind her piercing eyes.
Before her still and serious gaze
The haughty take affright;
Their lust and lore and golden store
Are ashes in her sight.

She watched them mass their frowning troops, and fling their banners high;
She saw them brand the innocent
And cast him out to die.
They stripped the buttons from his coat.
They marched him round to view,
And swiftly broke with ringing stroke
His sword and spirit too.

And only she of all the throng
That watched his sore disgrace
Let fall a pitying tear to match
The anguish of his face.
From loneliness to loneliness
His barren pathway led,
And none may know the stifled woe
That shook the prisoner's bed.

Shall earthly pomp and earthly plot
Or yet the assassin's wrath,
Avail to check imperial Truth
Or turn her from her path?
Through all the army's tented fields
Her silent couriers run,
And soon or late, as sure as fate,
God's justice will be done.

Success"

VANITY FAIR.

Interested observers of society affairs in San Francisco remark various changes of importance in the new era.

The comments of a number of social leaders, as given in a recent article in the Call, are generally of the same tenor and notably cheerful. It is predicted that the season will be one long remembered for its delights. Informality will be the keynote of all entertainments, and that, of course, means an increased number of occasions of merry-making.

Clubs are not quite the delightful places they were before. However luxurious may be the private houses in which they are domiciled the club atmosphere is said to be lacking, the old familiar furnishings and comforts are, many of them, of necessity absent, and there is a "strange garret" feeling which quite drives a poor man forth to pay the calls and accept the invitations he scorned before. Men had become selfish, it is said by the wise, and were unwilling to take the trouble to go out to dances, formal dinners and the like, and a man at a tea was sure to be considered a martyr to family influence, a "climber," or deeply enamoured of some fair tea-goer.

There is just as much entertainment now as before, but of a different type just at present. There is no Palace or St. Francis to go to for dinners or luncheons, and there are no theatres, but people do other things. Dinners are given and any other form of entertaining that was ever done here during the summer. There will be a few who will drop out, of course, but friendships, which are the real basis of entertaining, are not destroyed by earthquake or fire.

It is thought that simplicity will be the keynote of all social events, and it is predicted that this feature will have a serious influence upon bachelors.

There will be so many this year who must dress more inexpensively that it will not be considered very good taste to dress handsomely, even by those who can afford it. The subtle influence of home life, as seen thus, will begin to tell. The inexpensive comforts devised by the fertile feminine brain since the days of lessened expenses began will be observed, and men who have felt that their incomes were not sufficient for two at the rate people lived will find that clever wives could do marvels with them. Meeting on a more natural basis will bring about a better understanding between men and girls, too.

The prettiest belle of the season may prove to have most unexpected accomplishments, and the shy girl who never shone at dinners or dances will surprise a man by her fund of quiet wit, her musical or artistic ability or her gentle, sympathetic understanding, and the same rule applies to the men. A girl will find that some man whom she had esteemed heretofore only for his dancing or his Welsh rarebits has all kinds of manly qualities, and the dullest man of her acquaintance may prove an appreciative and intelligent listener with a comfortable income.

Royal favor in England and Norway bids fair to revive a diversion that had nearly lost attraction for the many.

Queen Maud, of Norway, has just ordered two new bicycles from London, on which she proposes to make a tour of her new kingdom. She thus exemplified the constancy of the British royal family in their tastes, in contrast with the fickleness of fashionable society.

Cycling was unanimously dropped by society several years ago, after a craze that had made Battersea Park, with its cycle track, a serious rival to Rotten Row. But the English princesses have never grown tired of cycling. The Princess Royal (Duchess of Fife) and Princess Victoria take regular spins on their wheels, and the pastime has been taken up with great enthusiasm by little Princess Victoria Mary of Wales.

Secrets of the lodge-room were in danger for a day in St. Paul during the recent meeting of the national societies of Veterans and the allied organizations.

Confusion was created in the halls of the Women's Relief Corps and the Ladies of the G. A. R. by delegates being allowed to get into the wrong session. In some strange manner both organizations adopted the same password for this year's conventions. It was not discovered the first day and the delegates found themselves among some strange faces and listening to the discussion of matters of which they had not the slightest knowledge.

It was impossible for either of the organizations to change their passwords during the day, and they worked under the difficulty during the entire session. Finally the guards at the doors would not let anybody in unless the delegates told to which organization they belonged.

It is rumored in Washington that a new major-domo will shortly be in charge of social functions at the White House, Major McCawley to be replaced by Captain Frank McCoy of the Third Cavalry.

While Major Charles L. McCawley was at Providence Hospital, convalescent from typhoid fever, he married Mrs. John Davis, widow of Judge John Davis, of the Court of Claims. Mrs. Davis was Sallie Frelinghuysen, daughter of the former Secretary of State. She has an independent fortune and maintains an elaborate home here. She is several years the Major's senior and is not an intimate associate of the Roosevelts. The unconventional wedding of the Major and the widow occasioned much comment at the White House.

A humorist contributes to Puck this scrap of conversation concerning a fatal defect in socialism:

"I like socialism fine," said the honest and apparently unromantic mechanic, "but I don't want to give up my Sunday paper."

"Give up your Sunday paper," said the agitator. "I don't see how socialism is going to affect your reading matter."

"Maybe it won't yours," replied the victim of capital, "but I've got so accustomed to reading 'Snappy Doings in Smart Set: They Bump the Bumps in the Vandergould Dining-Room' and 'Mrs. Astor's Gems: She Has Enough to Fill a Wash Basin,' and 'Life Histories of the Eighty Peeresses Who Were Members of the Original Florodora Sextet' and all such like that I dunno what I'd do if you was to remove the pampered classes."

Prof. Bouchard recently read a paper before the French Academy of Sciences setting forth that X-rays are an infallible agent for restoring color to whitened hair and beard and turning light blond hair to fast black.

He showed pictures of a professor of Montpellier, one side of whose beard was iron gray, the other, after treatment, glistening black. A later photo proved that the Italian richness of color was more than skin deep, for the new hairs grown were also black. While revealing this wonderful successor to the many dyes on the market, the professor was not altogether sanguine as to the great gain to the old who would be young or to the prematurely white, for he said it would be some time before he could make sure that the result might not be permanent harm which would more than compensate for this rejuvenation.

Franco-American society in Paris has just enjoyed a fete as delightful as it was original, given by Mme. Clarke.

The hostess probably is the only representative in Paris of that American type, "the business woman." She is in herself the whole firm of Cunliffe, Russell & Co., bankers. Literally, her financial operations range from New York to India, with France as her headquarters. Mme. Clarke is deeply interested in the state lotteries of various European countries. But all this does not prevent the most conservative of French aristocrats from accepting eagerly her frequent invitations. Mrs. Frank H. Mason, the American Consul-General's wife; Dr. Spaulding, with his wife; Countess Lafayette, Princess Abbatucci and the Duke of Pomar, a Spanish grandee, were among the hundred and more guests. The hostess engaged for the night the larger stand in the lower lake in the Bois de Boulogne. Electric lamps of every color were run like ribbons through the trees, so that the whole island gleamed in a soft radiance. Venetian gondolas, propelled by gayly costumed musicians, who sang to the tinkle of guitars and mandolins, bore the guests to the island, when they would consent to debark there, for most preferred to be rowed about the lake, long and dreamily, the better to enjoy the lovely sight; the varicolored lights reflected, dancing on the dark water, the gondolas furrowing their illuminated way, while strange music sounded. It was a festival of light. A little theatre had been hastily erected near the Swiss chalet, a theatre backed by trees and open to the warm, still air of the summer night. The ever-thoughtful hostess had pillaged the opera and the theatres for singers and reciters and the vaudeville stage for dancers who moved in Spanish and Japanese measures.

STAGE GOSSIP.

It is announced that the owners of the Orpheum circuit of vaudeville houses will erect an Orpheum in Oakland, to cost $100,000.

Old theatre-goers will have pleasing memories recalled by the announcement that Mario Majeroni, the son of Majeroni, the Italian actor, will appear as the prince of India in the play made from Henry Law Wallace's novel. Twenty-five years ago his father and mother were well-known in the theatrical world. Mme. Julia Majeroni was a sister of history, and was a beautiful woman and effective on the stage, especially in Bartley Campbell's "Galley Slave." Both played many years subsequently in Australia, and died there.

The famous French opera in New Orleans, which has for several years been declining, is to be replaced next year by a 10-weeks season in Italian by the San Carlo company. This closes—for the present at least—a record of over 100 years. Lafayette went to the opera here in 1825.

George Ade has turned over to Charles Frohman a new play to be produced this fall. The name of it has not been chosen yet, but will probably be "The Honorable Dan." The scene will be laid in a small Indiana town. The actors who will present the play have not been selected.

Leoncavallo, who is to make a tour through the United States this year, has been spending the summer in Switzerland and finishing his new opera, "The Young Figaro," with words by Sardou. It will be initially produced in New York.

"Monk," the famous thoroughbred race horse that has always run as the "down stage horse" on Ben-Hur's chariot, is the only remaining member of the original cast of "Ben-Hur," the famous spectacle now entering on its eighth season.

A legitimate successor to the comic operas of Gilbert and Sullivan has been brought out at the New Theatre in London, England. The libretto is by Fredrick Fenn, and the music by P. M. Faraday. The music is somewhat amateurish, but the work achieved considerable success owing to the witty lines, a consistent plot, charming lyrics and attractive setting. The scene is laid in Egypt.

Arnold Daly is said to entertain the conviction that there is a fortune in the piece for any one producing it, but notwithstanding the court decision in his favor, he will neither produce "Mrs. Warren's Profession" himself nor permit any one else to do so. He is apparently still searching for sensations.

Among the new plays which he proposes to give during the winter are a version of "Apres l'Opera," one of the thrillers to be found at the Grand Guignol in Paris; "The Monkey's Paw," the version of W. W. Jacobs's story made by Louis N. Parker, and "The Flag Station." He is also the possessor of "Grandfather Coquesne," in which, it is said, Henry Irving would have appeared if his days had been less suddenly ended.

Winklemann, the noted tenor, has retired from the Vienna opera after singing twenty-three years, ten of them without a voice. Wagner chose him for the first Parsifal at Baireuth.

Saint-Saens, who has promised to visit the United States next season, declares that he will compose no more. His last large work was "L'Ancestre," produced last year. Some critics regard him as the greatest composer France has ever had.

Eddie Foy's new play is a musical piece called "The Wild and Woolly West." Mr. Foy will have the role of an editor who assumes a job left vacant by seven preceding editors, all suddenly deceased. John G. Gilbert is the author.

Paul M. Potter has finished his adaptation of Croisset's "Le Bonheur Meslames," which he has written for Lilian Russell, and which is to be called "Barbara's Millions." H. Reeves Smith and Herbert Standing will supply the principal male support. Miss Russell's experiment will be watched with some curiosity, as the instances in which popular singers have repeated their triumphs on the speaking stage have been comparatively rare. It is possible, of course, to point out the cases of Charlotte Cushman and Genevieve Ward, but their gifts differed somewhat materially from those of Miss Russell.

Justin Huntly McCarthy has a rival. Edward St. John Brenon announces that he also has written a drama having Caesar Borgia for its hero. It remains now to be seen which dramatist will succeed in getting his play first to the footlights.

Cyril Maude is likely to be the manager of his own theatre again before long. It will be remembered that his London playhouse was practically demolished some months ago by the collapse of part of the roof of the Charing Cross railroad station. The railway company has signified its willingness to pay $100,000 without any legal contest, and the shattered theatre will soon be in good order again.

Italy's leading opera house, the Scala of Milan, is again facing a crisis. The expenses of a four months' season of opera amount to about $200,000, while the receipts do not exceed $120,000. This leaves $80,000 to be supplied by the owners of the opera house—the city and the boxholders. The city is in a predicament. In 1901 the citizens of Milan decided, by a referendum, not to cover the annual deficit any longer. A syndicate succeeded in tiding over the difficulty, but only for a few years. The city is again asked to contribute its share, but the referendum decision stands in the way. The city fathers have offered the sum of $12,000, to be expended in lowering the orchestra and changing the fifth tier to a gallery, which is to be accessible to persons who can not afford the high prices charged for tickets in other parts of the house. It is feared that the Scala will again have to be let year by year to some speculative manager, as formerly. The objection to this plan is that such a manager will allow the profit question to weigh much more heavily than artistic considerations.

W. H. Leahy, president of the San Francisco Board of Police Commissioners and formerly manager of the Tivoli Opera House, in a newspaper interview denies the charge said to have been made by Arthur Cunningham, the singer, that Leahy was "a contract breaker," and adds: "Cunningham would be mighty glad to go to work for me again if I gave him the chance."

After-theatre suppers in the restaurants of the so-called "theatre district" in New York City must end at 1 o'clock in the morning, or else be served without liquor, according to an order issued by Acting Police Commissioner Waldo which has become effective. It is declared that the police will continue a vigilant crusade until the public is educated to appreciate the necessity of eating and drinking before 1 o'clock.

"A few years ago," Thomas A. Edison said the other day to a representative of the Musical Age, "when the talking machine business was still a dubious proposition, a list of the new records was often handed me for approval. After hearing them, I would mark 'good,' 'fair' or 'rotten' against the compositions so as to class them for trade. The 'rotten' records always made a hit with the public. Now, all I have to do is to condemn a bit of music and the factory works overtime to supply the demand."

Henrietta Osborne Bert, wife of Frederick W. Bert, general manager of William A. Brady's enterprises, died in Brooklyn recently, after a protracted illness. Mrs. Bert, a popular and talented actress, especially in tragic roles, and well known to the theatre-goers twenty-five years ago under her stage name of Henrietta Osborne, was about sixty-five years of age. Her personality and her amazonian physique made her a striking figure in tragic impersonations, and she appeared in the support of such renowned players as the Booths, Forrest, Charlotte Cushman, E. L. Davenport, Joseph Jefferson and Lawrence Barrett. While her husband managed the old California Theatre in San Francisco she played a series of important roles, being associated with all the famous theatrical persons of the Pacific Slope, among them being John McCullough, Helen and Lucille Western, Katherine Coehran, David Belasco and Joseph R. Grismer. Her repertoire was immense and varied.

The new play announced as to be written for Eleanor Robson by Edmond Restand, the noted French dramatist and academician, is not a new one, and it was not specially written for her. It is "La Princesse Lointaine," or a new version of it, specially devised, with the consent of M. Restand, by Louis N. Parker, for Miss Robson.

The Orpheum.

Ben Welch, the dialect comedian, will make his first appearance in San Francisco at the Orpheum Sunday afternoon, and his stories are said to be droll beyond description. The five Salvaggis, acrobatic and whirlwind dancers, will contribute an act that must be seen to be appreciated. The Dixon Brothers, musical grotesques, play upon all kinds of instruments. Max Hildebrandt, "The Crazy German Cavalry Band Leader," will complete the list of newcomers. Margaret Wycherly will continue her sketch, "In Self-Defense," and Mlle. Therese Renz, Europe's greatest horsewoman, will appear for the last time here. Mayme Remington and her "Black Buster Brownies," the Oliveira trio of musicians and Orpheum motion pictures will complete a varied and interesting program. On the grounds of the Chutes, where the Orpheum is located, are attractions of every description. There will be a special matinee at the Orpheum on Monday, Labor Day.

A. C. Barkhausen, the blind news dealer, formerly at Bush and Montgomery streets, is now located at the southwest corner of Devisadero and California streets. Subscriptions or orders for weekly deliveries will be promptly attended to. Address in care of Wakelee's, 2801 California street. Phone West 2907.

LITERARY NOTES.

From a Cornish Window.

He who would spend a casual hour or two in pleasant converse with a delightful companion is commended to "From a Cornish Window," by A. T. Quiller Couch. He has subdivided his musings on men and hooks and nature into twelve parts—headed by the names of the months—as many as his moods. The rather earnest dedication, wherein the author places himself in sullen solitude, because the philosophy of the times is out of joint, does not prepare us for the lightsome pages that follow.

With excellent wit and agreeable sentiment he discourses of Shakespeare and Kipling, of Plato and Stevenson, of children and Christmas, of village shop and hookstall, of old favorites in prose and verse that bring a sigh, of sea view and olive orchard. These intimate communings are very entertaining and, generally, in good taste, but his practice of illustrating his text by solecisms invariably committed by Americans, raises our patriotic ire. It was the young American lady who referred to "Virginis Puerihusque"; it is the American sculptor who depicts "Freedom Presenting a Pianola to the Fisheries and the Fine Arts."

Published by E. P. Dutton & Co., New York; $1.50 net.

City Government.

A movement in educational circles that promises much is the growing interest in the study of city government. The illuminating comment of a school official that he "regarded our city government as too hard to be studied," furnishes an excellent reason for adding it to the already overburdened curriculum of high schools. "City Government for Young People," by Charles Dwight Willard, is a valuable text-book on the subject. In one century, Mr. Willard points out, the proportion of people living in cities has increased from one-thirtieth to one-third. For all these people the city is a sort of house-keeper, protecting their lives, educating their children, guarding their health. And yet the average citizen, beyond voting and paying his taxes, is little concerned with the management of affairs at the city hall.

When the school has fostered in the child an intelligent interest in and understanding of the science of municipal government, we may hope in time to approximate the enviable management of European cities. As no two American cities are governed alike, Mr. Willard has indicated the general system under which municipalities are governed, and wherein our own cities differ from others.

Published by the Macmillan Company, New York; 50 cents.

Airy Humor of College Life.

"The Count of Harvard," by Rupert Sargent Holland, is an amusing bit of undergraduate effervescence. While reading it one must be in the humor to surrender one's self to sheer airy nonsense. "The count" is the nickname of one kind of a typical student—so-called—at Harvard; the hutterfly kind to whom life is one long, never-ending frolic, and who regards the "grind" who actually goes to college for the sake of acquiring information, with amused, intolerant contempt.

The author has something of Lewis Carroll's talent for spinning a gay, glimmering web of nonsense out of the ordinary coinage of conversation, and the gravely absurd doings of the count and his chums make up a sufficiently amusing volume.

Published by L. C. Page & Co.; price, $1.50.

Sympathetic Suburban Annals.

Another collection of Mary Stewart Cutting's magazine stories, entitled "More Stories of American Life," attest the popularity of these entertaining recitals of the ups and downs of suburban domesticity. They are the epitomes in little of American family life, and the wise author who sees so clearly into the souls of the men and women of whom she writes, weaves between them and her readers that bond of kinship with their better selves which awakens a perennially quickened sympathy.

Published by McClure, Phillips & Co.; price, $1.25.

New Publications.

"In Our Town," by William Allen White, sketches of life in a Kansas town as reported by a country editor, is enjoying a wide sale. Excerpts from the book were printed in the Argonaut for June 2d. Published by McClure, Phillips & Co.

"Monographs: Garrick, Macready, Rachel and Baron Stockman," by Sir Theodore Martin, K. C. B., K. C. V. O., is as pretentious as the author's signature, and is written in the best Quarterly Review manner. It would seem that lives as romantic and gossip-full as those of the three great actors named would connote a lighter and cheerier literary treatment. There are few new anecdotes in the "Monographs." Baron Stockman, the subject of the fourth sketch, was a German statesman of much talent and little fame. Published by E. P. Dutton & Co., $3.50 net.

The latest volume added to Laird & Lee's excellent series of Webster's New Standard Dictionaries is the Intermediate School Edition. The volume contains 30,000 vocabulary words and 5,000 synonyms. Published by Laird & Lee, Chicago; 50 cents.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

Howard Chandler Christy has gone on a vacation to the Canada woods, having just completed his book for this year on "The American Girl."

John W. Munson's "Reminiscences of a Mosby Guerrilla," which have appeared in serial publication will soon be brought out in book form.

Among the annuals already announced is "A Cheerful Year Book," by F. M. Knowles and C. F. Lester, introduced and concluded by Carolyn Wells.

A historical edition of "Romola," in two volumes, with 160 engravings, is to be edited, with an introduction and notes, by Dr. Guido Biagi, librarian of the Laurentian and the Riccardi libraries in Florence.

"The Cruise of the Violetta," by Arthur Colton, is to appear this month.

At the time of her death Mrs. Craigie was engaged in adapting her play, "A Time to Love" for publication as a novel. Her last novel, "The Dream and the Business," is ready for issue, the publishers awaiting a cable dispatch from America to say that the United States copyright has been secured.

Very rich and the wife of one of the most successful journalists in London, Mrs. Humphry Ward does not write for money, but for fame. Yet she is balked of her highest desire, which is to write a story that would be acknowledged as on a par with "Adam Bede" or "The Mill on the Floss." The success which will attend Mrs. Ward's visit to this country this fall or winter is a matter of speculation with literary photographers of the daily press.

"Reminiscences of Sir Henry Irving," in two substantial and richly illustrated volumes, by the late actor's manager and friend, Bram Stoker, is announced for early publication.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

In Paris, M. Clemenceau, Minister of the Interior, is famous for his caustic wit. The other day he was passing through one of the rooms at the home office, when he caught sight of a clerk asleep, with his head on his blotting pad. It will be remembered that M. Clemenceau recently insisted on the clerks of the home office working, at all times putting in an appearance at their desks, for seven hours every day, and the minister could not help smiling at the evident fatigue which his new law had caused. The chief clerk in the office was rushing to wake the young man up, when M. Clemenceau put out his hand to stop him. "Good gracious!" he said, "do not disturb him. If you wake him up he will go away!"

Archbishop Ryan had rebuked a priest for wearing a most disreputable-looking hat. "I would not give this hat for twenty new ones," said the priest. "It belonged to my father, who fell in the line of '48." "Ah," was Archbishop Ryan's retort, "evidently he fell on the hat!"

Mrs. Thomas Johnson Smith was being married for the fourth time in the little country church in which she had been raised. The ceremony was proceeding with all solemnity until the minister reached the point, "Who gives this woman to this man to be his wife?" and a voice away back in the congregation replied, "I generally do."

F. M. Beckford, of Laconia, New Hampshire, was once arguing a case in the Belknap county court, and he ended his argument as follows: "Your honor, and gentlemen of the jury: This case is one peculiar in circumstances as well as in fact. It came to me as a legacy from my late brother, Colonel T. J. Whipple, who was engaged in its preparation at the time of his death. The county attorney who bought the case into court has long since gone to his great reward. The justice who held the original hearing has long since passed away. Our Attorney-General Barnard, since he became interested in the case, has been called to that land where litigation is not known. Several of the leading witnesses, too, are dead—" "All of which," said the court, "reminds us of the uncertainty of human life. Proceed, or none of us will be able to see the case through."

Berzelius, the Swedish chemist, made most of his laboratory experiments in his kitchen with the cook, Anna, as his only assistant. "What is your master?" asked one of his neighbors. "Oh, he is a chemist." "What's that?" "Well, I will tell you. He has something in a big bottle, then he pours it into a smaller one, and then again into quite a tiny bottle." "Well, and what happens to it?" "Oh, then I throw it away."

In one of Hall Caine's visits to this country a banquet was given in his honor in a certain city, and Thomas Nelson Page was invited to introduce the guest of the evening. Just before the toasts began, Mr. Page's right-hand neighbor passed his menu around the table with the request that Caine should let the usual "autographing" with his signature. "Good idea," said Page; "I'll send my menu-card along, too. I've got to introduce Hall Caine in a few minutes, and I want to be able to say that I have read something he has written."

Marie Corelli's domestic quiet at Stafford-on-Avon seemed likely to be destroyed not long since by the opening of a girls' school in the house immediately adjoining her own. The famous novelist found that the recitations of the pupils greatly interrupted her literary work. She stood it, however, as long as she possibly could, and finally wrote a letter of protest to the proprietor of the school. The reply she received from the elderly schoolmistress was prompt, and ran as follows:

"Dear Miss Corelli: Judging from the literary work of yours which it has been my privilege to see, I should say that it would be just as well if you were interrupted even more frequently."

During Lord Kitchener's recent visit to the Indian frontier defenses he inspected a new fort. He was astonished to find that it had been so placed as to be commanded by a nearby hill. The officer who had chosen the site was present with the party, and Kitchener called him forward. Instead of the outburst that the staff expected, Kitchener merely held out his hand and said: "I congratulate you, colonel. What a capital place for a fort! When do you begin to remove the hill?"

The late Alexander Muir, of Toronto, author of "The Maple Leaf," Canada's national anthem, was interested all his life in the divorce laws, which were too often, he claimed, unfair to women.

Mr. Muir frequently declared that men, not their wives, were in nine cases out of ten responsible for unhappy marriages.

"The trouble with too many husbands," he once said, "is that they treat their wives as a Toronto man used to do."

"This man, sitting in his drawing-room on a coolish evening, cried out fiercely:

"Shut that door, confound it! What's the matter with you, any way? Do you want to freeze me?"

"The cook appeared calmly in the open doorway.

"Do you know who you are speaking to, sir?" she said in a stern voice.

"The man, taken aback, stammered: "Oh, excuse me. I thought it was my wife."

At a banquet held in a room, the walls of which were adorned with many beautiful paintings, a well-known college president was called upon to respond to a toast. In the course of his remarks, wishing to pay a compliment to the ladies present, and designating the paintings with one of his characteristic gestures, he said: "What need is there of these painted beauties when we have so many with us at this table?"

Two Irish farmers who had not seen each other for a long time met at a fair. They had a lot of things to tell each other.

"Sure, it's married I am," said Murphy.

"You don't tell me so," said Moran.

"Faix, yes," said Murphy. "and I've got a fine healthy bhoys which the neighbors say is the very picture of me."

Moran looked for a moment at Murphy, who was not, to say the least, remarkable for his good looks, and then said: "Och, well, what is the harm so long as the child's healthy?"

Mark Twain once wrote to Andrew Carnegie as follows:

"My dear Mr. Carnegie: I see by the papers that you are very prosperous. I want to get a hymn book. It costs 6 shillings. I will bless you, God will bless you, and it will do a great deal of good. Yours truly."

Andrew Carnegie is famous for the excellent advice that he gives to poor young men.

"In considerable fear," said a New York millionaire, "I once consulted Mr. Carnegie about a new venture. The business looked as if it ought to be profitable. There seemed to be a public need of it. Still, there was some risk involved, and I was afraid."

"But Mr. Carnegie laughed at my fears."

"If it is a good thing, plunge in," he said. 'Fear is old-womanish. Fear is what keeps untold millions from making fortunes. When Benjamin Franklin thought of starting a paper in Philadelphia, his mother, greatly alarmed, tried to dissuade him. She pointed out that there were already two newspapers in America.'"

Charles Butters, a California mining man, has been awarded a gold medal, the gift of the Consolidated Gold Fields of South Africa, by the London Council of the Institute of Mining and Metallurgy. The honor has been conferred on Butters on account of original research work in the metallurgy of gold in Africa.

Notes and Gossip.

A chronicle of the social happenings during the past week in the cities on and around the Bay of San Francisco will be found in the following department:

The engagement is announced of Miss Mary Le Conte, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. L. J. Le Conte of Berkeley, to Mr. John B. Hoffman of Oakland.

The engagement is announced of Miss Mabel Stockton, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. T. C. Stockton of San Diego to Lieutenant E. S. Eckhardt, U. S. N. The wedding will be celebrated in Washington, D. C., on September 19th. Lieutenant Eckhardt is at present stationed at Norfolk, Virginia.

The engagement is announced of Miss Abba Church, of Oakland, a niece of Mr. and Mrs. George McNear, and Mr. Edgar Rickard. No date is arranged as yet for the wedding. Mr. Rickard has recently come to Oakland from the north, where he has extensive interests.

It is announced that the wedding of Miss Gertrude Gould of Oakland to Dr. Roderic O'Connor, U. S. A., will be celebrated at the home of the bride in Oakland on September 5th.

It is announced that the wedding of Miss Helen Meiggs of Santa Barbara to Mr. Frederick Thompson of this city will be celebrated at the bride's home in October.

The wedding of Miss Marion Sterling, sister of Mr. George Sterling and a niece of Mr. Frank, C. Havens, to Mr. Clarence C. Cunha of Honolulu was very quietly celebrated on Saturday morning last at St. Francis de Sales church, in Oakland, Miss Ada Sterling, the bride's sister, was her only attendant, and Mr. Charles Benton was the best man. After their honeymoon Mr. and Mrs. Cunha will make their home in Grass Valley for the present.

Mrs. William H. Taylor and Mrs. Augustus Taylor entertained recently at a luncheon at their home at Menlo Park, in honor of Miss Ethyl Hager, whose marriage to Mr. Lansing Kellogg will take place early in September. Among the guests were: Miss Ethyl Hager, Miss Alice Hager, Mrs. Walter S. Martin, Mrs. Laurance Scott, Mrs. Fred McNear and Mrs. Sherwood Hopkins.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Clark, who were at Del Monte for the golf tournament, entertained at a dinner there last week, at which their guests were: Mr. and Mrs. Walter S. Martin, Miss Alice Hager, Mr. C. Templeton Crocker and others.

A party which went en automobile to Del Monte for the golf tournament consisted of Mr. and Mrs. Walter S. Hobart, Miss Anita Harvey, Miss Genevieve Harvey, Miss Jennie Crocker, Mr. Harry R. Simpkins, Mr. Harry Stetson, Mr. Oscar Cooper and Mr. Lawrence McCreery.

Mrs. Linda Bryan was the hostess at a luncheon on Wednesday of last week, at her home on Buchanan street, in honor of Miss Georgie Shepard, who is to be married this fall to Lieutenant Edwin C. Long, U. S. A. Those present were: Mrs. Ynez Shorb White, Mrs. Gaston Ashe, Mrs. Charles S. Fee, Mrs. Lester Herrick, Mrs. John Bradbury, Mrs. Thomas Benton Darragh, Miss Carrie Waters of San Bernardino, Miss Edna Montgomery, Miss Maye Colburn, Miss Meta Breckenfeld and Miss Mabelle Toy.

The Mansfield Club will give its seventh piano recital at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. M. H. de Young, 1919 California street, on Saturday afternoon, September 1st. A large number of invitations have been issued and an attractive program has been arranged.

The Italian Consul, Count Naselli and Countess Naselli gave a reception last week at the Hotel Rafael to sixty invited guests to meet the Commander and officers of the Italian man-of-war Dogali, now anchored in the harbor. The reception was held in the green room of the hotel and the bright uniform of the Commander and of the officers, mingled with the handsome gowns of the ladies, gave a semi-martial air to the function. The music by the orchestra in the palm room, or conservatory, added to the enjoyment of the occasion. Among those present were: Count and Countess Naselli, Col. Geo. M. Dunn, Mrs. Truxtun Beale, Mr. and Mrs. R. Girvin, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Johnson, Mrs. William Babcock, Mr. and Mrs. George Mendall, Count and Countess Febbrini, Judge and Mrs. Morrow, Dr. and Mrs. Howett, Mr. and Mrs. George Monroe Pincham, Judge Angellotti, Mrs. John F. Boyd, Miss Boyd, Miss Helen Woolworth, Baron and Baroness Von Schroeder, Miss Von Schroeder, Miss Donohoe, Mrs. Eleanor Martin, Mrs. W. P. Morgan, Mrs. I. L. Pool, and Mrs. George Gibbs. After the reception the Count and Countess Naselli entertained a dinner party at the Hotel. Covers were laid for fourteen guests and appropriate hand-painted menu cards with Italy's colors and man-of-war emblems depicted thereon were carried away by the owners as fitting souvenirs.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Annexed will be found a resume of movements to and from this city and Coast, and of the whereabouts of absent Californians.

An object lesson of buying a residence where there are no restrictions is being exhibited daily. Chinese and Japanese are gaining foothold in the best parts of the Western Addition. Saloons are running full blast at the threshold of Churches and homes. Residence districts are being ruined as such because there is no protection the law affords. There is only one spot in San Francisco where only Caucasians are permitted to buy or lease real estate or where they may reside. Only one where stores and saloons and flats cannot be built. That place is Presidio Terrace. There you will obtain protection from the many nuisances that are now making life in many portions of San Francisco unbearable.

PERSONAL.

Army and Navy.

The latest personal notes relative to army and navy people who are or have been stationed at Pacific Coast points:

Lieutenant-Colonel John A. Lundeen, U. S. A. Inspector-General of the Department of California, who will be promoted to be colonel on October 1st, will be relieved from duty in the Inspector-General's department and will proceed to Fort Washington, Maryland, to assume command of the Artillery District of the Potomac. It is rumored that he will be succeeded here by Colonel John P. Wisser, commanding officer at Fort Baker, but at present on duty at Camp Tacoma.

Lieutenant-Colonel George H. Torney, Deputy Surgeon-General, U. S. A., and commanding officer of the Army General Hospital at the Presidio, left on Saturday for Washington, D. C., in charge of a detachment of insane. Colonel Torney will be absent about two months and during that time will visit the principal hospitals of the East with a view to observing improvements to be applied here. He is accompanied by his son, Lieutenant W. Torney, U. S. A., who was a member of this year's class at West Point and who returns there to act as assistant coach for the military academy football team.

Lieutenant-Colonel Daniel Appel, deputy surgeon-general, U. S. A., has been detailed as a member of the examining board at the General Hospital during the absence of Colonel George H. Torney, U. S. A., in the East.

Major Carroll A. Devol, Quartermaster's department, U. S. A., who is stationed here as a depot quartermaster and superintendent of the army transport service, has been detailed as a member of the general staff corps and ordered to report to the chief of staff in Washington, D. C., where he will probably be assigned for duty. Major Devol will be relieved from his present duty before September 30th by Major John B. Bellinger, Quartermaster, U. S. A., who has been on duty in the Quartermaster-General's office in Washington, D. C.

Major Parker West, U. S. A., who was promoted to his present rank on August 24th, has recently transferred from the Eleventh to the Fifteenth Cavalry, but upon his promotion was assigned to the Fifteenth Cavalry, and will therefore return to California again to one or another of the stations of that regiment here. Major West is particularly well-known here, having been for some time General MacArthur's aide.

Major Henry H. Ludlow, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., who was for some time stationed on this Coast at Fort Baker and Ft. Miles, has been ordered upon his relief from duty at the Mississippi Agricultural and Mechanical College, to proceed to Fort Hamilton, New York, for duty.

Captain Julius A. Penn, Seventh Infantry, U. S. A., aide-de-camp to General H. A. Corbin, U. S. A., who is well known in California, has been detailed as a member of the General Staff Corps, to take effect upon the retirement of General Corbin, on September 15th, and Captain Penn will then report to the Chief of Staff at Washington, D. C., for assignment.

Captain Leonard D. Wildman, Signal Corps, U. S. A., is ordered relieved from duty as chief signal officer of the Department of California and as chief signal officer at Camp Tacoma and will proceed to Omaha, Nebraska, and report to the commanding general of the Department of Missouri as chief signal officer of that department and as commanding officer of Ft. Omaha, Nebraska, relieving Major Eugene O. Fechet, Signal Corps, U. S. A. Captain Hanson B. Black, Signal Corps, U. S. A., in addition to his duties as commanding officer of Benicia Barracks, will report to the commanding general of the Department of California for temporary duty as chief signal officer.

Captain W. H. Oury, Signal Corps, U. S. A., who arrived on the last transport from the Philippines, was upon reaching here ordered at once to attend the pistol competition at Fort Sheridan. On his return he will go at once to Benicia Barracks.

Captain Reginald M. Kirby Smith, assistant surgeon, who arrived recently on the S. S. Korea from the Philippines, has been assigned for duty at the General Hospital here.

Captain Chauncey B. Humphrey, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., who was recently taken seriously ill at the maneuvers at Camp Tacoma and ordered to the Army General Hospital at the Presidio of San Francisco, has been operated on for appendicitis and is improving.

Lieutenant Douglas MacArthur, Corps of Engineers, U. S. A., is relieved from duty as aide-de-camp to General Arthur MacArthur, U. S. A., to take effect about September 15th and will then proceed to Camp Tacoma and report to the commanding general for assignment to duty with the detachment of the First Battalion of Engineers of that camp. Upon the conclusion of the maneuvers, Lieutenant MacArthur will be relieved from that duty and will proceed to Washington Barracks, D. C., to report for duty with the Second Battalion of Engineers and at the Engineer School.

Lieutenant John Burke Murphy, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., who has been spending a few weeks' leave with his parents, Major and Mrs. Murphy, in Portland, Oregon, since leaving Vancouver Barracks, has gone to Fort Monroe, Virginia, to take a year's course at the Artillery School. Mrs. Murphy has arrived here with her little daughter Virginia, and will remain about six weeks as the guest of her grandparents, Captain and Mrs. A. F. Rodgers.

Lieutenant Creed F. Cox, Eleventh Cavalry, U. S. A., who was here as General Moore's aide, has been compelled to take leave of absence on account of illness.

Lieutenant George O. Duncan, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., has been ordered to the Army General Hospital at the Presidio of San Francisco for observation and treatment.

Lieutenant Roderic O'Connor, assistant surgeon, U. S. A., is relieved from duty at the Army General Hospital and ordered to Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, to relieve Captain Carroll D. Buck, assistant surgeon, U. S. A. Captain Buck, who was on duty here for some weeks on relief work, will come to San Francisco and be on duty at the Army General Hospital at the Presidio.

Lieutenant James F. Hall, assistant surgeon, U. S. A., will be relieved from duty at the Army General Hospital, Presidio of San Francisco, by Lieutenant Clarence Connor, assistant surgeon, U. S. A. Upon the completion of his examination for advancement, Dr. Hall will report to the commanding general of the Department of Columbia for duty.

Golf at Del Monte.

Many of the most prominent society people of San Francisco and the vicinity have been at Del Monte for the golf tournament there, ending on August 25th. The final round for the Del Monte cup for men golf players was over 36 holes in match play. Eighteen holes were played in the forenoon and 18 in the afternoon. In the forenoon's play C. Templeton Crocker received 7 strokes; was 2 up. In the afternoon he increased this advantage, the match ending at the 36th hole with 3 up and 2 to play. Mr. Crocker was winner of the Del Monte cup for men. Many ladies followed the players and watched the games with enthusiasm and interest. Among the events there were mixed foursomes over 18 holes, medal play, with handicap. The playing continued Saturday, Sunday and Monday. There are fifteen prizes in all. The Pacific Improvement Company gives eight; two were given by Charles W. Clark of San Mateo; Henry T. Scott gave one; Miss Alice Hager gave two, and Mrs. C. E. Maud two. Sunday there was an open event for professionals and amateurs, men and women. Among those at the hotel were Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Knight, Mr. and Mrs. Walter S. Martin, Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Oyster, Mr. and Mrs. George Armsby, Mr. Horace Pillsbury, Miss Alice Hager, Miss Florence Whittell, Mr. and Mrs. P. E. Bowles, Mr. Geo. McNear Bowles, Mr. and Mrs. H. R. Moore, Mr. E. E. Baker, Mr. Douglas Grant, Mr. C. R. Tobin, Mr. and Mrs. M. H. de Young, Miss de Young, Miss Constance de Young, Miss Kathleen de Young, Miss Phyllis de Young, Mr. Chas. de Young, Capt. C. H. McKinstry, Mr. F. W. Van Sicklin, Miss Dorothy Van Sicklin, Miss Sophie Van Sicklin, Mr. Maurice Dorr, Mr. and Mrs. Wellington Gregg, Jr., Captain Frank Winn, U. S. A., the Rev. and Mrs. David M. Crabtree, Mrs. R. G. Hayne, Miss Emily Parrott, Mrs. Theodore F. Payne, Mr. Herbert Payne and Mr. Clarence Payne.

The Coast tennis championship tournaments will commence at the Hotel Rafael grounds on Saturday, September 1st. The 1st and 3d of September will be devoted to the men's singles which will be played to the finals. Much interest centers in the first annual junior championship class. The Sutton sisters will be on hand. Champion Miss May Sutton looks safe in her position. The women's events will commence Wednesday, September 5th, with singles in the morning and the doubles in the afternoon.

The home of Judge and Mrs. Walter Cope has been brightened by the advent of a son.

News has been received by cable from London of the death of Mrs. Daniels, who was well known in local society as Mamie Coghill, daughter of Mrs. John Hemphill, first wife of the Rev. Dr. John Hemphill of this city. Mrs. Daniels was first married to Robert Hastings, by whose death in about 1890 their two children, Elizabeth and Harry Hastings, became heirs under the Hastings trust of the large estate of their grandfather. In 1892 Mamie Coghill Hastings married Mr. Daniels in London. Her mother, Mrs. Hemphill, who died in April, 1905, left her large estate in trust for the Hastings children, and Mrs. Daniels brought suit in this city to have the will set aside. The contest was still pending at the time of Mrs. Daniels' death.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Allen Lewis (formerly Dottie Kettle) in Portland, Oregon, has been brightened by the advent of a little daughter.

The International Mercantile Marine Co., comprising the American, Atlantic Transport, Holland-America, Red Star and White Star Lines, occupies its new offices commencing September 1st, in Room 405, Monadnock Building, San Francisco, instead of its recent offices in the Women's Exchange Building, Oakland. Mr. C. D. Taylor, passenger agent of the Pacific Coast, who has been located in the home office in New York since the recent disaster, will again assume charge of the San Francisco office.

William J. Dingee, the Oakland capitalist, who recently sold his interest in the Contra Costa water company, which supplies the cities of Alameda county, has bought the palatial residence at 858 Fifth avenue, New York City, at a price said to be above a million. Mr. Dingee expects to occupy his new house this fall, but he will retain his summer home near Redwood City and his interests in the cement works at Napa and Santa Cruz, in California.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

"Are you a follower of the faith cure school?" "Sure. I'm an undertaker."
—Cleveland Leader.

Stella—"Did you enjoy your European trip, my dear?" Bella—"Yes, indeed; we went to 117 souvenir post cards."
—Puck.

"I thought you were thinking seriously about getting married." "I was." "Then why didn't you?" "That's why."
—Cleveland Leader.

Gladys—"Mamma, what is a 'cursory glance'?" Mamma—"It is the kind of a look which your father gives when he wants to swear, but doesn't dare."

Small Boy—"Pa, what is an Optimist?" Pa—"An Optimist, my son, is a man who doesn't care a — what happens, so that it doesn't happen to him."
—Life.

"That man may seem to you somewhat uneducated, and yet he makes a fine living by his pen." "Why, I would never take him for a writer." "He isn't; he raises pigs."
—Baltimore American.

"My good man," said the kind old lady, stopping before cell 4114, "what are you in for?" "Robbin' de guests in a hotel, mum." "Were you the proprietor or head waiter?"
—Milwaukee Sentinel.

Mr. Titewodd—"If I promised you a dollar, and your Uncle Joe promised you twenty-five cents, how much would you have?" Tommy Titewodd—"I'd have a pretty good chance at de quarter."
—Cleveland Leader.

Miss Jenks—"Have you really broken off your engagement to him?" Miss Flyte—"Oh, yes. I just had to. He was getting too sentimental—hegan to talk to me about matrimony."
—Philadelphia Ledger.

"Jimshy would have had that fat appointment of his yet, if he hadn't lost his head." "What did he do?" "Nothing." "Then how did he lose his head?" "The official axe cut it off."
—Baltimore American.

"Did your daughter take physical culture lessons while at college?" asked the visitor. "Oh, yes," replied Mrs. Goldrox proudly. "She's got so now she can elevate her little finger just lovely when she eats soup."
—Milwaukee Sentinel.

Pedestrian—"Madam, a hoy who I am told is your son has just thrown a stone at me, causing a wound that is very painful. What are you going to do about it?" Mother—"I don't know. Have you tried arnica?"
—New Orleans Picayune.

"Don't you ever get any vacation?" pityingly asked the sleek thoroughbred. "Vacation!" exclaimed the work horse. "I can go out to the stable yard and roll over, any day in the week, and I'll bet that's more than you ever get to do."
—Chicago Tribune.

The minister was shocked when the young lady declined an introduction to some of his parishioners. "Why, my dear young lady, did you ever think that perhaps you will have to mingle with these good people when you get to heaven?" "Well," she exclaimed, "that will be soon enough."
—Life.

Markley—"Subbuhs may be induced to sell his house to me. He says it isn't far out of town, either." Wise—"No, only twelve miles from City Hall." Markley—"Why, he told me it was only ten miles by the railroad." Wise—"That's true; ten miles by the railroad and he walks the other two."
—Philadelphia Press.

"But, Mandy, if you can buy ribbon like that for forty-five cents a yard at the little store up here on the corner, what's the use of going all the way to town, and paying car fare both ways, to get it for forty-two cents? You don't save anything, do you?" "Goodness, yes. Papa always allows me money for car fare."
—Chicago Tribune.

Doctor—"Well, Matthew, did you take those pills I sent you yesterday?" Patient—"Yes, doctor; but couldn't 'e do 'em up in something different? They little boxes be terrible hard to swallow!"

—Punch.

She—"Why did Professor Schincker stop playing at Mrs. Lard's musicale?" He—"He said he had to, because the conversation was not pitched in the same key as his music."
—Harper's Weekly.

"It's just flashed on me who that young man was that spoke to me just now." "Who is he?" "I forget his name, but I was engaged to him in the mountains before I went to the seashore."
—Baltimore American.

Manager George D. Dornin advises that the City Department of the Springfield is now open in the Kohl Building. The General Department will occupy its old quarters on the California-street side, third floor, as soon as rooms are restored, and furniture, now ordered, made ready. Temporary Department headquarters will remain for the present at 1112 Broadway, Oakland. The Springfield is among the companies which are adjusting and paying policy holders' claims in the San Francisco disaster involving $1,600,000. The payment of this sum will leave the company's capital $2,000,000, its reserve for reinsurance (or unearned) premiums $3,132,531.00, as appears by its financial statement of December 31, 1905, intact, and a net surplus of over $400,000. The assets of the Springfield at the close of 1905 were $7,156,531.72.

The San Francisco Street Car Strike.

Ever since the great fire San Francisco's street conditions have been very trying. To pedestrians, to those in vehicles, and to those in the street cars, they have been like disagreeable. Beyond doubt, the platform of the street cars have had more work to perform since the fire, and it has been of a most onerous kind. The motorman has had to drive his car through streets cluttered with debris and over a narrow footway in the middle of the street, crowded with men and vehicles. The conductor, struggling through serried masses of passengers, has been obliged to force his way like a football. That these conditions have entailed much discomfort and caused greater labor to the carmen no one can deny. That their increased labor was worthy of a wage few also would deny.

At a fortnight ago, the carmen's union addressed a communication to the United Railroads demanding higher hours and more pay—$3.00 a day for eight hours work. The president, Patrick Calhoun, was in the East, and his assistant, T. Mullally, so informing the carmen that the president would arrive once, arriving in San Francisco four days later, on Sunday evening, August 26th. Mr. Mullally urged them to wait four days until Mr. Calhoun's arrival, promising them a friendly reception and an equitable consideration of their demand. More he could not promise, not possessing the necessary powers.

Ever since the last strike a formal agreement has existed between the United Railroads and the Carmen's Union. By the terms of this agreement there were to be no strikes or lockouts, but all disagreements were to be referred to arbitration, the tribunal to consist of one arbitrator appointed by the company, another arbitrator appointed by the carmen, these two to select a third. Under the terms of this agreement the carmen were to receive certain wages and to work certain hours, the arrangement to remain in force up to May, 1907.

Will it be believed when we say that these union carmen, egged on by plotting politicians and selfish strike-leaders, ignored their pledge, violated their agreement, and even refused to wait a single day for the return of President Calhoun? They, themselves, set September 1st as the day when these changes should go into effect, and then refused to stand by the date they had themselves fixed; they struck five days before. They committed the ineffable folly—and it was almost a crime—of declaring a strike and tying up the cars on the morning of Sunday, August 26th, on the evening of which day President Calhoun was due to return, and did return.

What kind of conduct is this? Is it that of sensible and reasonable men? We all of us in this life have to make agreements. All of us do not like to keep them, but when formally made they are always binding, and those among us who are weak or dishonest enough to break them can be made to smart for it by the courts. The only persons we know of who are not obliged to keep their agreements are children. Even women, when they are in business, must keep their agreements. It would seem that to the children's class we now must add the class of union workmen. The carmen's union deliberately violated their formal agreement. They did it in so shameless a manner that it looked as if they were deliberately trying to bring about a strike. We do not think that the men, themselves, had this desire, but we do believe that it was the desire of their leaders. Their refusal to wait some ten or twelve hours until the arrival of the one man who was empowered to reply to them looks as if they feared that he would grant their request on his arrival and thus prevent a strike.

As a result of this unjust and dishonest action of the carmen, the entire community of San Francisco has been put to grave inconvenience. Business of all kinds has been practically at a standstill. The money loss to the entire community for a single week is measured up in the hundreds of thousands.

What did the men accomplish by their unreasonable and dishonest strike? Mr. Calhoun, on his arrival said that he was prepared to meet the men and grant any reasonable demands. But when he found that they had struck in this unheard-of manner, he refused to treat with their representatives. His attitude was a logical one. He said, "The men are either in my employ or not in my employ. If they are in my employ, they must operate the cars. If they are not in my employ, I will not allow them to dictate terms as to how I shall run my business." There was absolutely no reply to be made to this statement, except to urge Mr. Calhoun "for the good of the city" to recede from his stand. This he absolutely refused to do. He said that if the carmen went to work he would treat with them, but so long as they remained out he would have nothing to do with them. He added, "They have the right, as free American citizens, to come and go as they please. If they are not satisfied, they are free to leave. If they are satisfied, they may come back. But when they are not in my employ they have no right to say how I shall run my cars."

Mr. Calhoun also said that he was not opposed to unions. He added, "I believe in unions. I like to deal with unions. I can get better results, as responsibility is fixed, but unions, like individuals, must keep their word. They must live up to their contracts."

The carmen's union has not done so. There is no getting away from the fact that, misled by strike-leaders and plotting politicians, the San Francisco carmen violated a legal contract; they demanded that a formal agreement be set aside; they demanded that it be set aside in three days when the only man who could give them an answer was four days distant; they went out on strike ten hours before this man reached San Francisco; they tied up the cars five days in advance of the date they themselves had set for their new wage to go into effect; they did not wait for a reply, but struck without a refusal to their demands; and they completely paralyzed the transportation of a city which was already sorely stricken and bleeding from her recent wounds.

This is what the strike-leaders and political advisers of the carmen's union did, and the people of San Francisco will not forget it and them.

The importation of strike-breakers by the United Railroads is now threatened. It causes grave apprehension. San Francisco is not prepared for the disorders which it will entail. Much of the city is in ruins, affording admirable opportunity to malefactors for concealment and flight; the streets are lined with brick-piles and debris heaps, furnishing convenient brickbats and gaspipe bludgeons for smashing windows and caving in the skulls of strike-breakers and passengers; the police force is diminished and disheartened. Furthermore, the authorities, State and municipal, may not be expected to be zealous in maintaining order, as the fall elections are near at hand. Therefore, the United Railroads will have a hard time in running its cars with strike-breakers, unless it succeeds in placing them under the protection of the Federal Government.

Politics in New York State.

The several varieties of Democrats in New York State are enthusiastic and politically active. They are not only in fighting mood, they are brandishing knives and bludgeons and chanting war songs in every key. No foe assails them, but that fact is not pertinent—they prefer to fight each other. This is no uncommon condition in the Empire State, it is merely the demonstration of normal Democratic vitality and disposition.

First in the field were the independent Democrats who look upon William Randolph Hearst as eminently designed for Mayor, Governor, or President. Early movements won for Hearst the endorsement of several county Democratic conventions. Where his forces were beaten the victory was a narrow one. The greater conventions at Buffalo and Albany were still to be held when the Democrats who hate and fear Hearst began to note the threatening aspect. They had thought that Hearst had no strength in the rural districts.

Leading in opposition to all Hearst ambitions are the Parker Democrats, headed by August Belmont, Thomas F. Ryan, William Sheehan, and Mayor McClellan of New York City. The mayor was away on a vacation in Europe, or there might have been earlier developments. It is proposed by this faction to take up District Attorney William Travers Jerome and force his nomination by the State Democratic Convention, though their influence is not an attractive display for a candidate. Jerome realizes this, and, while he has consented to accept a nomination, declares he is even more willing to be an independent candidate.

Tammany Hall is in a quandary. The World says its leaders are not only demoralized, but that they "have hardly the courage of sheep left." Charles F. Murphy, the head of Tammany, declares that there is no Jerome sentiment in the organization, but plenty of Hearst feeling. In reply to this, Mr. Hearst's papers say that "Murphy may be for Hearst, but Hearst is not for Murphy." This should go without saying. Murphy has had to bear all kinds of accusations from that quarter for a year or more. Jerome once declared he would put Murphy in jail, and a week ago he dared Tammany to name a candidate. The only reply to this has been a plaintive statement by Julius Harburger, a Tammany chieftain, that Congressman William Sulzer would be the choice of his braves.

Mr. Hearst's Independent League Convention meets September 11th in Carnegie Hall and will give him the first nomination for Governor. He may get the party nomination, too, but he does not care. He is willing to be an independent candidate. Jerome prefers to be an independent candidate. Sulzer may be an independent candidate, with Tammany backing. And then there is Mayor James Noble Adam, of Buffalo, who is favored by Democrats who have no use for Hearst, Jerome, or Sulzer—he may be an independent candidate. There is yet time for other Richmonds to enter the field.

On the Republican side there is little activity, though the movement to induce Charles E. Hughes to accept the nomination for Governor slowly gathers strength. Mr. Hughes returned from Europe this week, and it is too early to record his decision in the matter. Governor Higgins is not anxious to run again, and it is thought that Hughes would speedily attract support throughout the State that the Governor could have won only by an early and determined effort.

The Chile Disaster.

About 8 o'clock on the evening of August 16th there was a tremendous earthquake at Valparaiso, Chile. As at San Francisco, the shock was followed by the starting of many fires. The first reports from the stricken district contained confused statements and greatly exaggerated reports of the losses of lives and property. There is little doubt, however, that the earthquake which befell Valparaiso was much more severe than the San Francisco disaster. The familiar stories of the shooting of hundreds of looters; of tidal waves that engulfed entire towns; of the sinking of islands into the sea, including "Robinson Crusoe's" island, were also like the San Francisco canards, and may be safely discredited.

Dispatches to the State Department at Washington place the fatalities at Valparaiso at 500. Property losses are under $100,000,000. There were few casualties in Santiago, the capital city of Chile, while the amount of property destroyed is placed at $2,000,000. Among the places reported to have been damaged or destroyed are Vina del Mar, a city of 12,000, three miles from Valparaiso; Quilque and Limache, a city of 4,000 persons, both in Valparaiso province; Quillota, six miles from Valparaiso; Illapel, 5,000 people, 130 miles northwest of Santiago; Vallemar, 5,000 persons, 300 miles north of Santiago, and other small towns.

The first days after the earthquake the populace abandoned their dwellings and fled to the hills and plazas, or sought refuge in the open country. Recurring quakes, heavy rain, and electric storms rendered their distress terrible. There has been a scarcity of drinking water and the lighting and fuel question has also been a serious one. From Valparaiso to Santiago, a distance of eighty miles, desolation prevails.

It is difficult to connect the Chilean with the California earthquake when we note that Valparaiso lies further eastward than New York and is 5,500 miles distant from San Francisco. But Sir Joseph Norman Lockyer, director of the Solar Physics Observatory, Kensington, says that it is a remarkable fact that the earthquakes at San Francisco and Valparaiso synchronized with a sun-spot maximum.

Relief for the Chileans was prompt, and San Francisco was the first to send aid. For her citizens to gather in her ruins, and to contribute out of their meagre purses to a stricken sister city thousands of miles away, is indeed a fine and ennobling spectacle.

Valparaiso had a population of 150,000 and was the most flourishing port of Western South America. Viewed from the entrance to the bay on which it is situated, Valparaiso resembles a huge amphitheatre. What might be termed the arena of the amphitheatre would be the city, a narrow strip of ground averaging a distance of three-quarters of a mile from the water front to the base of the hills. This flat land is practically all made land. It is only slightly above the level of the bay and the Chilean government has felt the danger from a tidal wave; only recently it voted $20,000,000 to build a protecting breakwater. Houses in Valparaiso and Santiago are built to withstand earthquakes. They are made of stone, with thick walls, and are seldom more than two stories high. They are therefore not very combustible.

Supervisors and Library Site.

The San Francisco Supervisors are making an attempt to seize the public library site on Van Ness avenue and cover it with a new city hall. An ordinance to that effect was passed unanimously, and the Board of Works has been instructed to proceed with the construction. Unavailing protests and objections were made before the board, the Public Library Trustees and public-spirited citizens denying the right of the supervisors to the land, and pointing out the unwisdom of such a seizure. The title to the land is vested in the Trustees of the Public Library, in trust for the people. After much difficulty and tedious negotiations the site in controversy was purchased with money secured by the sale of bonds; the bonds were authorized by a vote of the citizens, but for the specific purpose of investment in a library site; the Public Library Trustees are vested by the city's charter with the care and responsibility of all library property, and can not alienate its land.

With numerous other sites available for a city hall, all free from legal entanglements and public opposition to their use, it is hard to understand the action of the supervisors. The library trustees are right in their contention, and should vigorously protect the property of the library from encroachment. Beyond any question, the courts will confirm their title to the land, and public sentiment will approve their determined efforts to resist this attempt to seize and divert it. This Falstaffian army of supervisors evidently believes that it is "we the people." It thinks that with its petty powers of policing the city it can override the courts and the organic law. It will find out its error.

Crooked Cockney Companies Losing Business.

Already the crooked cockney companies are beginning to get their reward. They have sowed the wind, and we sincerely hope that they are going to reap the whirlwind. It is coming a little sooner than we expected, but all the better.

These remarks are based on the fact that the Commercial Union, Palatine, and Alliance Companies of London made application at the meeting of the Board of Fire Underwriters last week to be permitted to cut rates. Such an open avowal of their heavy falling-off in new business they never would have made were not this loss a most alarming one. Through their manager they asked the board to allow them to fix a rate twenty per cent below the regular fire insurance rate. This cut rate was to be restricted to companies having an "earthquake clause," their representative intimating that it was useless for them to try to get business at the same rates as the fair-dealing companies.

So the crooked cockney companies now want to offer bargain-counter insurance at cut rates. We doubt whether they would find the expedient a success. In a community which has not suffered from the tortuous methods of the crooked companies, it might go. But not here. Insurers in this city want insurance that insures. In New York or Philadelphia, where people have not been ruined by a great conflagration, they might be willing to buy cheap insurance, even at the risk of being bunkoed. But not here. We are willing to pay our good money for good insurance, but when we are burned out we want our just due.

The members of the Board of Fire Underwriters were not disposed to yield to the appeal of the crooked companies. We do not see why they should. If crooked companies are allowed to welch on their liabilities, to do up their old policy holders, and to get the assistance of the honest underwriters in naming over new policy holders for their gold-brick insurance, we think the honest underwriters would be more foolish than we give them credit for being.

From this plaintive pass-up of the crooked cockney companies it is evident that they are being boycotted by the insuring public. We hope the boycott may continue until they are driven out of San Francisco, of California, and out of the United States.

Chinese Labor at Panama.

The announcement that the Panama canal commission is about to secure 2,500 Chinese laborers on the work as an experiment, has called forth a chorus of editorial comment. "Those editors who defend the employment of the Chinese," remarks the New York World, "will find their task easy on the practical side. On the political side the defense is hopeless. The Canal Zone is or it is not a part of the United States. If it is not, we have no sovereign rights in it, the importation of Chinese labor or of any other labor whatever is unlawful." The Chicago Chronicle believes the labor leaders will gain nothing by attacking the commission in the newspapers. "The American people wish to have the canal constructed and they are inclined to pay more for the work than they receive," says the Springfield Union. "It does not menace a single laboring man within the confines of the United States or its possessions. American labor does not work on the Isthmus. American labor could not work on the Isthmus." "Here at last," cries the Pittsburg Post, "is presented the sight of the United States of America working bonded slaves on the Isthmus canal." On the other hand, the Washington Statesman of the opinion that "there is nothing in the proposition at all violative of the spirit of the Chinese Exclusion law." The Pittsburg Dispatch can not see the difference between employing Jamaicans and employing Chinese, but the Springfield Republican asks if the proposition would not be a violation of the Chinese Exclusion act. To the latter objection Theodore Shonts replies: "I can only say that the Commission had secured the opinion of the highest legal authorities of the government. It has been held that the law does not apply to the canal zone." A Washington correspondent of the New York Evening Post says: "The government put in the attitude of repulsing Chinese laborers from the shores and at the same time asking them to come to the Isthmus and do work for us. Only 2,500 coolies asked for now. Fifteen thousand is the limit which the Commission has fixed." Then fifteen thousand more, the number ultimately coming from the Canal Zone of the United States, believes the Argonaut.

Fire Cisterns in San Francisco.

There are fifty-seven fire-protection cisterns in parts of San Francisco, many of which have been put up or in other ways put out of service. They have a combined capacity for 2,000,000 gallons of water. There are twenty-four of them now full and fit for use, ten are cracked and leaky, but could easily be repaired to service, and the remaining twelve are out of commission. During the great fire, the saving of property in the blocks in the Mission district was due in a large measure to the use made of the 100,000 gallons of water stored in the two cisterns located at Nineteenth and Folsom streets. Twenty-second and Shotwell streets. Less extensive use was also made of the 30,000-gallon cistern at Dupont and California and that containing 10,000 gallons at California and Mason streets. It is the duty of the light, water, railroad and telephone companies to be responsible for the filling up of the cisterns. The Supervisors' Fire Committee will endeavor to get the corporations to restore the cisterns to use. Chief Shaughnessy of the Fire Department urges only should this be done at once, but also that many more cisterns be constructed at the earliest possible moment. He asks for one large enough to contain 10,000 gallons of water to be located under the sidewalk at every Market street gore, and that others of equal size be built every two blocks apart in the Mission. The material to be reinforced concrete.

The Bryan Reception.

Twenty thousand people crowded into Madison Square Garden on Thursday evening, August 30, to hear the addresses in welcome of William Jennings Bryan, just returned from a tour of the world, and to hear Mr. Bryan's extended political response. Governor Fair, of Missouri, was the first to speak on the platform, and he introduced Mayor Tom L. Johnson of Cleveland, Ohio, as chairman of the meeting. The entire affair was under the auspices of the Commercial Travelers' Anti-Trust League. Mr. Bryan appeared after the audience waited an hour or more, and was greeted with cheering cheers and applause that continued for several minutes. In this connection it is worthy of note that William R. Hearst had been cheered for two minutes when he entered the box that had been reserved for him. In expressing his opinion upon the various subjects presented, Mr. Bryan said that they were personal views and not an attempt to forecast the policy of his party. The election of United States senators by direct vote of the people; regulation of the trusts by the Government; universal eight-hour day; settlement of all international disputes by arbitration, rather than by resort to force, and revision of the tariff, were his chief points. Government ownership of trunk lines and State ownership of local railroads, and a graded income tax were also discussed. Mr. Bryan has announced that he will remain at home indefinitely from this time, as he is tired of travel. That he will be busily engaged in the Congressional campaigns being assured.

Loss of the Manchuria.

The Pacific Mail liner Manchuria ran upon a coral reef in the bay of Waimanalo, on the eastern coast of Oahu, Hawaiian Islands, at 4:20 o'clock on the morning of August 20th. Her commander, Captain J. W. Gardner, was ten miles off his course. In the blackness of night with the course ahead obscured by a mist which obliterated the shore line, the Manchuria came to a bad stop upon an almost even keel about 1500 feet from shore. The spot where the Manchuria grounded was a "sand patch" on the reef. The confusion had scarcely been enough to awake the cabin passengers. Beyond some excitement among the Chinese in the steerage there was no panic among the Manchuria's passengers. They were landed by the tugboat J. A. Cummins, and were then taken by flat cars, automobiles and tally-hos to Honolulu. Major-General James F. Smith was among those on board the liner when she struck. The 200 stranded passengers are being cared for in Honolulu until other liners can take them to their destination. The Hong Kong Maru of the Japanese line took on board eight on August 30th, and the Korea on September 10th can take forty-two.

The disaster is said to be the most serious financial in the history of the Pacific Mail. The Manchuria cost $2,500,000. Since the Pacific Mail Company began business it has lost thirty-four steamers, mainly on the Panama run. Had there been a light on Makapuu Point the accident would probably not have occurred. Congress appropriated $60,000 for a light there, but instructions were not received to prepare the light until the day after the Manchuria grounded.

Revenue from High License.

On April 17th there were 3500 saloons in San Francisco paying $84 a year for licenses, netting the city $294,000. There are now 1438 liquor dealers under the new law, $125 a quarter. It is estimated that by the end of the quarter, September 30th, 60 licenses will have been paid which will bring yearly revenue of $800,000. Thus, the city is receiving about three times the amount of revenue for less than one-half the number of saloons. The law makes no distinction between one kind of liquor dealer and another. The restaurant keeper who formerly got off with $5 a quarter or less, is now paying as much as the man with a bar.

Hoke Smith's Victory.

Hoke Smith's overwhelming victory at the recent primaries in Georgia to determine who should be the nominee for Governor came as a surprise to politicians. Smith is not a popular man in Georgia, nor even in his own city of Atlanta. His bitter fight against the railroads won him the victory. It is feared that Smith will press his plan of disfranchising the negro vote, which will make the relations between the whites and the blacks more strained. In Georgia the school funds are divided between the whites and the blacks, though the latter are able to contribute only a small portion of it. It is proposed to change this system and give the negroes only their proportionate share. This, of course, will result in closing many of the country schools now maintained for negro children. Smith's present success will mean a new political ascendancy in Georgia. Clark Howell, Smith's strongest antagonist in the fight for Governor, has been in politics ever since he has been entitled to a vote, and this is his first defeat. Smith's election is assured.

Workmen for San Francisco.

Recently the Argonaut printed an editorial paragraph concerning the scarcity of labor in San Francisco, and the unusually high wages paid at present to mechanics here. Judging from the number of letters of inquiry coming to this office, the paragraph is receiving a wide circulation. Last week we printed several letters, and this week an additional number is to hand. They come from all over the country, as the few we select for publication will show. The first is from a manufacturing town in Connecticut:

New Milford, Conn. Aug 12, 06.

Gentleman
Will you please send me a sample of the San Francisco Argonaut. A Sunday edition if you have one if not a weakly, and oblige
M. D. Miles
Engineer N. M. H. Co
do you know of any one who wants to hire a good stationary engineer or electrician

From another New York City letter it is apparent that the sobriquet "Frisco" is bidding fair to completely dispossess our original title in the minds of the uneducated. As may be seen by this epistle the writer thinks that San Francisco is properly called "San Frisco":

To The Editor of the
San Francisco Argonaut

Dr Sir
Pardon the liberty I take in writing to you. Having seen a clipping of your paper saying that labor is wanted in your city I would ask you to let me know if a man of several years experience as superintendent of all kinds of concrete construction and deep excavation could find a position in your city. I can give the best references from Eng and contractors. I could also get other mechanics to go that if needed such as carpenters hoisting engineers and iron workers. I would be pleased if you would give my address to some big contracting firm.
Yours truly

The Southern Pacific was looking for good section bosses a few weeks ago. One writes from "up State" New York:

W. C. Whitfield
Box 573,
69 Orange Ave.,
Walden N. Y.

Aug. 17, 06

Dear Sir:

Reading in a cutting from your valuable paper that men were scarce in your city, could you put me into communication with a Reliable firm who wants good smart men. I am wishing a position at about $15.00 or $16.00 per week as Section Boss or Labour Foreman. Hustler & good at Handling men 12 months Ref. from present Employer. Will come at once if you could place me with Reliable Firm. Would pay what you charge for trouble.
May be able to bring a few smart men with me if they would be sure of work.

Trusting that I may hear from you,
Faithfully yrs. W. C. Whitfield.

This letter is apparently from an agency which can supply laborers:

Enid, Oklahoma, Aug. 16, 1906.

San Francisco Argonaut,
Gentlemen:
Having noticed in a clipping from your paper. The labor Situation in your city.
If you can put us in communication with labor contractors we could induce a few hundred laborers to go to that city for employment.
Very truly yours,

M. V. Bryant.

The last letter which we shall print to-day is evidently from a workman of a much higher grade than any of the foregoing. We may remark that these letters are printed verbatim not with any desire to mock at illiterate men, but in order to show their status in point of mental as well as manual training. This letter is also printed verbatim, and it is much better written, spelled, and punctuated than the letters of many candidates for positions as "office men":

Raleigh, N. C. Aug. 16, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:

Dear Sir:

I lately noticed in a daily paper here, a quotation from your sheet, stating that there is a great demand in your city, and high wages paid, for skilled labor. I would like to have you place this letter in the hand of some firm who wishes to employ a good man in my line—sheet metal cornices, metal ceilings, ventilators, etc. I have been Supt. of a large shop for over two years, am thoroughly competent to take charge of any jobbing shop, command the highest wages paid in this part of the country. Being desirous of seeing the far west, and at the same time better my financial condition, would like to secure a position in San Francisco.
Yours truly, J. E. Stevick,
317 S. Dawson St. Raleigh N. C.

These are a few of the many letters reaching the Argonaut. These few have been selected more for oddity than anything else. If San Francisco's needs were printed in journals going among the working classes they would meet with a wide-spread response. The Argonaut is distinctly a journal of the well-to-do, and probably it is not much read by mechanics and laboring men. If its little editorial paragraph should have met with such marked attention, consider what would be the result of a call for mechanics in newspapers which fall under their observation. Such a concerted movement on the part of the merchants, employers, builders and contractors of San Francisco, using the cheap newspapers of the world's large cities, would speedily bring to San Francisco many thousands of workmen, skilled and unskilled.

It must be understood that the Argonaut, in its suggestions in the line of bringing workmen to San Francisco, is by no means inspired by unfriendly feelings toward those at present here. If they are honest and generous minded men, they should be willing to help their distressed city by urging other workmen to come here. Doubtless they are willing. They would also help other workmen in other cities by enabling them to secure employment at much higher wages than they are receiving now.

In the Kremlin at Moscow, among the treasures and trophies of the Romanoffs, are gold plate and jewels enough to support the entire Russian nation for some time, but who could turn them into bread and meat if the doors were broken down and the vaults were stripped of their contents? asks W. E. Curtis, in a recent letter to the Chicago Record-Herald. In the vaults of the national bank are said to be several hundred millions of rubles, which might be reached if the military squads were corrupted, but that would not satisfy a hungry child. Thus far in the cities the mobs of Russia have disturbed neither public nor private property, except in the attacks upon the Jews, but in the country hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of property has been destroyed, including plate, china, pictures, libraries. Even the breeding stallions belonging to Prince Orloff, on what is perhaps the most famous breeding farm in all the world, were hamstrung.

OLD FAVORITES.

[A semi-centennial celebration of the battle of Osawatimie was begun August 29th in that Kansas town, the one-time home of John Brown. While the battle of Osawatimie was but a skirmish when compared with the many conflicts that followed, it was there that the advocates of abolition made their first stand against slavery, and more than ordinary interest surrounds the place. Hundreds came from other places to attend the celebration, and Vice-President Fairbanks was one of the speakers.]

John Brown of Osawatimie.

John Brown in Kansas settled, like a steadfast Yankee farmer.
 Brave and godly, with four sons—all stalwart men of might.
 There he spoke aloud for Freedom, and the border-strife grew warmer.
 Till the Rangers fired his dwelling, in his absence, in the night.
 And Old Brown, Osawatimie Brown,
 Came homeward in the morning—to find his house burned down.
 Then he grasped his trusty rifle, and boldly fought for Freedom;
 Smote from border unto border the fierce, invading band;
 And he and his brave boys vowed—so might Heaven help and speed 'em!—
 They would save those grand old prairies from the curse that blights the land;
 And Old Brown, Osawatimie Brown,
 Said, "Boys, the Lord will aid us!" and he shoved his ramrod down.
 And the Lord did aid these men; and they labored day and even,
 Saving Kansas from its peril, and their very lives seemed charmed;
 Till the ruffians killed one son in the blessed light of Heaven—
 In cold blood the fellows slew him, as he journeyed all unarmed;
 Then Old Brown, Osawatimie Brown,
 Shed not a tear, but shut his teeth, and frowned a terrible frown!
 Then they seized another brave boy—not amid the heat of battle,
 But in peace, behind his ploughshare—and they loaded him with chains,
 And with pikes, before their horses, even as they goad their cattle,
 Drove him, cruelly, for their sport, and at last blew out his brains;
 Then Old Brown, Osawatimie Brown,
 Raised his right hand up to Heaven, calling Heaven's vengeance down.
 And he swore a fearful oath, by the name of the Almighty,
 He would hunt this ravaging evil that had scathed and torn him so;
 He would seize it by the vitals; he would crush it day and night; he Would so pursue its footsteps—so return it blow for blow—
 That Old Brown, Osawatimie Brown,
 Should be a name to swear by, in backwoods or in town!
 Then his beard became more grizzled, and his wild blue eye grew wilder,
 And more sharply curved his hawk's nose, snuffing battle from afar;
 And he and the two boys left, though the Kansas strife waxed milder,
 Grew more sullen, till was over the bloody Border War.
 And Old Brown, Osawatimie Brown,
 Had gone crazy, as they reckoned by his fearful glare and frown.
 So he left the plains of Kansas and their bitter woes behind him,
 Slipped off into Virginia, where the statesmen all are born,
 Hired a farm by Harper's Ferry, and no one knew where to find him,
 Or whether he'd turned parson, or was jacketed and shorn;
 For Old Brown, Osawatimie Brown,
 Mad as he was, knew texts enough to wear a parson's gown.
 He bought no ploughs and harrows, spades and shovels, or such trifles;
 But quietly to his rancho there came by every train, boxes full of pikes and pistols, and his well-beloved Sharp's rifles;
 And eighteen other madmen joined their leader there again.
 Says Old Brown, Osawatimie Brown,
 "Boys, we've got an army large enough to march and whip the town!"
 "Take the town, and seize the muskets, free the negroes, and then arm them;
 Carry the County and the State, ay, and all the potent South;
 On their own heads be the slaughter, if their victims rise to harm them—
 These Virginians! who believed not, nor would heed the warning mouth."
 Says Old Brown, Osawatimie Brown,
 "The world shall see a Republic, or my name is not John Brown!"
 'Twas the sixteenth of October, on the evening of a Sunday,
 "This good work," declared the captain, "shall be on a holy night!"
 It was on a Sunday evening, and, before the noon of Monday,
 With two sons, and Captain Stephens, fifteen privates—black and white,
 Captain Brown, Osawatimie Brown,
 Marched across the bridged Potomac and knocked the sentry down;
 Took the guarded armory-building, and the muskets and the cannon;
 Captured all the county majors and the colonels, one by one;
 Scared to death each gallant scion of Virginia they ran on,
 And before the noon of Monday, I say, the deed was done.
 Mad Old Brown, Osawatimie Brown,
 With his eighteen other crazy men went in and took the town.
 Very little noise and bluster, little smell of powder, made he;
 It was all done in the midnight, like the emperor's coup d'état;

"Cut the wires! Stop the rail-cars! Hold the streets and bridges!" said he.
 Then declared the new Republic, with himself for guiding star.

This Old Brown, Osawatimie Brown;
 And the bold two thousand citizens ran off and left the town.

Then was riding and railroading and expressing here and thither;
 And the Martinsburg Sharpshooters and the Charlestown Volunteers
 And the Shepherdstown and Winchester militia hastened whither
 Old Brown was said to muster his ten thousand grenadiers!

General Brown, Osawatimie Brown;
 Behind whose rampant banner all the North was pouring down.

But at last, 'tis said, some prisoners escaped from Old Brown's durand,
 And the effervescent valor of the Chivalry broke out.
 When they learned that nineteen madmen had the marvelous assurance—
 Only nineteen—thus to seize the place and drive them straight about;

And Old Brown, Osawatimie Brown,
 Found an army come to take him, encamped around the town.

But to storm with all the forces we have mentioned, was too risky;
 So they hurried off to Richmond for the government marines.

Tore them from their weeping matrons, fired their souls with Bourbon whisky,
 Till they battered down Brown's castle with their ladders and machines;
 And Old Brown, Osawatimie Brown,
 Received three bayonet stabs, and a cut on his brave old crown.

Tallyho! the old Virginia gentry gather to the baying!
 In they rushed and killed the game, shooting lustily away;
 And whenever they slew a rebel, those who came too late for slaying,
 Not to lose a share of glory, fixed their bullets in his clay;

And Old Brown, Osawatimie Brown,
 Saw his sons fall dead beside him, and between them laid him down.
 How the conquerors wore their laurels; how they hastened on the trial;
 How Old Brown was placed, half-dying, on the Charlestown courthouse floor;
 How he spoke his grand oration, in the scorn of all denial;
 What the brave old madman told them—these are known the country o'er.

"Hang Old Brown, Osawatimie Brown,"
 Said the judge, "and all such rebels!" with his most judicial frown.
 But, Virginians, don't do it! for I tell you that the flagon,
 Filled with blood of Old Brown's offspring, was first poured by Southern hands;

And each drop from Old Brown's life-veins, like the red gore of the dragon,
 May spring up a vengeful Fury, hissing through your slave-worn lands!
 And Old Brown, Osawatimie Brown,
 May trouble you more than ever, when you've nailed his coffin down!

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Aloha.

Honolulu, T. H., July 26, 1906.—Please find P. O. money order for one year's subscription. I regret that conditions do not warrant me in remitting for twenty years in advance. The Argonaut richly merits it.
 A protest, please, against your reported intention to remove from the Pacific Coast to New York. [An unfounded statement.—Ed.] As a reader of your journal for more than twenty-four years, I would remind you that California in the past has been a good enough place for the publication of even so excellent a paper as the Argonaut, and to the Golden State you must attribute whatever of fame and influence has been attained or been acquired by your publication. California, in spite of her heavy calamity, in the destruction of her queen city, is no less worthy today than formerly, of all that has contributed or can contribute to her reputation.
 Among the things that have so contributed, I feel that the Argonaut is by no means the least. Stay with the Golden State, and it will stay with you, as it has in the past. Such is the wish and hope of,
 Yours very cordially,
 C. W. Ashford.

From China.

Chefoo, July 26, 1906.—As an old subscriber it gives me great pleasure to forward case containing all the old copies of the Argonaut that I have saved from 1896 up to the great fire in April last. I hope that they will be of use to you for filling up incomplete volumes.
 Trusting that these copies may be of use to you, and wishing you renewed prosperity,
 Yours faithfully,
 L. H. Smith.

From Canada.

Ottawa, July 27, 1906.—Enclosed is an express order for the amount of my subscription. I have received every number since the fire, and after reading I send them promptly to my boy in South Africa, who greets them like an old friend. Long life to the Argonaut.
 Yours sincerely,
 Harma A. Baldwin.

An Advance Subscription.

Missoula, Montana, August 4, 1906.—I beg to hand you herewith my check for $8.00, for which renew my subscription for a period of two years. For twenty years I have been a subscriber for your paper, and I anticipate that an advance subscription will not be unwelcome at the present time. I therefore subscribe for two years in advance.
 Very respectfully,
 John M. Evans.

His Paper Free.

Oakland, Cal., July 30, 1906.—Enclosed find check for four dollars, covering one year's subscription to the Argonaut. Last week's number was worth this amount, so I get the paper one year free. With best wishes, I am,
 Yours sincerely,
 M. M. Hoffman.

The Argonaut Stays West.

Cleveland August 18, 1906.—A California woman lives in Cleveland recently told me that she had in one of the magazines—I believe she said in Munsey's or the American—the statement that the editor of the San Francisco Argonaut was handling debris, and, being the situation impossible, had decided to remove offices of the Argonaut Publishing Company to New York permanently. As I did not read the announcement so early, I am not able to quote literally, but I was willing to believe that such a thorough-going California spirit as the Argonaut would desert San Francisco this time. I shall continue to feel that I am right in conclusion till I read its contradiction in your columns.
 Yours very truly,
 H. A.

Cleveland, Aug. 20, 1906.—Since my letter to the Argonaut of two days ago, the article from one of the magazines referring to the removal of the Argonaut to the East has come into my hands. I see a Mr. W. is referred to as the editor, a relationship that, not knowing he bore to the Argonaut.

I am sending you the clipping and hope to see denial of this statement in a future issue of your paper to which I wish naught but good, whether it be lished West or East.
 Very truly yours,
 H. A.

In Our Former Garb.

San Salvador, July 14, 1906.—I note with regret all your files and back numbers were destroyed in recent catastrophe. I am glad to be receiving the Argonaut again, and trust it will not be long before we see its well-known, handsome form, as of yore. Aftering the numbers, I forward them to my relation England, who express themselves as delighted as we with the perusal of their contents.
 Yours very truly,
 A. A. Field

From New South Wales.

Condobolin, N. S. W., June 19, 1906.—I enclose herewith £1 money order for my subscription. Permit me express my sincere sympathy for the loss you sust. in the disastrous visitation of April, and also my admiration for the manner in which you have faced situation. But that latter is not strange when on members that the individuals concerned are men of a nation famous for grit and determination. I wish Argonaut and its proprietor every kind of prosperity the future. We in this part of the world have not experienced such a calamity as has befallen Francisco; but droughts (we had one of eight years duration in this part of New South Wales) and fires are unfortunately not unknown, and have help prove that the dwellers in the "back blocks" of state have pluck and perseverance just as the American people have.
 Yours faithfully,

A Twenty-Year Subscriber.

Ashcroft, B. C., August 6, 1906.—I have notice wrapper that my subscription has expired, and thank you for not cutting me off at once. [We two weeks' grace.—Ed.] A sure way of receiving payment from careless subscribers would be to discontinue mailing copies as no one who has read Argonaut for twenty years (like myself) can afford to be without it or lose even one number. I don't care you anything for this advice. To make amends I enclose money order for two years' subscription, at the same time wish you every success, and in future perfect freedom from fires and earthquakes.
 Yours very truly,

Annoying Postal Red Tape.

Otis, Mass., August 15, 1906.—I have not renewed subscription to your excellent paper, and would say my failure to renew the same is due to the fact I have not a settled address at present. I have changed residence four times within the last three months though I have conformed to all the rules of former periodicals when change of address demanded it. I failed to receive any of the publications for which we would like to have that magazine, and perhaps am unwilling to renew any subscriptions until I for the winter.
 I greatly miss your paper, having been a reader for many years. I hope soon to be numbered once more among your subscribers.
 Respectfully,
 Mrs. R. E. Carr

From the Bosphorus.

Constantinople, August 14, 1906.—I wish to thank for the prompt and regular manner in which I received the Argonaut since the great fire in San Francisco. It has been a source of comfort to my wife is from your city.
 In February last, through your clubbing list, we subscribed for the Overland Monthly, but have never received a single copy yet, and if they are "doing business" we would like to have that magazine, and perhaps can have it looked up for us.
 Enclosed is another year's subscription for the Argonaut.
 Sincerely yours,
 R. D. Buckner

Always Time to Read this Paper.

Tacoma, Washington, July 27, 1906.—I thank you calling my attention to the fact that my subscription to the Argonaut expires on the 28th proximo, and it is much pleasure that I enclose herewith draft of $5.00 for $4.00 for another year. I have been a subscriber for the past twenty-five years, and it is one paper that I can always find time to read. Long life to the Argonaut!

Pueblo, Colorado, July 13, 1906.—The enclosed draft to renew my subscription to Argonaut—I think it expires next January.
 The business interests of the country endorse position upon the fire insurance question. The merchants and property owners of San Francisco have suffered enough without being spoiled by dodging and quibbling insurance companies. The insurer pays for indemnity and is entitled to it to the last dollar.
 We are waiting for the list of delinquent companies. All over the country there are thousands who, like ourselves, will give preference to the companies who stand to their contracts. Insurance companies will be gauged by the settlements made in San Francisco. In the end 100 cents on a dollar will prove cheaper 75 cents.

WAS SHE A WOMAN?

Strange Being that a Gay Dragoon Met at Midnight, in the Fog.

Gabriel Deschamps, Captain of Dragoons, in garrison at Compiègne, was of a romantic nature. He easily persuaded himself that all the women adored him, and when he had imbibed a little too much absinthe, which happened quite often, no one was more tender. A perfect conqueror! Physically, he would be called a handsome man, having vivid coloring, thick moustache, red lips, well-shaped nose, and a bright eye. This is the story he told his messmates in the barracks at Compiègne:

"I have a charming friend, with whom I am quite passionately in love, I acknowledge. Three days ago, being at liberty and not knowing how to kill time, I left the barracks with one of my friends—the first lieutenant of my regiment—to take a walk along the river bank. Night commenced to fall, and a villainous fog which could have cut with a knife, rose over the Oise, and threatened quickly to spread over the city.

"I say, Gabriel," exclaimed my friend Dulaurier, "shut your eyes, and let the north wind which is blowing, 'are you so heated that an hour's walking along the river is necessary to cool you off? For my part, I don't enjoy it very much, and if you like, we will go to the Café Chapins and have a glass of punch."

"In faith, no," I replied; "I prefer to go and see you. (I need not tell you that is my friend's name.) You come with me?"

"Yes, indeed," answered Dulaurier; "an hour spent with a pretty woman is always agreeable."

"We proceeded toward the Faubourg Hurtebize, where my friend lives. The distance was quite long, but the expectation of warming ourselves at the blaze of a comfortable hearth was enough to abridge it. Unfortunately we were mistaken in our calculations. Julie was not at home. The servant told us that madame would probably be out, and that she intended to spend the evening at the theatre.

"By my faith," exclaimed Dulaurier, at this bad news, "we are not in luck, and I am going straight to the Café Chapins."

"Let's go by the avenues. It's as short as the Rue de Pierrefonds."

"That is what we did. Scarcely had we advanced a few steps in the cursed avenues, black as coal, thanks to the fog, which was thicker than ever, when I lost sight and sound of my friend Dulaurier. I don't know whether he turned to the right and I to the left, or the reverse, but it is certain that we were separated. I called him. No reply. Without thinking any more about him, and knowing that I would find him again at the Café, I continued my dangerous walk. All at once I felt my foot against something strange, which had no apparent form, and I stooped down to look at it closer. Was it a dog, a stone, or a human being? It moved. I examined it, opening my eyes wide. It was a woman. She was seated at the foot of a tree, covering like a beggar, seeming not to feel the cold, nor to fear the night, nor to notice my presence and scrutiny.

"What are you doing there, madame?" I said. "Are you ill?"

"No," she replied in a faint voice.

"This is not the weather for sleeping in the open air."

"Here or anywhere else, what does it matter?"

"Nevertheless, if you will permit me, madame," I said, "I will offer you my arm."

"Willingly," she said.

"I rose immediately. I offered her my arm, but she did not accept it, and walked by my side. This first part of the adventure already puzzled me somewhat. Impressed by the strange encounter, my mind was confused and unsettled. What was this woman? Would I enjoy an agreeable surprise when I should see her face?

"At the end of five minutes she stopped. 'This is my house,' she said. 'Will it please you to enter?'"

"Although I was far from expecting such a proposition, nevertheless I accepted with alacrity, determined not to leave her before I had seen her face.

"The stranger advanced toward her house. The ringing of a bell resounded within, and the doors flew open. On each side of the door stood a servant in mourning, holding a torch of lighted wax. Haughty as a queen she entered before me, and beckoned me to follow her. By the light of the torches I observed that she was completely clothed in black, and that a black veil covered her face.

"You know me, my friends, and you know that the devil himself could not frighten me. Well, I confess to you, with all due humility, that I felt a slight shudder run through me. But I took courage, and entered. The apartment into which I was introduced was magnificently furnished. Rugs covered the inlaid floor, and prevented the sound of footsteps from being heard. Casting my eyes on the clock, I noticed that it was about to strike twelve. At a sign from their mistress the servants went out as quiet as ghosts, after having lighted several wax candles, as large as those of churches, the dull flame of which, however, sent forth only a faint light around us.

"I was alone with her. After motioning me to sit down beside her on the sofa, she raised her veil. I was dazzled at the sight of her face, and all my uneasiness and fears before that brilliant apparition, scattered in an instant. An angel, a demon, if you will, but a superb woman. I lost my senses. Now do you want me to tell you what passed between us? I know nothing about it, on my honor. I only remember that in pressing her hand in mine I felt the same sensation as in touching marble. I remember that her eyes, so soft, were fixed and motionless, and yet she looked at me with such an air of interest that I felt at her feet. All at once I heard the clock strike twelve. This sharp noise seemed funeral in the silence.

"I quickly rose, without knowing why. Turning my eyes toward the fireless chimney, I saw the mirrors becoming opaque as if covered with black cloth, the hangings being darkened like the mirrors, and the candles gradually going out. Dazed by this phantasmagoria, I looked for my unknown companion. Gone! The servants—gone! I sprang forward. The street door opened before me, and I rushed out of that diabolical den without being able to explain to myself how I entered it, nor why I had just left it.

"I was perspiring profusely, and wanted to wipe my forehead, but I could not find my handkerchief. The fresh air having restored me to my senses, and being anxious to investigate this affair, which was beyond my comprehension, I drew my sword, and cut a deep notch in the mysterious house, which is situated on the Rue de Pierrefonds, as I made sure.

"You can imagine how much I needed rest and quietness, after such an adventure, so I returned to my room. The next day, when I related this singular story to Dulaurier he shrugged his shoulders, and when I offered to show him the house he treated me as if I were crazy. However, he ended by agreeing to accompany me in my search. Nothing was easier than to find the house again, as I had marked it with an ineffaceable sign. We were greatly astonished at seeing the window-shutters fastened tight, the rusted hinges of the door, and all the appearances of a deserted house. I rang the bell. No answer. Impatient at this failure, I rang again so violently that a neighbor opened his window.

"What do you want?"

"The lady who lives in this house," I replied.

"She died two years ago," said the neighbor, "and since then the house has been empty."

"Impossible!"

"If you have come to buy it," continued the neighbor, "apply at No. 12. There is a gentleman there who will give you the information you want."

"I thanked the obliging neighbor, who shut his window again, and I went immediately to No. 12, with the hope that this person to whom I was directed could help me to unravel the affair, which seemed to become more puzzling since I had determined on solving it. My friend and I presented ourselves at No. 12, and M. Bourdon was wonderfully polite to us as soon as I told him I wanted to buy the property he had for sale.

"It's a good bargain," he said, "and when you have looked at the house—"

"I know the house," I replied.

"You know it?" said he, turning toward me the most astonished look in the world. "Impossible! It is more than six months since I myself have put foot in it, and as I have the keys of the house in my desk—Ah! I beg your pardon," he quickly added; "you were there before the owner's death?"

"I was there yesterday evening," I replied, "and I stayed there about two hours in the company of a charming young lady."

"M. Bourdon suddenly looked at my friend, as if to ask whether I was insane. I understood his meaning, and without being offended I continued, hoping to make him change his mind about me, and wishing to furnish him with the most ample details of my visit.

"I know," said I, in conclusion, "that you place little faith in my words, since I can not give you an exact account of the truth. But there is an unanswerable way of verifying my assertions. On leaving the house in question, I could not find my handkerchief, and I think I remember having left it on the sofa in the salon. Will you come with us and prove it? If we find my handkerchief, what will you say?"

"My dear captain," said M. Bourdon, "I shall say nothing, but I shall sell you the house at your own price."

"I would not have it at any price," I said in a low tone to Dulaurier.

"M. Bourdon did not hesitate to accept my proposition, and on reaching the door, triumphantly pointed out to me cobwebs in the lock.

"Do you give in?"
"Not yet."
"But this door has not been opened for six months."
"I tell you I crossed this threshold yesterday morning."

"We entered. Everything about the mournful house expressed desertion, neglect, solitude. The walls were mouldy, a thick dust covered the floor, the ceilings were cracked, and cobwebs overran the staircase. On entering the salon, the first object that struck my eye was my handkerchief lying on the sofa.

"He paused. After a time he spoke: 'There's my story, my dear friends; what do you think of it?'"

"There was the usual variety of comment from his friends, most of it bantering. Gabriel Deschamps shook his head.

Captain Deschamps was killed six months afterward in battle.

—Translated for the ARGONAUT from the French of Charles Valois.

There was in San Francisco an improvement in the general health of the people after the earthquake, notes the London Hospital. It is an undoubted fact that a great many men and women who were in a poor state of health before the shock, with bad appetites and defective digestion, are now eating all they can get and digesting it without trouble, while the mental condition which so often accompanies the dyspeptic state has equally improved. The explanation is as simple as it is rational. These people were fortunately deprived of their trams, alcohol and luxuries; they had nothing but simple food, and they were compelled to take exercise in the open air to get it. The men have found it possible to live without cigars or whiskey and the ladies without candy. They have cooked their simple meals in the streets, to the better ventilation of their houses; for lack of light they have gone to bed early, with the compensation that they have risen with the lark. They have had the enforced benefits of a sanitarium, and good health is the result.

Owing to so many of the Chicago traction employees rushing off with their cars after an accident, in order that they shall not be used as evidence against the Company, Dr. Maurice F. Doty, City Superintendent of Transportation, has ordered that hereafter police officers must take charge of them for the same reason that they now take charge of bloody instruments, revolvers, knives, or anything else that would tend to show how a person is killed.

There would be something amusing about the refusal of 200 starving laborers to go to work in London if it were not also pathetic, comments the New York Evening Post. When they found that they were to receive 13 cents an hour, they struck at once for 14 cents, and as this was refused, they resolutely walked away—to starve on. The incident shows once more the difficulty of aiding the English unemployed.

A European river forty feet wide handles as much freight as an ordinary American railroad, while the Rhine carries more business to a block than half the Hudson River. Splendid tug-boats, fine barges and handsome swift steamers do the work, with anchored chain boats to pull the big loads up the rapids.

The evidence before the British Army Stores Commissioners as to graft during the Boer War shows that there was only one regiment the contractors were unable to cheat. That proud distinction belongs to the Seventh Hussars. They weighed everything and checked the quality of everything supplied them.

A jeweler, no matter how dishonest, would not steal the jewels in a watch, for they are valueless; they cost only 10 cents apiece. In antique watches the jewels were often costly. In modern watches they are never worth more than $15 a gross.

THE PRESIDENT'S PHONETIC PLUNGE.

Official Endorsement of Spelling Reform---Rozyfelt's
Funny Fonetik Koo day Taw.

On Friday, August 24, President Roosevelt issued orders to Public Printer Stillings that hereafter all messages from the President and all other documents emanating from the White House shall be printed in accordance with the recommendation of the spelling-reform committee headed by Brander Matthews, professor of English in Columbia University. The committee has published a list of three hundred words in which the spelling is reformed. This list contains such words as "thru" and "tho" as the spelling for "through" and "though."

Washington was excited by the order, as every body in the city is affected, directly or indirectly, excepting justices of the supreme court, congressmen, and employees of the legislative branch of the government. The news dispatch announcing the new order goes on to say:

The question immediately arises, will the Public Printer follow the style ordered by the President or will he "follow copy" sent him by Congressmen and Justices of the Supreme Court? If he does he will be violating the style directed to be put into use by no less a person than the President himself. But as for ordinary Government clerks they must reform their orthography and do it with as good grace as possible.

Tho they be lasht to fury, the opponents of this simplified form must make acknowledgement of the logic of the order, address to them, apprising them of the clipt style prest into use to take the place of the accursed system now in such thoro use. They may not express surprise, and should a hiccup disturb the esophagus, no partizan of the old vogue may show himself vexed and no pretty stenographer manifest lacrimal symptoms, lest a subpoena duces tecum be issued for her and her books to show cause why she was not so fast in the new faith. The censor of official dispatches will hang over the heads of such, be they coquetts or otherwise.

The foregoing paragraph indicates in a general way the changes that have been ordered.

All the leading daily papers of the country devoted columns of their next issue to the new order, and almost without exception the President's plan was opposed. Many editors wrote dispassionately and at length, but some found sarcasm and ridicule the weapons most convenient. The New York Evening Mail says:

There is a partial precedent for this course. The executive authority, through the Postoffice Department, has long been simplifying the spelling of American communities, curtailing such cumbersome combinations as "New South East Liberty" and refusing the hospitality of official maps to town names that suggest carnion, mayhem and other offenses to the public nostrils or decorum. Perhaps it is only a logical development of this right for the President to attempt the reformation of names not spelled with capital letters. Anyway, as it can not be stooped, it must be winked at. There is nothing in the constitution to prevent Mr. Roosevelt from loading up his messages with French quotations, knocking the first "e" out of his own name, and somersaulting the "e" in Loeb's name to the hind side of the "b," where it belongs.

The New York World is more biting in its remarks:

So we are to have federal regulation of English spelling by executive decree! It was bound to come. Having regulated motherhood, the beef trust, railroad rates, football, the size of private fortunes, wife-beaters, South America, school teaching, race suicide, the labels on food cans, the Republican party, and muck-rakers, there absolutely was not another thing in sight for President Roosevelt to do. Time was hanging heavy on his hands, so he threw the dictionaries overboard. Artemus Ward lived before his time. Seriously, President Roosevelt is doing great harm to the cause of education and the working custom of uniformity by indulging his freakish impulse to set up new standards. More than that, he makes himself a laughing stock.

A more dignified criticism appears in the St. Paul Pioneer Press:

President Roosevelt does not often make himself ridiculous; but he goes far in doing so when he orders the adoption of the so-called "reformed" spelling in the printing of White House documents. Probably he will be one of the first to discover the fact, and will quietly revoke or modify the order when he has had a little experience in the embarrassments occasioned by the attempt to change the established usages of our language. It is altogether probable that this little action of President Roosevelt's will do more to lessen the thorough-going esteem with which the educated people of the country have regarded him than any number of honest political mistakes. Every time a White House document bearing the hated symbols of crankery in spelling is thrust upon them, they will be irritated and annoyed. Many of them may even refuse to read documents of his which now command a reading everywhere. And a number will be stirred to a spirit of hostile criticism.

Even in England the President's conversion to Carnegie's scheme of forcing changes in spelling is made a leading topic of comment. A cable dispatch gives this summary of the criticisms printed:

It is somewhat startling to find in the English press such epithets as "anarchist" applied to the President of the United States, in place of the unbridled eulogy with which he has been lauded for the past two years.

Every newspaper in London to-day turns its heaviest editorial guns upon Roosevelt, and all because he ventured to touch with profane pen the most sacred of Anglo-Saxon possessions, the English language. They are all in accord for once with George Bernard Shaw, who said recently: "It took the combined efforts of Peter the Great, Julius Caesar, and Pope Gregory to revise the calendar. How, therefore, can Carnegie, with all his millions, even possibly, with the assistance of Prime Minister Campbell-Bannerman, hope to revise the English language?" And Mr. Shaw now adds: "There has been nothing like it since Noah reformed the calendar by making the calendar consist of twelve lunar months. It serves us right."

Among the most progressive of educators in the United States, the President's effort for reform is not received with enthusiasm, though there are some tepid endorsements of the new scheme of spelling:

Dr. Charles W. Dibney, of the University of Cincinnati, said neither Carnegie's cash nor Roosevelt's command can make the English language over again. United States Commissioner of Education Ellsworth Brown, at Washington, says the change is inevitable and not without precedent, since the German Government sanctioned a number of spelling reforms some fifteen or twenty years ago.

Professor Charles McMillan, of Princeton University, remarks that when we change our words and spell them phonetically we lose their origin. When we do that we will have to begin all over.

Prof. James Morgan Hart, head of the English department of Cornell University, said:

"We must first secure uniform pronunciation before we can hope to have a successful system of phonetic spelling. For that reason the proposed new spelling will not be phonetic, but will consist merely in the cutting off of unnecessary letters, as 'program' for 'programme.' Only between 200 and 300 words will be affected. I think that the change should be made very gradually. I can't say that I dislike the innovation, but the men at the head of it are not recognized leaders and do not command a very extensive following. I think President Roosevelt was a bit hasty in adopting the so-called phonetic system for his state documents."

A Boston dispatch declares that the publishing houses are visibly disturbed by the agitation:

It is not so funny to text-book printers centering here. They see ruin staring them in the face if the school boards should take up the matter throughout the country. "It would ruin all book publishers," said the representative of Ginn & Co. "All books now published as standard text-books would have to be changed. It would cost millions to make the changes."

The Boston Herald's special dispatch from Washington on the President's simplified spelling order was an immediate adoption of the new spelling. As an illustration the following paragraph is given:

Grate excitement was caused in Washington today by the circulation of a rumor from Oyster Bay that President Roosevelt had issued an edict changing the multiplicity of the word 'the' to 'th' four times nine should be 32, but a rumor somewhat alade by a later dispatch bearing the nuz that the proclamation at this time contemplates only a few hundred alterashuns in the English langwige.

Under date of September 2, when he had noted the wide-spread disturbance created by his order and the comments upon it, the President added a few words of explanation if not of deprecation. He says:

If the slight changes in the spelling of the 300 words proposed wholly or partially meet popular approval, then the changes will become permanent without any reference to what public officials or individual private citizens may feel; if they do not ultimately meet with popular approval they will be dropped, and that is all there is about it. . . . It is not an attempt to do anything far-reaching or sudden or violent, or, indeed, anything very great at all. It is merely an attempt to cast what slight weight that I can properly cast on the side of popular forces which are endeavoring to make our spelling a little less foolish and fantastic.

Tea has been grown in South Carolina for more than ten years, and from time to time reports have been published regarding the experiment. A recent article by Rodney H. True of the United States Department of Agriculture, printed in the American Monthly Review of Reviews, indicates that so far as the questions of climate and soil are concerned the problem is solved. Dr. Charles W. Shepard, who is the real pioneer in the business, and who has enjoyed the co-operation of the department for the last seven years, produces tea on his Summerville place that gives a good yield and that is praised for its delicacy of flavor. The labor question remains however, and it is of great importance, since tea-picking is by hand and tea is produced almost exclusively in the Orient, where labor is very cheap.

The greatest, as well as the commonest, of all cacti is the "soap weed," which grows wherever cacti grow, and which is man's only friend in the great southwestern deserts of the United States and in Mexico. It furnishes always a quantity of water when cut. As its name indicates, it can be manufactured into a soap, perhaps the least alkaline soap ever made, even though the weed itself may grow in the center of an alkali desert. Beer is brewed from it, the Indians make a hemp-like fiber from it, and horses and men can eat parts of it if the spines are cut away. Also, when it shoots up its one great arm skyward, it tops that arm with one of the most gorgeous flowers in the world.

In some of the reigning houses of the old world monarchy is a burden upon the taxpayer, as, for instance, in Belgium, Sweden, Roumania, Bulgaria, Serbia and Greece; but in England, Germany, Austria and Italy the income of the sovereign and of the members of his family is either derived directly from the crown lands, or is defrayed thereby indirectly; as, for instance, in Great Britain. In fact, neither King Edward nor the princes or princesses of his house cost the English taxpayer a single cent, and Professor Masterman was perfectly justified in declaring the other day at Cambridge that "John Bull got his monarchy below cost, and even made a profit on it."

The biggest telescope in the world is the Common telescope, five full feet in diameter, twenty inches wider than the Yerkes. It was constructed ten years ago by Dr. A. A. Common, a well-known astronomer of England, who wanted it for research work. He died soon afterwards and his fine telescope became idle. Two years ago it was purchased by the Harvard College Observatory, which proceeded at once to mount it on the observatory grounds at Cambridge. The work has been necessarily slow, for mounting a great telescope is not like building a house, but it approaches completion.

POLITICO-PERSONAL.

Edward Rosewater, the defeated candidate for Republican Senatorial nomination in Nebraska, died of the Omaha Bee, died suddenly August 31st.

William R. Hearst has returned to New York after a sojourn in the West, and with him comes the announcement that he has bought five automobiles at a cost of $25,000 with which he will soon begin a flying campaign over New York State.

W. J. Bryan declined the proffer of President Mendenhall's private car on his trip from New York to New Haven, Conn. In his letter he said: "I do not think it would be wise to accept favors from the railroad. Let me pay my fare and ride as I usually do."

Henry F. Cochems of Milwaukee, candidate for Congress in the fifth Wisconsin district, has the reputation of being the best all-around student and athlete produced by the Badger State. He was the first who completed the three years' law course of Harvard in two years.

Through the President's son-in-law comes word that Mr. Roosevelt means just what he has said about other terms. Says Congressman Longworth, as reported: "No possible combination of circumstances could lead him to accept another term. His mind is settled and irrevocable on that matter."

Norris Brown, the choice of the Republican State Convention of Nebraska for United States Senator, to succeed Senator Millard, is the present attorney general of the State. He was born in Iowa. George Sheldon, the nominee for governor, is a State senator who is generally recognized as a Republican leader.

There is reported to be a feud between Chief Engineer Stevens and Governor Magoon of the Panama Canal zone. The new regime makes the chief engineer supreme authority on the zone. Heretofore Governor Magoon has been the superior to the man in actual charge of building the canal and he does not fancy yielding his primacy.

James Knox Taylor, supervising architect of the Treasury Department, is one of the busiest men in the country. Two hundred new public buildings were authorized in the closing days of the last congressional session, involving an expenditure of over $20,000,000. Mr. Taylor has supervision of plans and specifications for all these structures and must make a preliminary visit to every proposed site.

James H. Blanchard, candidate for Governor of California on the Prohibitionist ticket, has practiced law for thirty-three years in Los Angeles, twenty-five of which he has been a staunch Prohibitionist. Mr. Blanchard was graduated from the University of Michigan from the literary and law departments in 1870 and 1872, respectively. For four years he was engaged in editing the California Voice.

Frank S. Butterworth, the former Yale football player and athlete, who graduated in 1895, and known as the greatest quarterback that ever played football at Yale, has decided to be a candidate for the nomination on the Republican ticket for State senator for the eighth district of Connecticut. Butterworth was born in Ohio, where his father, Benjamin Butterworth, was for years congressman. Since his graduation Butterworth has been in the brokerage business.

Curiously enough, the thirty vacancies to occur in the United States Senate in 1907 are evenly divided between the two parties. Among the fifteen Democrats there are three—Dubois of Idaho, Clark of Montana, and Gearin of Oregon—who have Republican colleagues. There are none of the retiring Republicans who have Democratic colleagues. Indeed, the 15 States in which the next legislatures will have to choose Senators is not over-encouraging to Democratic west-casters. It runs: Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Delaware, West Virginia, Michigan, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, Kansas, South Dakota and Wyoming.

Anxiety rules in Massachusetts politics. It is declared that Attorney General Moody is to prepare the platform for the State convention, and that it will be approved by President Roosevelt. Governor Guild, who can be renominated if he desires, is quoted as saying that he will ignore the platform if it is a "stand-pat" and make his fight on his own platform. The Republicans have trouble on their hands, but it is as nothing compared to the position of the Democrats. It was presumed that Henry M. Whitney would be the candidate for governor and Congressman Sullivan the candidate for lieutenant governor. But ex-Governor Hughes got into the race somehow and Whitney became angry, threw up his prospective nomination and declared he was out of the game. It is now "up to" DeLoach, who has recently been tickled by a prospective nomination for vice-president on the ticket with Bryan in 1908, to be the candidate. He says he does not want it.

THE LIMITS OF FIRE INSURANCE.

Principles of General Application.

From an essay by F. Harcourt Kitchin, in the August number of The Nineteenth Century, an English magazine, the following extracts are taken, as of particular interest to American readers. While some portions of Mr. Kitchin's article are concerned especially with English law, the paragraphs quoted are applicable generally:

When the citizens of San Francisco were able to turn their thoughts from the present overwhelming disaster to the future rebuilding of their city, they probably for the first time discovered the necessary limitations of fire insurance. I say for the first time, because they must have been very different from the rest of the world if, until then, they had read their insurance policies at all. The perusal of these policies—those of them which are not burned or buried—must in many cases now give their possessors very little satisfaction.

Fire insurance in this country, and all over the world, is based on the common-law principle of pure indemnity—the principle that no one shall, if he can be prevented, make a profit out of a fire, that he shall recover only the amount of his actual material loss, and that the burden of establishing the fact and the extent of his loss shall be upon the person insured.

If I have a life policy for £5,000 and I die, my heirs can, on proof of death and their title, receive over the counter £5,000 at least, possibly more if there are any "bonuses." If I have a ship and I insure her at Lloyd's or with marine insurance companies for £5,000, I can recover the full £5,000 at once should my ship be totally lost. But if I insure my house against fire for £5,000 I cannot recover £5,000 unless it should happen that I can prove the house to be worth fully that sum. All that I am entitled to demand is the actual value of my house immediately before it was burned, and I must give every assistance to the insurance company in order that the actual value may be justly determined. By statute the insurance company has the power to institute that house (as far as the sum insured will go) instead of paying me anything, and third parties interested also have the right to call upon the insurance company to rebuild my house.

A fire insurance policy is not only a contract of indemnity, it is also a personal contract. It is not an insurance on a building or on goods, but an indemnity to the person who insures the building or goods, and then only to the extent of what is called his "insurable interest." The doctrine that no one can effect a valid insurance on any property except to the extent of his pecuniary interest in that property is common to all insurances, though marine underwriters and companies largely ignore it in practice.

Then, again, if I have contracted to sell my house, between the contract of sale and completion of the purchase there may be, and often is, a hiatus in the insurance protection unless the conditions in the insurance policy deal with the point or care is taken to secure protection. The contents of buildings are removable, and within the complete control of the persons insured. But it should be clearly understood that an insurance policy is an indemnity strictly limited by place. The goods to be covered must be in the premises described in the insurance policy—or allowed by subsequent changes in the contract—either in one building (an ordinary insurance) or in two or more specified buildings (a floating insurance). If goods are removed, even though it may be temporarily to an adjacent building, then they will not be covered unless the adjacent building has been specified and allowed by the policy, or by endorsement on the policy.

The limitations of fire insurance arise in two ways: (1) From the common-law principle of personal indemnity or actual direct loss on which the whole contract is based; and (2) from the clauses or conditions expressed in the policies themselves. The first includes, to a large extent, the second, and is much the more important. Hence, curiously enough, it is much more important to understand fully the nature of the contract than to study the policies in close verbal detail. If the principles are understood, then it will be seen that the greater part of the clauses and conditions in the policies merely give instructions to the insured, and provide machinery for carrying out in practice the principle of personal indemnity.

To some extent, of course, every fire insurance contract involves a sharing of loss, because, by the principle of indemnity, all indirect loss is thrown upon the person who suffers from the fire, and he has in addition to make up with much inconvenience for which no indemnity is offered. It is this undescribed and indefinite loss through a fire which tends to make people anxious not to have fires. But in addition to this unexpressed, though implied, sharing of loss, there is, in mercantile contracts, a specific apportionment of loss between the person insured and the insurance office, and this apportionment is called the principle of "average." In essence the principle of average is most equitable, and there is little reason, except custom, why it should be confined, as it is, to certain classes of insurance. The principle of average is this: when a property is insured for less than its real value (at the time of the fire), then the person insured shall share in any loss or damage in proportion to the amount which he elects to leave uninsured. If I have goods in a warehouse, which, at the time of a fire, are worth £10,000, and my insurance amounts to £8,000 only, then I must pay (or lose) two-tenths of any fire damage, and the insurance company will be liable for eight-tenths only. The principle is a penalty on under-insurance, and leaves those who choose to under-insure to do so at their own risk. As the insurance office only receives premiums on the portion of the value insured, it declines to be liable for more than the pro rata portion of the damage done by a fire.

The loss caused by every fire is a dead loss; no recovery of that loss is possible. All that insurance companies do is to spread the loss over a wide area. As the community as a whole must lose by every fire, whoever pays for it, any institutions which by their system or by their rules make fires inconvenient and enforce precautions against them are doing a great, almost inestimable, public service. And there is no doubt at all that the fire insurance offices have, by their system of indemnity and by their collective efforts—call them a "ring," if you please—done more to keep down fires, and to preserve property from loss, than all the efforts, for generations, of legislatures and municipalities. The consistent, even remorseless, penalizing of bad risks, bad construction and equipment, and the concessions in respect of lower premiums to good risks, good construction and equipment, enforced year after year and generation after generation, have brought about an immense reduction in the fire risks and improvement in building.

Thumb marks, used for years in police circles as a means of identification, and a favorite agency of writers of detective stories in unraveling mysteries, may supplant the time-honored "his mark" in the signing of checks. The installation of the thumb-mark system of pay-checks is being considered by the paymasters in some of the largest industrial concerns and railroads in Chicago. According to the new system, a man can not sign his name. He places an impression of his right thumb upon the paper as his receipt. The Illinois Steel Company was the first large Chicago concern to study the new method. An incentive was furnished by the forgery of several thousand dollars' worth of their pay checks several months ago.

Enlisted men in the navy have instituted a movement to do away with tattoo marking, which was formerly so popular with sailors. Since the conviction of a Brooklyn man, through the efforts of officers of the Humane Society, for mutilating the arms of a young boy by decorating them with India ink designs, tattooers have shown unwillingness to embellish the bodies of men who are not known to be of age, and as few adults care to have their bodies decorated, the practice may become a thing of the past.

If the great Republic must have a flower, suggests the New Orleans Picayune, why not adopt the tobacco plant (Nicotiana tabacum)? It is a native of this country, and was first found in Virginia. There is nothing sectional or local about the plant, because to-day it is grown in most of the States from Florida and Louisiana to Connecticut, and is now used in every nation on the globe. The tobacco plant bears a very pretty pink blossom.

English people in New Zealand have a rough-and-ready method of anglicizing the Maori or native names. Kete Marae the English always refer to as "Kitty Maria." One of the most formidable Maori rebellions was headed by a chief named Honi Heki, but the British soldiers always called him "Johnny Hickey," and out of this grew the legend or tradition that he was really an Irishman paying off old scores in the guise of a Maori chief.

On Continental railways and the Rhine steamers there is no miscellaneous scrambling for meals. Instead a steward goes through the train or boat and lists the people who want to eat. Each gets a number, and this insures a seat without crowding or delay.

There are no bell-punches or indicators in European street cars. Instead the conductor gives each passenger a little paper receipt for his fare.

EX-AMBASSADOR AND EX-WRESTLER.

Joseph Choate Has a Busy Month at William Muldoon's Rest Cure.

A good many people in New York know that William Muldoon, the ex-wrestler, now conducts a health resort on his own plans and specifications. Ambassador Joseph Choate needed health and went to the resort. Those who have been there say that the rules are stringent, according to the New York World:

"Early to bed and early to rise" is the Muldoon motto, and at 9:30 Mr. Choate found himself, candle in hand, going up to bed. Everybody else went, so he went, too, though he wasn't a bit sleepy.

Next morning promptly at 6 o'clock a maid walked down the long hall on the second floor, knocking at most of the doors.

She passed by two doors; one was Mr. Choate's. But he was wide awake—Mr. Choate isn't used to retiring at 9:30 P. M. He had enjoyed all the sleep he felt he needed. So he arose, dressed and appeared downstairs with a cheery "Good morning."

There was no answering smile on the face of William Muldoon. "Did I knock on your door?" he demanded.

"Why, er—er, no," stammered Mr. Choate, "but I heard the knocking and I thought I'd get up. I was awake anyway."

"Well, you go right back upstairs and go to bed again. You stay there till I knock on your door."

"But, Mr. Muldoon, I—"

"Don't talk back. Go to bed till I call you!"

When he was allowed to rise, an hour later, Mr. Choate was put through some strenuous exercise with a big, heavy, "medicine ball," and then was given an unappreciated cold shower bath, with stern instructions accompanying. Then came a horseback ride and an enforced long walk up a hill in the hot sun. Mr. Choate was lame and stiff when he awoke after a long night of slumber that was not quite balmy enough:

Next morning Mr. Choate wasn't so anxious to rise. He made no answer to the knock of Muldoon.

"I think I'll sleep a little longer," he remarked.

"No you won't," roared Muldoon. "Get up and take your exercise."

Mr. Choate got up. He didn't want to work. But he had to work harder. He had to do more calisthenics and he had to toss the medicine ball longer. And the horseback ride was harder and the walk back further.

This describes a lesson in table etiquette under Muldoon's watchful eye:

He found that the meal consisted of a thick soup, rare roast beef, boiled potatoes, carrots, spinach and fresh peas. He was hungry—far hungrier than he had ever been at any state banquet at Guildhall or Buckingham Palace.

He ate everything on his plate except the potatoes. Then he turned to the black-garbed waitress who stood at his elbow.

"A little more of the beef, if you please," said Mr. Choate.

Now, the girl had her orders, but how dared she brook a man who had represented 80,000,000 sovereign people at the court of their Majesties, Queen Victoria and Edward VII? There was a prompt roar from Muldoon, the inexorable.

"Tell him to empty his plate before he asks for more!"

"But I don't like potatoes," protested Mr. Choate.

"Then no more beef!" was the fiat.

Mr. Choate meekly ate the potatoes, and was rewarded with a fresh slice of beef. After dinner he was told he could smoke one cigar if he wanted, but no more. But he asked instead if he might have just one glass of water, please.

"The rules here are one glass of water an hour before eating and another one an hour after eating," observed Muldoon. "When the hour's up you can go over to the well and help yourself, but, mind you, only one glass!"

The results are worthy of Mr. Muldoon's reputation: When a week had passed Mr. Choate began to forget that he was tired. He was no longer stiff and lame. He could eat anything, and didn't have to be told to eat everything on his plate. He was always ready for bed at the tap of the bell.

His cheeks began to grow hard. His eyes brightened and cleared. His face was sunburned. He got a heavier medicine ball and didn't mind it a bit. He found he could run up hill without exhaustion. He learned to like the hot water as a thirst quencher.

Several weeks passed. One morning he asked Mr. Muldoon if he thought he could go.

"Yes," said Muldoon; "you're in pretty good shape now."

"I ought to be," said Mr. Choate, grimly.

PORFIRIO DIAZ, MAKER OF MEXICO.

How He Won Peace, Success, and Wealth for His People, Told by Mrs. Tweedie.

At the head of an armed revolution, Porfirio Diaz assumed the office of Provisional President of the Republic of Mexico in November, 1876, yet he was the first ruler of that country to lead the Mexican nation along the path of constitutional progress. Seven times the people have given him at the polls an overwhelming assurance of their confidence, and for all except four years he has been supreme in power since he first grasped the reins of government. In "The Maker of Modern Mexico: Porfirio Diaz," a new volume by Mrs. Alec. Tweedie, is given a familiar yet instructive view of the president, and much of the history and record of progress of the country. Mrs. Tweedie had already written "Mexico as I Saw It," and knew her field. She admits the difficulty of avoiding what might be termed "hero worship," yet never fails to insist on the modesty, unselfishness, and patriotism of the real Dictator of Mexico.

Porfirio Diaz was born September 15, 1830, in Oaxaca, the capital of the state of that name in Southern Mexico, and was the son of an inn-keeper. His grandmother, of whose ability and character the president is proud, was an Indian woman of the Mixteco tribe, one of the finest of the aboriginal races:

The Indian race has produced some fine men. Mejia, perhaps the best of the Emperor Maximilian's fighting generals, was an Aztec of pure descent. That Juarez was a Zapotec-Indian has before been mentioned. Few people realize that there are over half a million of Aztecs left in Mexico at the dawn of the twentieth century. They were conquered by Cortez, but not exterminated. But the Indian, as he was in those days, untalented, untaught, without a leader, and with no ideas of government, might have been held down for centuries longer.

Young Porfirio was intended for the Church but refused to accede to the wishes of his mother and the bishop, and began the study of law after his school days were over, though his fondest dream from boyhood was to be a soldier and his highest ambition to become colonel of a regiment:

Good fortune brought him under notice of Don Marcos Perez, a judge of the district and professor at the Law Institute, who took great interest in his promising student. Perez was the means of introducing Porfirio Diaz to Benito Juarez, then Governor of the State of Oaxaca, to whose patronage he was indebted for a slender, but welcome, addition to his resources which came from his appointment as librarian at the college. Without Juarez and his overbrow of the Church, Diaz would never have succeeded in making Mexico what she is, and no one is more ready to acknowledge that fact than the President himself.

Early in life Diaz found himself in revolt against the corrupt administration, and his breaking away from the influences that surrounded him was a dramatic incident:

"The head of the division in which I lived, Don Serapio Maldonado, presented himself, saying that he voted on behalf of various individuals who were residents in his division for the continuance in power, as Supreme Dictator, of General Santa Anna. Then it was I who appealed to the President myself to discount my vote from the number, because I did not wish to exercise the right of voting.

"At that moment the academical body of the institute arrived, and all the professors voted in favor of Santa Anna, and gave their respective signatures to the roll.

"When this was done the Licentiate Don Francisco S. de Enciso, who was professor of civil law, asked me if I was fully determined not to vote. I answered in the same terms in which I had excused myself to General Martinez Pinillos, saying that voting was a right which I was free to exercise or not.

"Yes," answered Enciso, "and one does not vote when one is afraid!"

"The reproach burnt into me like fire, and made me seize the pen which was again proffered me. Pushing my way between the electors I passed up the room and recorded my vote, not for Santa Anna, but in favor of General Don Juan Alvarez, who figured as chief of the revolutionary movement of Aynsla."

This action was followed, through necessity, by instant flight, and he was soon fighting against the dictator. He distinguished himself at once in his military career, and after Santa Anna was driven from the country he continued as commander of troops and reorganized the national guard, being rewarded by Juarez, then Minister of Justice under President Alvarez:

And so he was made Colonel. He, the poor son of a widow, the little boy of Oaxaca, at the age of thirty had actually obtained the summit of his childhood's dream.

But was he satisfied? No; ambition had entered his soul; his horizon had extended; he had walked or ridden the length and breadth of the land—which is two thousand miles long, and in some parts nearly half as wide—he had seen destitution and misery, had lived amongst conflict and strife. Now began to dawn a new vista of hope, and he felt he could not stop; he must go on; he must do something great for his country—a country crying for help, a land of sunshine and wealth, now dreary and sad and penniless.

Before the French occupation he had reached a much higher position:

Now he returned to Oaxaca as Governor of the State and of those adjoining, and General-in-Chief of all the troops. He was quickly called upon to defend the city against a foreign invader who came down upon him in overwhelming strength. The unequal struggle ended with his captivity, and for seven months he was held a prisoner.

Marshal Bazaine, in the service of the ill-fated Emperor Maximilian, tried to buy the support of Diaz, but in vain. The young commander led the forces that besieged the capital, and even then demonstrated his ability in economic affairs:

"During the siege of Mexico City," he says, "I succeeded in paying punctually, not only what was due to the force under my orders, but all other public expenses of the area over which I exercised command; in fact, there was even a balance to the good. The money collected consisted of the ordinary taxes of the states, and some special fines or impositions which I made upon persons who resided in the capital of the state, and whose property was beyond the limits of the state; also upon those who had compromised themselves with Maximilian, and thereby incurred the penalty of confiscation of their property.

"I also raised two important loans, one of $50,000 on my own personal credit, and another of $200,000 on my occupying the capital, from various foreign merchants, mostly United States citizens, through the intermediary of the consul-general of that country, the loans being reimbursed before the arrival of President Juarez in the capital."

His next move surprised and disappointed even his friends, and these included all the officers under him, as well as the rank and file:

An immense sensation was experienced throughout the country when it became known that General Diaz, who had crowned his career by restoring the Republic to its former capital after years of incessant fighting, and was now the future hope of Mexico, had on the very day that he occupied the city sent in his resignation.

A short period of rest was well employed:

Those were quiet years for the most part with Diaz: years in which the general with a record of twenty battlefields contentedly retired to live the simple life of a sugar planter near the city of his birth, amid scenes which must repeatedly have recalled to his memory many stirring incidents in which he had figured. During these years he learnt much. He studied agriculture in quite a professional manner, saw the great possibilities of the soil, the necessity of irrigation, and other details, all of which he found of practical value when himself called upon to rule.

Exciting events brought him from his retirement. In this connection the constitutional provision violated by Juarez is a significant declaration:

The statesmen who drafted the Constitution of the Spanish-American Republics and sought to make impossible the re-election of the existing President for a second term, did not act without good reason. Nothing was easier than for a dictator, once he had secured his election constitutionally, to so manipulate the voting that, save by an armed rising, he could never be displaced.

In spite of this provision, Juarez sought and obtained a re-election, and Diaz broke with his old friend and patron:

Anticipating events, the Governor of Nuevo-Leon in September denounced the government and declared General Diaz President. Pronunciamientos followed in other parts, but all such attempts to restore rule by force were successfully repressed. On November 8th, 1871, Diaz issued from his homestead in Oaxaca the famous protest known as the "Plan of Noria," on behalf of the reforms promised under the Constitution of 1857, but never instituted. A manifesto was circulated proposing to convene an assembly of notables to reorganize the government with General Diaz to assume the powers of commander-in-chief of the army until such a government could be founded.

Diaz left the South, where the movement had its chief centre, in the early spring of the following year, and arrived at Chihuahua, in the North, only to be met with the news that Juarez was dead.

The President had expired after a day's illness, on July 18th, from an affection of the heart. Mexico lost in him a great patriot. Born in poverty, he lived and died poor, with means of enrichment at his hand from which others had not hesitated to profit.

The term of President Lerdo, succeeding, brought nothing of peace, and Diaz became the conquering leader of forces that overcame the government and entered the capital:

He was forty-six, just in the prime of life, health, and strength. Well-mounted, sitting erect, his head raised high, his dark face bronzed with the rigors of camp life, he made a fine figure as he rode in front of his staff, well in view of the populace. He was dressed in his general's uniform, and was followed by a large contingent of the revolutionary army.

People came out of the city and gathered along the roadside. The greeting was not unmixt with cries of dissent. The crowd cheered, the crowd hissed, for there were persons in Mexico City on that day who had no reason to congratulate themselves on the success of the victor. Hot spirits were roused, and the populace fought among themselves. General Diaz rode on, taking small heed either of the cheers or the dissentient cries which rent the air.

Reform and progress became at once watchwords of power with the new ruler:

For the first time in Mexico's troubled history he brought the most scrupulous honesty into every department of the public administration. Diaz was never a rich man himself, and today, after a long life spent in the service of his country, he possesses but a modest fortune. His methods were a revelation to politicians of the school of Santa Anna, trained to regard the public funds a legitimate source of plunder.

Diplomacy was not a sealed book to the intrepid soldier:

Stern measures were called for were dealt out. Repression did its work and for the first time the public hands began to show some reason measure of safety; but still many hundreds of the bandits remained at large.

Undoubtedly their existence for one of the most serious questions I had to face. Nothing or nobody safe from their attentions. Even if leaders were shot their following remained, and Diaz saw it was impossible to restore law and order under circumstances. A brilliant thought struck him.

"What do you earn?" he asked.

"Average so many dollars a week."

"Then I will give you so many do more if you give up your present and become respectable citizens."

This was the line of his bargain them. He offered amnesty, with something they never had experienced before, namely, regular and well-paid employment. They would be drafted into rural police, and given pay at a higher rate than any other cavalrymen in the world. These men, the fomenters of disorder, revolution, theft, and were henceforward to devote their energies to subduing disorder.

The bandits accepted his proposal, thus was formed the force of Rural Police, one meets in Mexico, who are today pride and the pick of the Mexican army, and the admiration of the whole continent.

There were greater problems before Diaz, whose position had already been made secure by the sustaining vote of his people:

Mexico, however, had still to perform promises. The United States government had maintained relations with Juarez in the darkest days when the fugitive President, with little following save his escort, was literally being driven by French troops from pillar to post. The Washington cabinet, however, refused to recognize the government of Diaz had installed because of its revolutionary origin. Where so intimate neighbor stood aside, other nations whose sentiments toward the success of the Emperor Maximilian were friendly, naturally held aloof.

Europe had no interest in Mexico to ensure that her obligations were met, and the country was kept tranquil in order that trade might develop. The tragedy of Queretaro was still fresh in its memory. There was little confidence in the stability of anything Mexican. A certain glamour surrounded the name of Diaz because of his adventurous life and daring exploits, and something was hoped from him, but for the present Mexico remained suspect.

At this time came the romance which has brightened all the years of the President since:

Fate is stronger than wisdom. Two people were made for each other. Thus it was chance brought them together, and at the time when Porfirio Diaz was necessarily much alone, though constantly surrounded, and there is no such loneliness as the loneliness experienced in a multitude—himself, dainty, bright, cheery Carmen. There is no doubt he at once felt the superiority of the girl over all other women in Mexico City: superiority of looks, superiority of education, superiority of temperament, and he fell in love. Yet he fell madly, desperately, passionately in love with a young girl considerably less than half his age.

They were married, and the president's wife has been more than an affectionate companion and efficient under all circumstances. Both have been seen in the United States, on the occasion of a visit in the early 'eighties.

Although General Diaz was not President of Mexico, he had done so much good during his four years in office, and there was such a strong probability of his return to power, that he was treated in the United States as if he were a representative President.

the trip, though enjoyable, was not a lengthy one:

General Diaz and his young wife were met at New Orleans by a private train, and its cars and its drawing-rooms, were there by the courtesy of the President of the United States. Diaz still talks enthusiastically of that journey. We had a beautiful reception in Chicago," he said to me, "the warmest welcome, lovely flowers, and decorations with the Mexican flag. Then we went to Washington, where we spent the days, dining at the White House and seeing something of that very beautiful city. We visited New York, Niagara, and Boston, but unfortunately the trip was somewhat hurried, and I did not see as much of America as I should have liked."

President Diaz bears his honors and responsibilities easily, yet they are close to his heart in all hours:

Diaz was after an interregnum of four years re-elected to power in 1884.

In the night of his re-election one of the most intimate associates went to the palace to congratulate him.

Spare your congratulations, good friend," he replied; "were it not that I love for Mexico kept me buoyant I could sink beneath the weight of my responsibility."

The coffers are empty; they are more than empty—they are heavily laded with debt, and Heaven knows what matters will end. But—he lighted a cigar and paced the room excitedly—am going to try. Don't congratulate me tonight. Come back in four years' time, and then let me know if my work is worthy of your congratulations."

His work continues worthy, as the world knows.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Gen. Mercier, who recently left Paris suddenly for London, was not enthusiastically received. He once delivered in the French senate an elaborate speech on the feasibility of invading England.

Delayed preparations and the waning season have induced the announcement that Walter Wellman, the chief of the Arctic expedition of a Chicago newspaper, has abandoned the project of hallooing to the North Pole this year.

Elihu Root, Secretary of State, used to be a golf player. He was one of the founders of the Nassau Club. He gave up playing golf when he came to Washington and began riding horseback. The President says golf is a "grandmother's game."

J. Q. A. Ward, dean of American sculptors and for more than half a century a leader in art, is being showered with congratulations on his recent marriage. The sculptor has just passed his seventy-sixth birthday, and has been married twice before. His wife was formerly Mrs. R. M. Ostrander Smith, the widow of an artist.

Sven Hedin, the Swedish explorer, has recently written to King Oscar, describing the desert region of Kevir, which is marked in English and Russian maps as a salt desert, but which Hedin found to be really a shallow inland sea. On his journey through Seistan to India, he heard reports of the ravages of the plague. At Nashretahad, a town of 2,500 inhabitants, nine-tenths had perished at the time of his arrival.

Mark Twain is responsible for bringing the secluded village of West Redding, Conn., into prominence. He has bought a house there and will reconstruct it, of stone, at a cost of $30,000. The estate comprises 110 acres, and the house occupies an elevated site with fine views in all directions. Another old place in the village, purchased recently by Miss Jeanette L. Gilder, it is rumored will be taken by Miss Ann Morgan, daughter of J. Pierpont Morgan.

One of the members of the American colony in Berlin at the present time is Miss Elizabeth S. Colton of Easthampton, Mass., a student of orientalism and comparative religion and mistress of some forty languages. In her girlhood she had a fine voice, which was trained in Paris by Manuel Garcia, but just as she had arranged for her debut in New York with Theodore Thomas she was stricken with a throat affection which put an end to her ambition for a concert career.

Gen. Luis Terrazas, whose wealth is conservatively estimated at $200,000,000, celebrated the seventy-fifth anniversary of his birth at his home in Chihuahua, Mex., a few days ago. Terrazas is said to be the largest individual landowner in the world, his estates in western Mexico covering more than 15,000,000 acres. He owns several hundred thousand head of cattle, horses, sheep and goats. Some of the richest mines in Mexico belong to him. He and his son-in-law, Enrique Creel, control the banking business of a portion of Mexico.

Sir Robert Hart, who for forty-three years has held the high office of inspector general of the Chinese maritime customs, is reported to be preparing to return to England. He entered the British consular service in China when but nineteen years of age, and in 1863 was selected by the Chinese government to be head of its maritime customs. His mastery of the Chinese language, which he early learned, made him invaluable to the government. He has seen great rebellions in China and several foreign invasions.

The Queen of Naples has just started a dainty little store in the Rue St. Roch, Paris. It is called "Aux Ouvrages Calabrais," and is devoted entirely to the sale of needlework done by the Calabrian peasant women. Almost daily Queen Maria Sophia, who is also Queen of the two Sicilies and of Jerusalem, Duchess of Parma, of Plaisance and Castro, and Grand Duchess of Bavaria and Tuscany, comes to the little store and superintends the window dressing. The proceeds of the sales go to help the peasants rebuild the homes destroyed by the recent catastrophe.

Secretary Hitchcock has sent out an order that no liquor shall be sold henceforth in the Yosemite Valley, and the cozy little clubhouse is closed.

VANITY FAIR.

The American is the Bedouin of civilization, at home and at ease everywhere, and the more you see of him the more congenial do you find him, observes a writer in the London News.

The season is in full swing, and our transatlantic cousin is overrunning the land. London appears to exercise a somewhat sobering influence on him, and it is at Stratford-on-Avon that one sees him at his best. There he is in a class apart. Everywhere in the little town notices refer to "Visitors and Americans," and at all show places the two inscribe their names in separate books. Through the streets the "visitors" march staidly, the Americans "do" the place thoroughly, in couples at least, one carrying a camera, the other a guide book. Arrived at any spot mentioned in the book, the camera is brought into play, while the other reads aloud the reference in the guide book.

But it is on the Continent that one must study the wandering American. There is more of him and his smartly dressed women kind in Paris than in London, and more for the size of the city in Berlin than in Paris. In the French capital an edition of one of his New York newspapers is published daily; in Berlin the so-called English weekly is devoted almost exclusively to his doings, and several clubs are run for his special benefit.

No matter where you go, you find him before you, amazingly cool, magnificently confident and sublimely unconscious—to all outward seeming, at any rate—of the attention he attracts. His ubiquity impresses you and compels your admiration. His sang-froid is in striking contrast to the manner of the average Englishman abroad. The true Englishman is never at home on the Continent—it is too full of "foreigners."

At all times the observer found his American cousins not only civil but genial:

"I climbed to the top of Notre Dame in Paris and found there a party from across the Atlantic enjoying lunch. The day was hot, and a young man in the group offered me a refreshing drink. At the top of the lace work in marble, which is the spire of Milan Cathedral, three English-speaking men met accidentally—an American, an English clergyman, and myself. He who hailed from the land of the Stars and Stripes offered me his field glass, the other did not even return our good-morning salutation. In a beer garden at Lucerne I followed the custom of the Continent and asked permission before sitting at a table of those already seated there. The only one who did not raise his hat and reply was an Englishman, and the only one to make excuses for him was a young man who prefixed his words with 'I guess.'

"At Ostend the usual crowd of camerists dodged about between the bathing machines. One of the bathers, with his kodak on his head, to keep it dry, watched the efforts of others for a while to snapshot a daintily attired French woman, then he coolly asked her to pose on the steps of her bathing machine for him. She did, with the remark: 'You droll Americans!'

In quiet Swiss villages and in the show places of Paris the same display of handsome costumes is noted.

Fair Americans in Venice, in the Piazza San Marco, were busy kodaking one another with half a dozen pigeons perched on their arms and shoulders. At night in the cosmopolitan crowd of promenaders around the bandstand in the famous square one beautiful woman wore evening dress. She came from the land of Edna May. American women wear evening dress everywhere—even in the mountain villages of Switzerland, where they find to their cost that the hottest days are followed by cold nights.

In the Latin Quarter crowd at the notorious Bal Bullier in Paris you are sure to see one or two American ladies in elaborate evening toilettes and they are seen so arrayed in the gawdies cabaret "Le Neant" in Montmartre, where the waiters are dressed like undertakers' mutes and the tables are coffins.

Summer holidays are the ones in which fashion has some influence in England.

The King's tailors have been attending at Buckingham Palace with patterns for his Majesty's holiday suits. After choosing the cloth and giving orders for the cut of his clothes, King Edward is troubled no further about his suits, which are fitted on a dummy of his exact proportions, which dummy his tailors keep at their workrooms.

A deep blue, rather coarse serge is his Majesty's favorite cloth for holiday wear. But whenever possible he adopts the characteristic dress of the country where he is spending his holiday. At Marienbad he wears the picturesque green Tyrolean hat, and at Balmoral the kilt, which, by the way, he has no liking for.

Although he always keeps up with the prevailing modes and often sets the fashion himself, the King never adopts a new fashion unless he finds it suits him. He has never worn the frock overcoat, so fashionable last winter, but which only suits men of good stature and youthful figure.

The King of Spain, as well as the King of England, was recently entertained at Cowes by the American Consuelo Yzuaga, dowager duchess of Manchester.

At the second visit of King Alfonso, when young Queen Victoria accompanied him, the dowager duchess played a dozen or more popular airs for their majesties—among them several American negro melodies—and Alfonso was so much pleased with the latter that he begged the scores from his hostess, saying, "My little queen will learn to play 'There'll Be a Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight.'"

The duchess, a very clever pianist, amused him by showing him how this air could be played as a two-step, a serenade, a wedding march, a sacred hymn and a dirge.

At the banquet given by the dowager duchess in honor of Edward and Alfonso, their majesties advanced on opposite sides of the tables to their seats on the right and left of the hostess, bowed profoundly to her, then profoundly to one another, and seated themselves, the whole company following suit. Both were exceedingly attentive to the dowager duchess, and at an impressive pause in the general conversation, Alfonso, smiling at King Edward, and then turning to their hostess, conversed everybody with the quotation, "Here he two kings of Flanders gazing at one rose."

Lord Byron's aversion, "a dumpy woman," has been tabooed at Washington, if the report sent out by a press correspondent is well founded. He declares that the government has "figured out a standard figure for women."

No woman will have the top of her head sawed off for being too tall, or be stretched on a rack because she is not tall enough. If she is too fat or too thin, or too large in the hips, she will not be put on a forced diet. She will simply be barred out of a job in Uncle Sam's confidential bureau of engraving and printing, where the money is made.

They must be of good height, in no case under four feet ten and one-half inches tall; women above medium height preferred.

No woman of more than sixteen inches width in the hips will be employed.

The bust must not exceed thirteen inches in depth.

What the bureau wants is a sylph-like person. The girl whom the novelists describe as "willowy" is the young person wanted at the money factory. If she gets fat she will soon be retired.

By a decision of the Supreme Court just handed down, Ethel W. Crocker, as owner of 5096 shares of the capital stock of the Crocker-Woolworth National Bank, estimated to be worth $300 per share, will be compelled to pay something like $150,000 in taxes on her shares, and the right of the State to national bank stock is confirmed. Superior Judge Cook had granted an injunction restraining the tax collector, and the Supreme Court reversed Judge Cook's decision.

STAGE GOSSIP.

era Michelena, a San Francisco girl, in the cast of "The Tourist," which opened the Majestic Theatre, New York, Labor Day.

The new play of "Sam Houston" is in four acts and shows Houston as governor of Tennessee and Texas, as commander-in-chief of Texas and governor of Santa Anna and in the closing dramatic crisis of his life in conflict with the State legislature.

The "Kreutzer Sonata" was presented the first time in English in New York City at the Manhattan Theatre last week, with Blanche Bates in the principal part. A legal effort had been made by Mr. Fiske, who also has the play, to stop the production, but there was no attempt made to stop the performance. Frank Bacon, the comedian, has been spending several weeks in New York staging plays and players for the Social Theatre, which is to be opened in San Francisco at an early date with a strong stock company.

Miss Lillian Corbin, favorite niece of J. Corbin, and prominent in Washington social circles, made her professional debut at the Academy of Music, New York, last week, as Mrs. Ogden, the young matron in "The Virginian." "The Light Eternal," Martin V. Mele's religious drama, which had such a successful run at the Majestic Theatre last season, is to be produced in Chicago by Edward A. Braden.

Rose Stahl made her debut as a star at the Savoy Theatre, London, last week, in James Forbes's comedy, "The Chorus."

George Bernard Shaw is conducting in London the rehearsals of "Caesar and Cleopatra," in which Forbes Robertson and Gertrude Elliott are to appear.

Anna Held has sailed from France to begin rehearsals of her new play, "A Persian Model." She brings with her twenty-four girls, representing three nationalities.

Edie Martinot has been engaged by Walter N. Lawrence of "Mrs. Temple's Gram."

Daniel Frawley has secured a year's lease of the Lyceum Theatre in Minneapolis where he will install his stock company.

Charles Frohman has secured new plays by Augustus Thomas, George Ade, Clyde Fitch, the De Mille brothers, George H. Broadhurst, C. T. Dazey, J. M. Kie, Robert Marshall, H. V. Esmond, Iri Lavedan, Pierre Berton, Pierre V. Frederic De Crosse, Anthony M.; musical plays by Charles McLellan and Ivan Caryll, Tristan Bernard, Honour Hicks, Paul Potter, Harry B. Smith and Ludwig Englander, besides numerous musical successes now running in London.

My Standing's debut as a star will be made in a comedy-drama entitled "A Society Policeman." The play will be produced under the stage supervision of Percy Miller.

Mrs. Langtry, who had two wins in London at the Folkestone races also had an unpleasant experience in the evening. She had been advised to give a dramatic performance in the pavilion at Folkestone. The audience was incensed because the play presented was only a trivial South African episode lasting but twenty minutes, and a hostile crowd followed Mrs. Langtry off the pier vociferously hissing.

Clyde Fitch has completed the manuscript of his new play, "The Truth," which is to be presented in New York in October. He also has collaborated with Edith Wharton in the dramatization of "The House of Mirth," the production of which is scheduled for next month.

Shakespeare will be fairly well represented upon the London stage this season. Arthur Bourchier now announces his intention of producing "Much Ado About Nothing." Mr. Tree is to give "The Winter's Tale," with Ellen Terry as Hermione, and, later on, is to undertake Macbeth.

Unie Dupree is the first Thespian to escape the San Francisco disaster for vaudeville purposes. Miss Dupree is appearing in the East in a sketch called "The Earthquake Came."

Itton Lackaye will use on tour this season "Roger Le Honte," the French drama, in which he acted in 1889, in Niblo's, New York, in support of Jessie Millward and the late William Terriss. Melbourne Maedowell has been engaged for Javert, the detective, in "The Law and the Man," Mr. Lackaye's dramatization of "Les Misérables."

Isadora Duncan, who caused a furore in Europe and America with her startling dances, is the bride of Ellen Terry's son, Gordon Craig. She is a daughter of the late Manager Duncan, of the defunct Pioueer Savings Bank of San Francisco.

In the Greek theatre of the University of California at Berkeley last Saturday evening, Sept. 1, Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" was produced by Miss Constance Crawley and a company augmented by members of the student body. The representation was on a grand yet artistic scale, with appropriate orchestral accompaniment, and troops of fairies and singers. The Musical and Dramatic Union of the University netted $3500 by the event.

There is no lack of news in real estate circles of San Francisco, as even casual notice of the columns of the daily papers will show. The Mission as a residence quarter is reported to be gaining attention. Property which before the fire was held at $100 per front foot is now up to $150, and still soaring. As a retail section Golden Gate avenue is steadily advancing, which is regarded as another indication that the retail stores will slowly come eastward. There promise to be many new hotels. Billieke, the hotel man of Los Angeles, it is said, will soon put into execution his long-cherished plan of building a hotel on the site of the old Windsor, corner of Fifth and Market streets. James B. Lankershim, the Los Angeles millionaire, who owns the site where Metropolitan Hall once stood, entertained at one time the idea of having a hotel on that lot. He may now carry out his plans. Since the fire large acreages of country property have been sold to residents in the city. This has not been confined to any particular locality, but is general throughout the State.

A Los Angeles party, numbering 140, is now on its way to the Orient for pleasure, health, and study. Gen. Harrison Gray Otis, proprietor of the Los Angeles Times, is one of the leaders of the band of excursionists, and during its brief stay in San Francisco, en route to Seattle, announced that the tour would include the Philippines, Japan, and Shanghai and Hongkong. The party will board the Northern Company's steamer Dakota at Seattle.

The Orpheum.

Chinko, the youngest of English jugglers, will make his first appearance in this city at the Orpheum this Sunday afternoon. O. T. Fiske and Nellie McDonough, character sketch artists, will present a little one-act play, entitled "Good News." Minnie Kaufmann is a member of the celebrated Kaufmann family of bicyclists. The Italian trio are male vocalists of international reputation. Ben Welch, the Dixon brothers, the five Salvaggis, Max Hilderbrandt, and Orpheum motion pictures will complete a varied program. There is always amusement to be found on the grounds of the Chutes, where the Orpheum is located. There will be a special matinee at the Orpheum on Monday, Admission Day.

The annual concert of the Bohemian Club will take place at the Greek Theatre, Berkeley, on Tuesday afternoon, October 2. There will be a large orchestra and chorus. The details of the program are not yet to hand, but it is to be presumed that some of the music of the mid-summer jinks will as usual be produced.

The motor vehicle department of the State of California has collected $20,146.50, with expenses aggregating $6,419.81, during the past twelve months.

The members of the Philomath Club are urgently requested to send their September addresses to Mrs. Samuel Bissinger, 2129 Jackson St., at their earliest convenience. The first club meeting will take place at the home of Mrs. Sahlein, 1718 Jackson Street, September tenth, 1906.

President Roosevelt reviewed last Monday at Oyster Bay the largest war-fleet ever assembled in American waters. Rear Admiral Robley D. Evans, commander of the fleet, with the battleship Maine, held a central position at the head of the three great columns, two miles in length, while the President's naval yacht, the Mayflower, passed down the line between and around the ships. There were 51 naval vessels in the display, manned by 854 officers and 15,841 men, and carrying 1220 guns.

Jay Eye See, the famous old world's champion trotter, who fifteen years ago made his mark of 2:10 1/4 there, is to be placed on exhibition at the State fair grounds in Providence, R. I., this fall on a spot overlooking the Narragansett Park track, where he distanced all records so long ago.

LITERARY NOTES.

A Tracer of Lost Persons.

We expect to meet the Tracer of Lost Persons, the title character in Robert W. Chambers' novel of that name, quite often in subsequent volumes. Mr. Chambers has happened on a rich vein of literary ore. And it is easy milling, too, under his process. Mr. Chambers is more than human, and less than serial writer, if he does not exploit Keen as long as the public's patience lasts. One fancies the rage of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle when he learns that Chambers has strayed into his favorite field.

"The Tracer of Lost Persons," at once suggests Sherlock Holmes, but the resemblance does not last, as one continues with the story. Keen, the amiable sleuth of the novel, is a solver of seemingly impossible problems, but he does not find it necessary to employ the chemical knowledge, the strategical skill, the analytical powers, the finesse, the surgical and medical lore of Doyle's hero. Not he. The blase clubman wants to find his ideal a beautiful, but abstract, girl. Nothing is easier. Mr. Keen does not have to go out of his office in the search: the ideal is discovered in the person of one of his stenographers. Albeit, the book answers the supreme test of light literature; it is interesting.

Several excellent illustrations by Edmund Frederick help the story along.

Published by D. Appleton & Co., New York: $1.50.

Romance and a Fiddler in Westphalia.

The Egerton Castles have added to their harvest of romances another one of the pretty, fanciful love-tales that have given them their vogue. "If Youth But Knew" is picturesquely set in the kingdom of Westphalia during Jerome's temporary occupancy of the Westphalian throne. The little whippersnapper of a king appears, and figures in some gallant adventures smelling of patchouly and the boudoir. And there is a fantastic fiddler—something of a character—who fiddles magic tunes that whisper daring into the doubting hearts of youth. Withal gracefully told, yet, like all the Castles' stories, too artificial and improbable to move to more than a passing interest.

Published by the Macmillan Co., New York; price $1.50.

An Artistic Italian Story.

Readers who have learned to dread the novel of historic flavor need not avoid Bernard Capes's "Bembo: A Tale of Italy," in the preface of which it is frankly declared that the beautiful tradition of which it is built is unfounded on fact. The story is set in the middle ages, at a time when Italy was under the heel of profligate dukes, and in an age when intellectuality and grossness held strange carnival; and the dialogue reflects the metaphysical quibbling and wit-crossing characteristic of the times.

The figure of Bembo, a beautiful strippling who is the innocent propagandist of a pure, selfless, sexless love for mankind, stands against the background of cruelty, crime, and lust like a lily growing in the mire. The book contains scholarship, poetry, and wit, and in spite of its exaggerations of sentiment, and overstrained note of emotionalism, it has the literary quality to an uncommon degree.

Published by E. P. Dutton & Co., New York; price $1.50.

An Educator's Worthy Effort.

"The School and Its Life," by Charles B. Gilbert, an educator who wars against the evils of machine teaching, discusses educational themes with such intelligence, broad-mindedness, and sympathy, that it is worthy the earnest attention of both teachers and those who supervise them.

Published by Silver, Burdett & Co., New York; price $1.25.

A Novel and a Symposium.

Those proselytes who are hovering on the verge of Christian Science will read with curiosity and interest a new novel from the pen of Lilian Bell, long identified as an earnest apostle of the religion of optimism. "Carolina Lee," a novel of southern life, is a romantically improbable but tolerably human story, written in sprightly vein, and in pleasant, readable style. The story includes many discussions on Christian Science, and the author is broad-minded enough to allow her characters to voice the arguments of those who scoff at Mrs. Eddy, and her self-spoiled powers.

Published by L. C. Page & Co., Boston; price $1.50.

O. Henry's Second Book.

In twenty-four short stories, full of rattle and slang, and vivid reality, O. Henry, author of "Cabbages and Kings," has set the life of the East side of New York upon the printed page. Mr. Henry has the art of the short story writer, telling in crisp, graphic style incidents that include humor and sympathy, and that reach climaxes which leave the fancy, whether amused by drollery, or moved by pathos, still alert for an untold sequel.

Published by McClure, Phillips & Co., New York; price $1.50.

New Publications.

"The Philosophy of Rest," by Ella Avelia Fletcher, contains sixty pages of counsel after the manner of Marcus Aurelius. "Don't worry," is its lesson. Published by the Dodge Publishing Company, New York; 75 cents.

"The Master-Man" is a dully written novel of little power and no charm. The sentiment is supplied by the use of innumerable "boneys" and "dears," and the author, who is not named, is lacking in inventiveness. There is no excuse for the story. Published by the John Lane Company, New York; $1.50.

The seventh edition of "Hygiene of the Nursery," by Louis Starr, M. D., is a little volume that will appeal to mothers. It includes the general regimen and feeding of infants and children; massage, and the domestic management of the ordinary emergencies of early life. Published by P. Blakiston's Son & Co., Philadelphia; $1.00 net.

"The Man and the Master," by James E. Freeman, rector of St. Andrew's Church, Yonkers, New York, is a series of essays, dealing with different phases of the life of Christ, in which the writer has emphasized His humanness. Published by Thomas Whittaker, New York; 75 cents net.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

In the new edition of his book, "Polo," recently brought out, Capt. T. B. Drybrough has added descriptions of American play seen at the Burlingame Country Club near San Francisco, at Riverside, Santa Barbara, and in the East.

Gen. A. W. Greely, arctic explorer, for many years Chief Signal Officer of the United States Army and recently in charge of the Pacific Division, with headquarters at San Francisco, has prepared a "Handbook of Polar Discoveries" which will be issued soon.

Books of travel announced for early publication include: "Highways and Byways of the Mississippi Valley," by Clifton Johnson; "The Fair Hills of Ireland," by Stephen Gwynne; "Tarry at Home Travels," by E. E. Hale; "Persia, Past and Present," by A. V. W. Jackson; "A Wanderer in London," by E. V. Lucas.

Discussions of public men and matters, written by the American statesman, during his later years, will soon be published under the title of "Addresses of John Hay."

Leon Rutledge Whipple, of the University of Virginia, writes to the New York Times Saturday Review, suggesting the need of a new magazine. "The contents should consist entirely of original poetry in English, of any kind, on any theme, as long as it was good." It is possible that Mr. Whipple intended in the concluding phrase of his sentence to intimate that most contributions would be short. A "Magazine of Poetry" was published in New York State some years ago, but it did not thrive.

London has a new penny humorous weekly, named Puck, printed in colors.

JUAN FERNANDEZ.

[A Santiago dispatch says that it is reported the island of Juan Fernandez has sunk since the great earthquake. This was the island inhabited by Alexander Selkirk. He was born at Largo, Fifeshire, in 1676; died on the ship Weymouth, 1723. This Scottish sailor was the supposed original of Defoe's "Robinson Crusoe." He was engaged in buccaneering exploits in the South Seas, and in 1703 was sailing master of a Cinque Ports galley. In 1704 he was at his own request put ashore on the island of Juan Fernandez, and remained there alone four years. His "Life and Adventures" were published by Howell in 1829, and he is the subject of this poem by Cowper:]

Verses.

Supposed to have been written by Alexander Selkirk during his solitary abode in the Island of Juan Fernandez:

I am monarch of all I survey;

My right there is none to dispute;
From the centre all round to the sea
I am lord of the fowl and the brute.
O Solitude! Where are thy charms
That sages have seen in thy face?
Better dwell in the midst of alarms
Than reign in this horrible place.

I am out of humanity's reach;
I must finish my journey alone;
Never hear the sweet music of speech—
I start at the sound of my own.
The beasts that roam over the plain,
My form with indifference see;
They are so unacquainted with man,
Their tameness is shocking to me.

Society, Friendship, and Love,
Divinely bestow'd upon man,
Oh, had I the wings of a dove,
How soon would I taste you again!
My sorrows I then might assuage
In the ways of religion and truth,
Might learn from the wisdom of age,
And be cheer'd by the sallies of youth.

Religion! what treasure untold
Resides in that heavenly word!
More precious than silver and gold,
Or all that this earth can afford.
But the sound of the church-going bell
These valleys and rocks never heard;
Never sigh'd at the sound of a knell,
Or smiled when a Sabbath appear'd.

Ye winds that have made me your sport,
Convey to this desolate shore
Some cordial endearing report
Of a land I shall visit no more:
My friends, do they now and then send
A wish or a thought after me?
O tell me I yet have a friend,
Though a friend I am never to see.

How fleet is the glance of the mind!
Compared with the speed of its flight,
The tempest itself lags behind,
And the swift-winged arrows of light.
When I think of my own native land,
In a moment I seem to be there;
But, alas! recollection at hand
Soon hurries me back to despair.

But the sea-fowl is gone to her nest,
The heast is laid down in his lair;
Even here is a season of rest,
And I to my cabin repair.
There's mercy in every place,
And mercy—encouraging thought!—
Gives even affliction a grace,
And reconciles man to his lot.

—William Cowper.

The Secret of Fiona Macleod.

Very few knew before his death that William Sharp was Fiona Macleod, but it appears that Mr. and Mrs. Thomas A. Janvier, of New York, held the poet's secret. At a recent meeting of the Aberdeen Franco-Scottish Society a paper by Mrs. Janvier was read, which told that something in "Pharais" made her suspect the authorship, and on writing to Sharp her discovery was confirmed. These are expressions quoted from the poet's letter to Mrs. Janvier:

"I hope to send you a letter soon from the beautiful place by the sea where we are going. It will be a letter from Fiona Macleod. Yes, 'Pharais' is mine. It is a book out of my heart, out of the core of my heart. I wrote it with the pen dipped in the very ichor of my life. It has reached people even more than I dreamed of as likely. . . . I can write out of my heart in a way that I could not do as William Sharp, and, indeed, that I could not do if I were the woman whom Fiona Macleod is supposed to be, unless veiled in scrupulous anonymity."

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

One day as John W. Mugridge, the lawyer, and Judge Minot were walking along the street in Concord, New Hampshire, together, Mr. Mugridge, in his cheerful voice, said: "Judge, let's go into partnership. You furnish the capital and I'll furnish the brains."

The judge quickly pulled a two-cent piece from his pocket, and, holding it in the palm of his hand, said to Mugridge: "Very well; cover that, John! Cover that!"

The feast was fast degenerating into orgy. Damocles arrived, howed politely to the King, took the seat indicated to him, and at the same time placed at his feet a parcel wrapped in newspapers which he had carried under his arm. The feast continued. Every possible delicacy was served to Damocles, from his brains to ants' livers, not to speak of many wonderful beverages. Then dancing girls came in. Damocles was being them closely when Denys, the servant, tapped him on the shoulder and pointed to the roof. Over Damocles' head hung a sharp sword, attached by a slender thread. Damocles looked at the sword, shrugged his shoulders, and picked up the parcel at his feet. Carefully removing the newspaper, he drew out a fireman's helmet in phosphor-bronze, with steel chain mail to protect the neck. He put it on his head and quietly asked for more roast camel. The servant was much annoyed.

At a Fourth of July celebration in a Canadian town, where both English and American guests were assembled, the fife of the two countries were used in alternations. A frivolous young Englishman, loyal to the queen, but with no love for the Stars and Stripes, exclaimed, "What a silly-looking thing the American flag is. It suggests nothing but checker-herry candy." "Yes," replied Senator Hoar, "the kind of candy that made everybody sick who tried to eat it."

New Yorker and his wife were recently traveling in England. In London the wife bought a shawl in the Quadrant, and insisted on wearing it to her hotel across her shoulders. The price label had been accidentally left on the garment, and as she walked along the sales-ladies read the following somewhat pathetic announcement: "Very Chaste—Five Guineas!"

There are times when differences of opinion do not count, and an Irish soldier was said to have chanced upon one of them during the late war in Cuba. He was discovered by the sergeant of his company in a hole, well out of the way of a stray shot, when he should have been engaged in active service. "Get out of that hole!" commanded the sergeant, sternly. "Get out of it this minute!" The broad Irish face looked at him, with stubborn resistance even on every feature. "You may be a superior officer," he said boldly, "but all the same Oi'm the wan that dug this hole fir-rst!"

At a banquet," said an editor, "I heard Jerome K. Jerome make a speech on snoring. I remember that it ended with these words: "To cure snoring it is advised that a bit of soap be dropped into the mouth of the snorer. The oil in the soap will lubricate the pharynx and other Latin parts of the throat. This remedy must be applied with caution; otherwise the snorer will arise and lubricate the floor with the person who dropped in the soap."

A farmer wrote to the editor of the Farmers' Friend this letter: "Sir, I have a horse that has been afflicted for the past year with medical fits of dizziness. Please send through your valuable paper, and let me know what I should do with him, for he seems to get worse instead of better;

I am afraid he will be unfit for work if something is not done soon."

The editor replied in the next issue as follows: "Our honest advice, based on a careful perusal of that excellent work, 'Every Man His Own Horse Doctor,' would be to take this horse some time when he is not dizzy and sell him to a stranger."

Caruso, the great tenor, is a great ventriloquist as well, and in New York, before he sailed for home, he told, at a little farewell dinner, a story of his ventriloquial skill.

"I was one of a house party at a millionaire's great, new castle overlooking the Hudson," he said. "Tea had been served in the garden, and after tea I sang. Then I consented to essay a little ventriloquism, and the fifty or sixty guests grew very still.

"Behind me rose a superb tree. Looking up into the thick foliage, I shouted in a loud and angry voice: "Hello! What are you doing up there?"

"To my amazement a thin young voice replied: "I ain't doin' no harm, mister. I'm just a-watchin' the big-hugs."

"The guests glanced at one another, smiling appreciatively. Pulling myself together, I went on: "Did any one give you permission to climb up into that tree?"

"Yes, sir. The second groom, sir. He's my cousin."

"Well," said I, 'so far there's no harm done. But be careful not to fall, and don't let any one see you."

"All right, mister," said the humble voice.

"I turned to my audience, and smiled and bowed triumphantly. They broke into thunderous applause. They said that they had never listened to ventriloquism so superb. And they were quite right, too."

A doctor who had saved the life of a woman, a personal friend, was asked his charge. He said he generally allowed his patient friends to remunerate him as they thought befitting.

"But don't you often get disappointed on these terms?" she inquired.

"I may say, never."

"As you are so easily pleased, here," and she playfully gave him her empty hand, while in the other was concealed a check for a handsome sum. "How easily I could have taken you in!" she added, producing the check.

"But you have only succeeded in drawing me out," he said, declining to relinquish her hand. "Don't insult me with a check; I am most generously rewarded."

Perhaps she understood the doctor's difficulty and wished to help him out of it. At any rate, the giving of her hand led him to offer his heart.

Secretary Shaw, searching for the hidden things in the lives of his hundreds of clerks, had blanks sent around the Treasury asking each clerk to give his vital statistics. One line requested an answer to the question, "Are you suffering from any disease?"

When the blanks came in it was found that one man said he had tuberculosis. Secretary Shaw sent for him. He came in, a big, broad-shouldered negro messenger, who looked healthy enough to live for fifty years.

"Why," said the Secretary, "you haven't got tuberculosis!"

"Ain't I?" asked the negro.

"No, you haven't. You are perfectly healthy. Why did you write on this blank that you have tuberculosis?"

"Well," said the messenger, "I dunno; 'ceptin' if there's anythin' fashionable goin' 'round I want it."

A well known New York physician, while recently attending a banquet, indulged rather freely in various liquors. Not being accustomed to drinking, the effects soon became apparent. Before the banquet was over, he was summoned to one of his most aristocratic patients, and was soon speeding up Fifth Avenue in his automobile. Arriving at a certain brown-stone mansion, the doctor with superhuman efforts managed to walk straight, and was ushered into his patient's boudoir. He drew out his watch and proceeded to feel the pulse, but try as he would it was impossible for him to find it. Disgusted with himself he muttered: "Positively drunk!" when to his amazement the lady exclaimed: "Oh, doctor, I implore you not to tell on me!"

Liqueur Peres Chartreux Green and Yellow

This famous Cordial, now made at Tarragona, Spain, was for centuries distilled by the Carthusian monks (Peres Chartreux) at the monastery of La Grande Chartreuse, France, and known throughout the world as Chartreuse. The above cut represents the bottle and label employed in the putting up of the article since the monks' expulsion from France, and it is now known as LIQUEUR PERES CHARTREUX (the monks, however, still retain the right to use the old bottle and label as well), distilled by the same order of monks who have securely guarded the secret of its manufacture for hundreds of years and who alone possess a knowledge of the elements of this delicious nectar.

Hermann Oelrichs died suddenly Saturday evening, September 1, on board the steamer Wilhelm der Grosse, on the way home from Europe. Mrs. Oelrichs, who had preceded her husband to America only two weeks, learned of his death through a wireless message before the steamer arrived in New York. Mr. Oelrichs was 56 years old, and well known in the East as in the West. He married in 1890 Miss Theresa Alice Fair, daughter of Senator Fair, who survives him. In 1895 he took up his residence permanently in San Francisco. Shortly after the great fire he went to Europe and to several of the noted medicinal springs, though his health was not thought to be seriously affected. He was an athlete in his earlier years, and a prominent and popular figure in the leading clubs all his life. Among his varied talents was that of literary facility, and his occasional rhymes were noted even outside the wide circle of his friends.

The Springfield Fire and Marine Insurance Company, through Geo. D. Domin, manager of the Pacific department, thanks its friends for their splendid endorsement of the action taken by President Damon and his Directors in the handling of the claims of the hundreds of policy holders in San Francisco, and says: "Since June 1st one hundred and fifty-seven new commissions have been issued to new agents in this department. The premium income has increased by leaps and bounds, and without apparent congestion. In the near future we plan to put into the hands of our friends a full review of the record of the Springfield in the San Francisco conflagration." In the meantime the company has issued a brief digest from the semi-annual statement of June 30, 1906, which says:

Assets	$7,337,875.48
Liabilities
Capital paid in	$2,000,000.00
Losses unpaid	1,617,115.03
Reinsurance reserve	2,985,133.64
Net Surplus	$735,626.81
Surplus to policy holders	$2,735,626.81

On August 15 practically all claims in the San Francisco conflagration in which the Springfield was alone interested, or with less than six companies, had been paid, as have been a large number of those adjusted by committees. The aggregate claims will not differ materially from the figures originally given out. A full analysis will follow.

Sons of the Pioneers.

The aristocrats of America are the sons and grandsons of the pioneers. It does not matter whether they were burghers from Holland or round-cropped farmers from England, or whether the pioneers traded furs or navigated hay scows. The descendants of the families of Virginia are no more exclusive than the families of Boston and Manhattan and Philadelphia and New Orleans who can look back to the time when their ancestors were pioneers in new settlements. There was adventure and romance in the days of the pioneers. Long ago the men and women of those stirring times passed to their reward. Historian and novelist are busier with the records and traditions of their ancestors than with any of the concerns of later days. As their period recedes, imagination glorifies the obscure its details. In the newer empire of the Pacific Coast there still remain many of the pioneers. There are still survivors of the first American investment, spectators of the unimpeachable yet momentous acts of Fremont and Sloat.

There are men who brought their houses in sailing vessels around the Horn, who saw the first washing of golden sands in the Sacramento Valley, and later built high hopes on the opening of the first quartz mine in the lower reaches of the Sierras. Earliest essays in other fields no less important have still their witnesses. Men who first sent oranges to New York and apples to London from California orchards are still vigorous in action and exact in recollection.

History is quick in the making, now. The sons of the pioneers already have done things. One was United States Senator; others have been Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, and Judge. The grandsons of the pioneers are in evidence. On the rolls of universities and colleges their names are thick. The aristocracy of the Western States is forming, and not slowly.

The exclusive order is justified. It is the crown of lands worth fighting for. There are inhospitable shores and isles of the sea that will never know the dominion of sons of pioneers. Adventurous spirits have conquered them, but only to search, to exploit, to strip of furs, or gold, or tropic fruits, and to abandon. Sons and grandsons of the pioneers may in themselves be unworthy, but they are proofs of conquest, of settlement, of clinging regard for the soil that historians of the next and succeeding centuries must reckon with. It is the golden age of the last division in the order of American aristocrats.

The President's Spelling Reform.

Rarely has President Roosevelt experienced such a disheartening rebuff as that administered to his endorsement of the spelling reform scheme. The President is so popular that, usually, it makes little difference what course he may advocate. He is generally certain of the support of about half the people, and occasionally of nearly all of them. Generally he has his own party at his back, and a large quota of the Democrats. It was so when he began his crusade against the Northern Securities Company, his attacks on the Trusts, and his advocacy of the Railway Rate Bill. In his onslaught on the meat-packing industry—allied as it was with the cattle industry of his friends, the cattlemen of the West—he had the people behind him. Even in some of his jingo outbreaks, like the Venezuela and San Domingo schemes, while the people were not exactly cheering behind him, they at least were silent, and did not actively express their disapproval. But now, in the matter of the "improved spelling" proposition, the President for the first time finds himself alone. We use "alone" advisedly, for the presence of the more or less distinguished gentlemen who inveigled him into this orthographical morass can scarcely be considered as giving aid, comfort, or even company.

When it comes to spelling, the American people are conservative. Noah Webster tried to "reform" the nation's spelling a century ago. He touched every chord which vibrates in the American heart, including dislike of Great Britain, which then was rampant. But even Noah Webster was two centuries ahead of his time. So far-fetched were many of the "improved spellings" of Webster that his editors, a generation later, were forced to modify them. Strange as it may appear, his more recent editors, two generations later, were forced completely to expunge some of his "reformed spellings." In fact, the "International American Dictionary" (the latest edition of Webster printed some few years ago), approaches more nearly to the spelling of the British lexicographers than did the first edition, edited by Noah Webster himself. This shows how conservative English-speaking people are in spelling, even when our patriotism is appealed to, and our desire to build up an "American spelling." For Noah Webster called his volume "An American Dictionary of the English Language."

If President Roosevelt had stopped to think, it might have occurred to him that a phonetic system of spelling in the United States is impossible until there is a uniform system of pronunciation. Before spelling phonetically it is indispensable that people should agree on the pronunciation of their words. Waiving all question of common nouns (such as "suit," "tube," "news," etc.), many of our proper nouns in the United States are variously pronounced. Take, for example, the name of our largest city. This is pronounced by the Gothamites themselves "N'Yawk." It is almost a monosyllable, and the "r," as indicated, is pronounced soft. In the New England States the name is pronounced in two syllables. "New Yawk," with the long sound of the "u" in the first syllable, and with the soft sound of the "r" in the second syllable. This we here try to indicate as nearly as it may be done in English letters. For one of the chief drawbacks to following phonetic spelling in English is that our letters have absolutely no sound-values at all. When you see a single letter staring at you in English you are forced to admit that you can not tell how it is pronounced unless you see it in a syllable; when you see the same letter in a syllable you are forced to admit again that you do not know how either the letter or the syllable is pronounced unless you see it in a word. Not long ago a very eminent man used the word "ay" (meaning "ever") and rhymed it with "sky." He had been using the English language for half a century, yet did not know how those two vowels were pronounced. These facts may give some idea of the difficulties in the way of making English a phonetic language. But probably President Roosevelt did not think, when he advocated spelling reform, that we should first need a new alphabet as well as a new way of spelling.

To resume our parallels: West of the Alleghenies the name of our chief city is generally pronounced thus: "Noo Yo-r-r-k." Here again we will attempt to indicate the harsh Western burr of the "r," produced by croaking with the uvula. This sound is unknown in New England, in the Middle States, and in the South. It differs from the pronunciation of "New York," as heard in the South, as night differs from day. South of Mason and Dixon's Line the long "u" sound in the word "New" is pronounced with even greater stress than in New England, while the "r" is even softer in the South than in the Middle States. Parenthetically, we may remark that the long "u" is always sounded in the South, but never in the West. True, in the South it varies. The "u" in the Gulf States is different from the "u" in Virginia and Kentucky, but still it is the long "u." In the West, on the other hand, the long "u" sound becomes "oo." Compare "suit," "tube," "lure," "dupe"—generally pronounced in the West, "soot," "toob," "loor," and "doop."

Given, then, the existence of these varying sound-values, how, may we ask, would it be possible to spell "New York" phonetically with these various pronunciations? The only way would be for each part of the country to spell it the way it was pronounced there. But even that would not be feasible, for, as the English letters have no settled sound-values, the resulting spelling might not give the sound sought by the speller when reproduced by the pronouncer.

Let us take the name of another large city, that of the metropolis of the West. The name of the great city on Lake Michigan is pronounced in at least a dozen different manners, as thus:

Sheecahgo	Shichahgo	Cheecahgo	Chicahgo
Sheecawgo	Shicawgo	Cheecawgo	Chicawgo
Sheecago	Shicago	Cheecago	Chicago

The pronunciations are crudely indicated above. It is difficult to indicate, without diacritical accents, shades of sound-values in English. In fact, it is almost impossible. In happier days the Argonaut had the habit of using accents in its pages. While its diacritical accents doubtless gratified the critical, they caused trouble at times in the composing room. Not infrequently some linotype Adonis, breathing cigarette perfume from his curly locks, would with his lily fingers tap our keys, and take our sesterces for an "extra shift." Sometimes such a young man, gazing at his "copy" in mingled terror and indignation, would cry to the foreman: "Get on to the left-handed fly-speck e's! Do them things go?" When assured that they did, such a stranger would frequently, without further words, put on his coat and depart instant.

Since the 18th of April, however, the Argonaut has not offended either linotype operators or proof-readers by the use of accents. They were all shaken out of us at that time. Now we have no accents concealed about us, diacritical or otherwise. Therefore, we are reduced to attempting to indicate the various ways in which the American people pronounce "Chicago" by the foregoing crude collocations of letters. We may add in explanation that the "sh" in the first lot means the soft sound of "ch"; that the "ch" is to be sounded as in "church" and "cherry" in the second lot; and that the sounds of "a" and "i" are the long and short sounds, which would be indicated by breve accents if we had them.

How would President Roosevelt spell "Chicago" by his reform system of spelling? If he spelled it as he pronounces it, would that mean that all the people who pronounce it differently would then proceed to pronounce it as the President does? Or would they follow his phonetic spelling merely, and claim that they, too, like him, had the right to spell "Chicago" the way they pronounced it?

There are many other varying pronunciations of American names which will occur to the reader. The chief city of the South is variously pronounced. It is called "Noo Orleans" in many parts of the Middle West, but in other parts of the country it is called "New Orleans." So with the chief city of Missouri—it is pronounced "Sen Looey" and "Saint Lewis." The chief city of Kentucky is called "Lewsville" and "Loeeyville." The capital of New York is called "Awlbany" and "Albany" with the short sound of the a.

In California there are so many peculiarities of pronunciation evolved in struggling with our Spanish and Indian names that a whole board of spelling reformers could scarcely cope with them. For example, the City of the Angels is usually pronounced by old Californians thus, "Lohse Angayless," which in their opinion is the Spanish pronunciation. They are in error, for the Spanish "jota" sound before "e" or "i" is a strong guttural, and the hard g sound which they give to "Angeles" resembles it but little. The citizens of a later generation—humorously dubbed, in the North, the "one-lungers"—usually call the name of their town, on first arriving, "Lawss-Annjeeles." After they get acclimated they change it to "Lawss Angeless." When they reach this stage of pronunciation they call themselves "Angeleenose," and talk glibly of Early California, Fray Jewneepairo Serra, and the Cameyeno Reeawl.

Thus it will be seen that there are difficulties for the ardent orthographical reformer in California. Even in San Francisco there are many such difficulties. For example, one of the principal streets is called by San Franciscans "Mungumree," although it is spelled "Montgomery" street, and by strangers is always pronounced "Mont-gom-er-y." This pronunciation, for some reason, produces a disagreeable impression on the native ear.

It would take too much space to discuss common as well as proper nouns. Probably the most common noun in America is "girl." Let us not be misunderstood. By this we do not mean to underrate the American girl, or to imply that she is of the common or garden variety, but rather to insinuate delicately that she is of the rosebud garden of girls; hence, being ever in the mind and frequently on the lips of the youth of America, she is the most common noun. Yet she is pronounced "gairl" on the stage, "goil" by Chimmie Fadden, "guh" by people who cannot sound the "r," and "gu-r-r-l" in the vigorous and bounding West, where people have the courage of their "r." How would President Roosevelt spell "girl" under his reformed spelling ideas, when this marked difference of opinion about girls exists among the people?

To reform any language is a work of time. Something like a century ago Spain attempted to make her spelling phonetic. The Spanish Academy prepared elaborate rules and issued a dictionary changing completely the spelling of the language. In the course of three generations it has had its effect. Spanish is probably more nearly phonetic than any modern tongue. Yet note this experience. Spanish-America is an enormous country, Mexico, Central America and South America including many millions of people. They pay only a sentimental allegiance to the Crown of Spain. This allegiance does not extend to the modifying of their spelling. As a result they have modified such parts of the language as pleased them and have allowed the rest to remain. In some respects they have gone farther than the Spanish Academy. For example, throughout most of South America the Greek "i" has been entirely abolished. In Spain it was largely abolished; in certain words, however, like "and" (y) it was left by reason of its frequency and familiarity. This Spanish America would not stand. The result is that you see the letter "i" used for "y" throughout the Spanish-American newspapers and books. The effect is peculiar, not to say unpleasant to a stranger. What must it be to a Spaniard?

If the sometime Spanish Colonies could not agree with Spain on spelling, is there any chance that we could ever agree with England? And is there any chance that England's colonies could ever agree with us? or would they agree with her if she agreed with us? And if we agreed with her and she disagreed with New Zealand, say, would our own colonies agree with us? Or would they agree with New Zealand, which is a pattern for new countries?

In short, as the Constitution does not follow the flag in the Philippines, does Mr. Roosevelt think that the spelling book would?

Helping the Cuban Insurgents.

A few years ago vessels were continually leaving ports on the Atlantic Coast loaded with arms and other munitions of war for the Cuban insurgents. Our government benevolently turned its blind eye toward these filibusters, and when one was arrested, which was rarely, he was usually allowed to go with an admonition. How about it now? Suppose shipments of men and munitions of war should secretly sail from American ports to aid the present lot of Cuban insurgents? Would our government discourage them? If so, why? What is the reason that insurgents should not be aided, whether they insurge against a Palma or against a Weyler? Yet we fear that our government would put a stop to any such attempt. But again we ask, why? Did not our government wink at the revolution which tore Panama by a Cesarean operation from the flanks of the Republic of Colombia? That was a revolution against a republic and not against a monarchy. But that, we are told, is a very different matter. But why?

California Republican Convention.

The Republican State Convention of California met in Santa Cruz last week. There was little delay in organizing. The candidates for Governor were reduced to three—George C. Pardee, the present incumbent; James N. Gillett, at present a Congressman from California, and J. O. Hayes, of Santa Clara County.

Before the nomination for Governor came to a vote J. O. Hayes withdrew, leaving in the field Pardee and Gillett. On the first ballot Congressman Gillett was elected, receiving 591 1-2 to Governor Pardee's 233 1-2 votes. The nomination was well received, and, although Governor Pardee and his friends were naturally much disappointed, they accepted their defeat philosophically. The platform is elsewhere discussed. ticket is as follows:

Governor—JAMES N. GILLETT, Humboldt.
Lieutenant-Governor—WARREN PORTER, Santa Clara.
Secretary of State—CHARLES F. CURRY, San Francisco.
Treasurer—W. R. WILLIAMS, Fresno.
Controller—E. P. COLGAN, Sacramento.
Attorney-General—U. S. WEBB, Plumas.
Surveyor-General—W. S. KINGSBURY, Los Angeles.
Superintendent of Public Instruction—EDWARD HYATT, Riverside.
Public Printer—W. W. SHANNON, San Francisco.
Clerk of Supreme Court—FRANK L. CAUGHEY, Modocino.

Supreme Court of California.
Long Term—FREDERICK W. HENSHAW, San Mateo.
Long Term—WILLIAM G. LORIGAN, Santa Clara.
Short Term—MAX C. SLOSS, San Francisco.

State Court of Appeals.
First District—
CARROLL COOK, San Francisco (presiding).
FRANK H. KERRIGAN, San Francisco.
SAMUEL P. HALL, Alameda.

Second District—
MATTHEW T. ALLEN, Los Angeles (presiding).
J. W. TAGGART, Santa Barbara.
VICTOR E. SHAW, San Diego.

Third District—
N. F. CHAPMAN, Tehama (presiding).
E. C. HART, Sacramento.
ALBERT G. BURNETT, Sonoma.

Board of Equalization.
ALEXANDER BROWN, Calaveras.
RICHARD E. COLLINS, Shasta.
W. J. MELVAINE, San Bernardino.
Railroad Commission.
THEODORE SUMMERLAND, Los Angeles.
A. C. IRWIN, Yuba.

Already there are mutterings that Mr. Gillett would be solidly opposed by the Union Labor vote acting under the orders of Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor. We see no honest reason for this opposition. Mr. Gillett has come up from the ranks of the toilers, and himself once labored as a logger and a lumberman. We think that such a man is more of a laboring man than some of the jaw-breakers who occupy soft seats in the luxurious Washington headquarters of "Labor headquarters." But whether he is or is not is neither here nor there. The only allegation which Gompers makes against Gillett which is worthy of a moment's thought is that Gillett did not vote for the eight-hour law for the Panama Canal came up against that he worked against the Anti-Injunction Labor bill. Therefore, Gompers, as head of the Federation of Labor, has ordered the Union Labor men in California to vote against Gillett. Those of us who are Republicans and free American citizens and who will not take orders from a naturalized foreign immigrant, boosted by luck into the position of a labor leader, will vote for Gillett. But those who are not free American citizens, but serfs, helots, slaves, and cowards—for short, let us say Union Labor men—will take orders from Gompers; such men can vote against Gillett. Let us see which are the more numerous in California. If the free American citizens are in a majority—and the Argonaut believes they are—Gillett will be elected. If the other kind are in a majority—and the Argonaut hopes they are not—then Gillett will be defeated. But if there is in California a majority made up of ignorant, vicious, lawless, naturalized foreigners, bossing a cowardly and degraded Americans, then Gillett need not repine over his defeat, for to preside over such a commonwealth would be no honor.

Sauerkrautiana!

Two German lawyers have recently arrived in San Francisco, to investigate the insurance situation. It is probable they came with the intention of taking action against the crooked sauerkraut companies for San Francisco policy holders. Therefore, their optimistic statements may be looked upon with a certain degree of reserve. But both are emphatic in stating that the Transatlantic and Moselle, the Hamburg-Bremen, the Transatlantic, the Austrian Phoenix, and other crooked companies condemned in strong terms in Germany. They add that the German courts will not uphold the companies. It is to be hoped that these German lawyers are in their belief that the so-called "earthquake clause" will not stand the scrutiny of the German courts, and that they will not uphold it. By the way, it is not unamusing to note that one of the chief malcontents among the crooked sauerkraut companies is the old long name, "the Austrian Phoenix Imperial Privileged Insurance Company of Vienna, Austria." This company has no "earthquake clause" in its policies, but has issued a proclamation that "Ail policies company became null and void by the earthquake of 1901."

April 18, 1906." A good deal has been ascribed to the famous earthquake, but we think it is overworking even a lively seismic spasm when it is held responsible for voiding a policy without any earthquake clause in it. From this it seems that some of the sauerkraut companies are as humorous as well as crooked.

Is the Street Car Strike Settled?

When last week's Argonaut went to press the carmen were still on strike in San Francisco and the company was steadfast in its determination to operate its cars. In order to do this, they had a large number of strike-breakers on the way. These men came by the northern and southern transcontinental railways, and at various points they were assailed by union workmen. At a junction in Nevada a number of union miners had collected, who threatened the strike-breakers with violence if they did not desert, following up their threats by hurling stones through the car windows. The upshot of this was not unamusing: Instead of the Nevada bad men driving the strike-breakers back to their train, the Eastern tenderfeet poured out from the cars, pulled their revolvers, and the Nevada bad men fled in a stamp of revolver bullets.

While this sort of thing may be amusing at a distance, it is not at all amusing at home. The idea of men workmen and imported strike-breakers armed with guns and fighting over the possession of San Francisco does not commend itself to our citizens. Therefore, when President Calhoun succeeded in outwitting the carmen's pickets and got his strike-breakers into his cars without a battle in the streets, it made everybody breathe more freely. Calhoun did it by bringing his men from Vallejo junction down the bay by boat, instead of up the peninsula, or across the bay by the regular ferries. Thus he succeeded in placing some 100 men in the various car-barns of the street car company. The striking carmen at once set afloat the rumor that these men were "imprisoned" there against their will. Police Captain Duke therefore visited the car-barns and addressed the occupants, informing them that, if they desired to leave, the police would escort them safely to any point they desired to go. They replied that they desired to stay and go to work.

It was quite evident that they would all have gone to work had not the strike been settled. On the eleventh night of the strike the citizens of San Francisco were surprised and gratified to see the street cars again rolling along the streets.

What led to the settlement? It was this—the carmen gave way, and—for the time—the strike collapsed. That is the only way to express it. Calhoun refused to have anything to do with the striking carmen until they went back to work. His statement and his standpoint were logical and reasonable; he said: "If the men are in my employ they must operate the cars. If the men are not in my employ they shall have nothing to say about operating the cars."

The persistent attempts of the strike-leaders and their attorney to make Mr. Calhoun waver from this stand were futile. At the same time he freely stated that he would increase the men's pay and would leave the question of shortening their hours to arbitration, but that arbitration should begin after they had gone back to work. In addition to Calhoun's firm stand on these matters, there was also the attitude of the public, which sympathized with the carmen's demand for higher wages, but not with their headstrong, unjust and unreasonable attitude of the cars. Another factor was the attitude of the press, even, which is usually so cowardly and time-serving in labor disputes, but which, by its silence in condemning the carmen, showed that the press believed they were right; the attitude of the Building Trades Council, representing some scores of thousands of union workmen, who condemned the action of the carmen; the reported action of President W. D. Mahon of the National Association of Carmen, in condemning the men for violating their agreement and ordering them to return to work on penalty of being deprived of their charter; the action of the merchants of San Francisco, who sent a committee to urge a settlement on the company and the carmen, and likewise to "confer" with the press—all of these in varying ways led to the settlement of the strike.

The men went back to work without conditions. This was right, for while the Argonaut believes the men were and are entitled to better wages under the new conditions since the fire, they forfeited all claims to consideration because: (1) They set aside a formal agreement; (2) they demanded an answer in three days, when President Calhoun was four days distant; (3) they went on strike on August 26th when the concessions they demanded were not to be operative until September 1st; (4) they walked out only a few hours before the arrival of the president, the only man who could answer them; (5) they made certain demands and then struck before these demands were refused; (6) they not only ignored their solemn agreement, but they trampled on it contemptuously by refusing to heed its provision that all disputes should be arbitrated; (7) they tied up the entire street car system by extending their strike from the United Railroads to the Geary street and California street systems, which roads had nothing to do with the controversy, which were crippled from the fire, and which had barely begun running their cars a few days before to accommodate the public.

Some would condemn us for speaking in what they would call this harsh manner of the striking carmen. But we think they deserve no consideration. Nobody objected to their demand for an increase of pay. Practically everybody favored it. The company practically conceded it before the strike and did concede it as soon as the men struck. But what we condemn the men for is their dishonorable and dishonest action. It is dishonorable to break a contract, and it is dishonest to treat a friendly community as the carmen treated the citizens of San Francisco. Furthermore, the conduct of the men since the strike has not been such as to impel fair-minded men to criticize them other than harshly. Their strike leaders and political attorneys have been advising them to make all the trouble that they can. President Calhoun at once offered them an increase in pay and a decrease in hours in lieu of arbitrating the matter. This the unions promptly refused. They demanded that the matter be referred to arbitration. The unions which were out include the platform men, the electric linemen, the stationary firemen, and the track workers (the laborers who were recently organized into a union). The strike leaders made the claims of each of these a separate matter and demanded a tribunal of arbitration for each union. This was acceded to. Thereupon the striking unions appointed Cornelius, the carmen's strike leader, as their arbitrator. The railroad company, which had hoped to have a board of three impartial men, was thus forced to appoint their own man, Mr. Mullally, assistant to the president. Therefore the tribunal will consist of two advocates, and the third man to be appointed will practically have the entire burden of deciding everything thrown upon him. This is scarcely the right spirit in which to enter on the settlement of an industrial dispute.

The unions further attempted to complicate the situation. They demanded on their return to work that President Calhoun should discharge all of the men he had brought to run the cars during the strike. He promptly refused to do so. Thereupon, the union leaders put on a surprised and injured air, and doubted whether they would be able to induce their men to "work alongside of scabs." To this President Calhoun promptly replied that all of the former employees would be put to work if they applied, but that if any of them did not desire to work they would not be urged. In short, the union tried to inject the question of the "closed shop" into the controversy, a factor which did not exist before. President Calhoun has always refused to recognize the "closed shop." He said to the strike leaders: "I do not believe in the 'closed shop.' I recognize the right of the American citizen to seek employment where he pleases and at what price he can get. I shall certainly make no distinction between my employees, whether they are members of a union or not, although I am always glad to accord full recognition to the unions."

To sum up, the results of this strike have been about as follows: The carmen went out for ten days; they tied up the cars; they tied up the town; they inflicted a vast amount of injury on a community struggling to recover from a great disaster; they half ruined numerous small dealers; they inflicted great losses on larger ones; they caused the population of a sorely-stricken city, which had been more than friendly to the carmen, to suffer a vast deal of physical discomfort; they semi-paralyzed the business and social life of the city. And what did they accomplish? They got three dollars a day, but that was offered to them without a strike. They will get an adjustment of their hours of labor, but that also was offered to them without a strike. And they got nothing else except the dislike and contempt of the people whom they have outraged. As for the officers of the company, with which they broke a solemn agreement, they may pretend to be appeased, but they will have to keep a large number of strike-breakers on hand, and they ought to. For men who will break one contract will break another, and men who are dishonest once may be expected to be dishonest twice.

Thus the carmen have accomplished most in leading employers to justifiable suspicion of labor unions when they make a contract; thus they have brought a stigma on union labor; and they have, by their unsuccessful attempt to inject the "closed shop" into the United Railroads system, probably ensured the complete killing off of that iniquitous and un-American scheme in San Francisco. It may lead some day to this union-ridden city arriving at such a stage as Los Angeles, where both employers and workmen are free, where any free American citizen may employ any other free American citizen without some bad-smelling foreigner coming between them and telling them what the one should pay and the other should receive.

Further to prove the dishonesty of the strikers, they at once broke their agreement to "settle" the strike. After their union officials had signed promises to that effect with the United Railroads, the strikers began assaulting the repair cars, because they were manned with non-union linemen. Even the attempt of the company to march the strike-breakers out of the city led to a riotous assault, in which many were injured on both sides.

The "Inside" of the Convention.

Readers who have been puzzled by the Delphic utterances of the dailies concerning the probable outcome of the Republican nominating convention may have thought that their perplexity would cease with the convention. Not so. The reports of the San Francisco dailies on the morning following the nomination of Governor Gillett are even more amazing than their predictions.

It has been said that truth may be found at the bottom of a well. If so, the well in which the lightly clad lady conceals herself never could be located on newspaper premises. There is probably some truthful explanation of the inside workings before and during the Republican convention. But if there is, it is yet to be found in any of the San Francisco dailies, for the number of fairy tales, roorbacks and grapevine telegrams which they print is little less than amazing. Let us summarize briefly some of the remarkable statements made about the Republican convention in these dailies:

The Republican convention "by grace of Mr. Herrin and Mr. Ruef" placed in nomination James N. Gillett for Governor, says the Examiner.

The San Francisco delegation was voted for Gillett because Schmitz ordered them to turn down Ruef and go to Herrin, says the Chronicle.

The alliance between Herrin and Ruef is solid and the Republican machine is working perfectly, says the Examiner.

Ruef and Herrin quarreled and Ruef refused to let the San Francisco delegates vote the machine ticket, owing to his hatred of Herrin, says the Chronicle.

Ruef threw down Hayes in order to make a secret deal with Herrin about the San Francisco water front patronage.

The Herrin-Ruef deal gave to Herrin the entire State ticket, while Ruef was given complete supremacy in San Francisco and the control of all State patronage in San Francisco.

Walter Parker utterly failed to "make good" on his plans, and was forced to appeal to Ruef for assistance.

Ruef refused to go back on his friend Hayes.

Hayes withdrew from the fight in order to relieve Ruef of embarrassment.

Hayes believed to the last that Ruef was loyal to him and was overcome with surprise and disgust when he learned at the eleventh hour that Ruef had thrown him down.

Ruef did not throw Hayes down; it was Schmitz.

The only way for Ruef out of his dilemma was to call on Schmitz for help.

Schmitz suddenly appeared on the ground and took away the leadership of the San Francisco delegates from Ruef. Schmitz and Ruef quarreled in consequence.

Ruef told Hayes that Schmitz was secretly working against them, and had corrupted certain of the San Francisco delegates.

Thus Ruef succeeded in giving Hayes the double cross by passing it up to Schmitz.

Schmitz and Ruef have quarreled bitterly.

Schmitz and Ruef are firm friends.

Schmitz and Ruef are only pretending to quarrel.

Schmitz and Ruef are still political allies, but the events in the convention have cooled their friendship.

Schmitz and Gillett had a conference, and the Mayor promised that he would not be an independent candidate.

This compact led to the turning over of the San Francisco delegation to Gillett.

Schmitz in return was promised absolute control of San Francisco.

Herrin promised Ruef absolute control in San Francisco.

Ruef succeeded in getting the promise of his candidates on the equalization and railroad commissioner boards by arrangement with Herrin.

Herrin has nominated the whole ticket and turned down Ruef, who has not a single office.

Mayor Schmitz is responsible for the election of Gillett. He came down, took away the San Francisco delegation from Ruef, and voted it for Gillett.

Gillett could have been nominated easily without any votes from San Francisco.

If the San Francisco bunch of votes had not been thrown to Gillett, he would have been defeated.

Ruef called the San Francisco delegation together and informed them that several State nominations and the entire harbor front patronage would go to "the boys" if they would vote for Gillett.

This move and the turning over of the San Francisco votes was what nominated Gillett on the first ballot.

Parker tried to ally the Pardee and Gillett forces, thereby shutting out Ruef.

Pardee alleges treachery and is very sore over his defeat. He and his friends will sulk in their tents.

Pardee is not soured by his defeat, but will work hard for the success of the ticket.

Charley Spear wanted to get Ruef's help for Pardee, but the Governor would not have it.

Ruef then determined to do up Pardee and to nominate Gillett.

Ruef nominated Gillett because he thinks he is a weak man.

This is a prearranged scheme between Schmitz and Ruef.

Schmitz intends to run either as an Independent or as the Labor Union candidate, with Ruef for his manager.

Schmitz and Ruef believe that Gompers' attack on Gillett makes him a weak candidate from a Union Labor standpoint.

They believe that both Hayes and Pardee were stronger in this fight than Gillett.

Therefore they threw the San Francisco delegation to Gillett in order that Schmitz might have a weak man to run against.

Frank Schmitz, the Mayor's brother, announced "Gillett will be nominated and he is an easy man to beat."

Spear wanted to make himself solid with Ruef in order to hold his job as Harbor Commissioner.

Ruef's deal with Herrin and Walter Parker was a trade of the votes of the San Francisco delegation for the water-front patronage.

This means Ruef will control about 800 positions on the water front and that Spear will lose his official head.

Ruef insisted on the nomination of Carroll Cook for the Circuit Court.

As Ruef is not on friendly terms with Judge Carroll Cook, he attempted to defeat that judge, but failed.

Herrin controlled the convention absolutely.

Ruef controlled the convention absolutely.

Schmitz controlled the convention absolutely.

Walter Parker controlled the convention absolutely.

From this amazing mess of contradictions the curious reader may perhaps pick out the truth.

Bryan Scores Sullivan.

William J. Bryan's speech at the banquet of the Jefferson Club, Chicago, last week, was devoted to an unmerciful "roast" of National Committeeman Roger C.

Sullivan of Illinois. Although Bryan had demanded Sullivan's resignation from the National Committee, because of his corporate connections, he was indorsed by the State convention, which also declared in favor of Bryan as the next Democratic nominee for President. Bryan informed the Illinois Democrats that if they persisted in their indorsement of Sullivan, he repudiated their indorsement of himself. He thus went on:

"If you say I have no right to interfere in the politics of this State, I reply that I am simply applying to Illinois a principle which I believe ought to be applied universally. I do not regard it as a compliment to be indorsed for the Presidency by a convention which indorsed Mr. Sullivan. I told them in advance that I did not want an indorsement under such circumstances and I repudiate it. If my nomination for any office depended upon that indorsement, I should not accept it."

California Republican Platform.

The platform adopted by the Republican State Convention, assembled at Santa Cruz, may be briefly summarized as follows:

Allegiance to the principles of the Republican party, as set forth in the national platform of 1904, is reaffirmed. Republican control of the Government has resulted in widespread prosperity, and the first session of the fifty-ninth Congress "will go down to history as one of the most remarkable meetings of that body." While all credit is given the members of Congress, their efforts were encouraged and sustained by that "greatest living exponent of American manhood and American statesmanship, Theodore Roosevelt." Congress and the President are commended for the passage of the rate bill. The President and his cabinet advisers are further commended for their efforts to bring to punishment law-evasion trusts. The efforts of the California Senators and Representatives to secure proper legislation for the State is heartily acknowledged. Without naming Governor Pardee, the convention endorses "the conservative, economical and prudent management of State affairs by the present Republican administration of California."

Heartfelt thanks are extended to the officials and private citizens of the nation, for their sympathy and substantial support to San Francisco in its hour of distress. An increase in deposits, and the sustained credit of its banking institutions show that San Francisco, notwithstanding the great calamity, is sound financially. The enactment by Congress of an amendment to the existing tariff law, providing, as a measure of relief in San Francisco, that for the period of three years all building material may be admitted into the port of San Francisco free of all duty is favored. Republican members of the Legislature are pledged to pass such legislation as may be necessary for the further relief of San Francisco.

Senators and Representatives are urged to secure the passage of a law providing for the exclusion of Japanese; to insist on the rigid enforcement of the Chinese Exclusion law; and to prevent the Asiatic population of our insular possessions from coming into the United States proper.

A tenement house law securing light, air and sanitary conveniences is favored. The Legislature is asked to pass laws that will bring about arbitration whenever differences arise between employer and employee.

The necessity of the revision of the present insurance laws is thus stated: "We favor the passage by the Legislature of California of an act requiring that foreign insurance companies shall have a substantial and sufficient deposit within the State of California, as a condition precedent to the issuance of a license to them for the transaction of business within the State, and that an act shall be passed prescribing a standard form of fire insurance policy which shall be requisite to the validity of an insurance contract, and which shall fully protect all rights of the insured." That many insurance cases now pending may be determined within a reasonable time, Congress is asked to appoint an additional Federal Judge.

The passage by the Legislature of a direct primary election law, providing for the nomination of all public officers by the people at a primary election is favored.

The necessity of protecting fruit growers and shippers against exorbitant freight rates and inefficient service is urged; and also an amendment to the Interstate Commerce Act permitting shippers to select the route for their shipments.

It is insisted that California Representatives secure adequate appropriation for the enlargement of the Mare Island shipyards, and that more constructive work of the Navy be performed there.

Sympathy is expressed with the efforts of organized labor to obtain an eight-hour law on Government work. Efforts to improve the hygienic and sanitary conditions of dairies and factories are advocated.

The improvement of the navigability of the navigable rivers and streams of the State is favored.

First Defeat for Gompers.

Mr. Gompers has been beaten in his first fight against the Congressmen whose course has displeased him. Representative Charles E. Littlefield, of the Second Maine District, was re-elected Monday, though by a plurality of only about 1000, where formerly he had been given more than 5000. The campaign was a bitter one. Gompers and his associates being aided by complications over the question of a continuance of the State prohibition law. Governor Cobb, re-elected by 8000 plurality, stood for the present law and against re-submission.

The first State convention of the Independent League of California, held last week in Oakland, nominated William H. Langdon, district attorney of San Francisco, for Governor. Its platform is long and comprehensive, ranging from the election of United States Senators by the people to a standard fire insurance policy.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

The National of Hartford.

The Harry Unna Co., 214 Spruce Street, San Francisco, Cal., August 29th, 1906

Editor Argonaut—Your recent criticism of the National Insurance Co. of Hartford and its methods was read with much interest. Its agents, McNear & Wayne have evidently also read it, and, judging by their letter to you, with some anxiety as to the influence upon Argonaut readers.

As they may be able to "explain" their action in the "McKee" case, we would like to relate to you our experience with The National Insurance Co. of Hartford.

This company carried a risk of $2500 on our stock of merchandise destroyed in the recent fire. Our loss was total and was adjusted by a committee appointed by the Underwriters' Adjustment Bureau. After making the usual deductions for depreciation, etc., our loss found by the committee to be still quite a bit more than the total insurance.

When the undersigned called a few weeks ago at the Oakland office of The National of Hartford "to collect" he was informed by their adjuster, who had been given him a copy of the committee's report, that the adjustment was satisfactory to him but that his company was paying no claim unless at a discount of at least 7½ per cent. He stated that this was not asked account of their inability to pay in full, but because of the unusual origin of the fire, the cutting off of water supply, and, in fact, he advanced the usual "stock" arguments used by the "welders." Now, this was a far better proposition than the "Six B" companies were making, from a financial point of view, still there exists between the two about the same distinction as between petty larceny and grand larceny. We do not think it possible that McNear & Wayne can be ignorant of the methods employed by the adjusters for the company they represent, and for reason their maudlin letter assuring you that they "with the dear old town heart and soul," and sincere, is to us almost nauseating.

Yours very truly,

The Harry Unna Co. of S. F.
Harry Unna, President

One Policy Holder's Experience.

Unsophisticated Policy Holder (entering the so-called adjusting offices of the Fire Insurance Co. of Hartford, located in Oakland, and accosting a clerk) have a—

Clerk—"Go to room at the end of the hall."

U. P. H. (entering said room)—"I have a policy call for payment—"

Another Clerk—"Go to room—"

U. P. H. (arriving at the room)—"I have a policy call for payment by this company—"

Clerk—"Go to room at the head of the stairs."

U. P. H., arriving at a very small room, stands in doorway, subjected to prolonged stares from two other persons. No invitation to go in or state business, and extra chairs. After waiting a considerable time, and being stared at occasionally, a person from another room finally deigns to inquire the occasion of the visit. Policy is shown, and, taking the number, the person obtains from files the proofs of loss which had been filed over two months previously and no objection during the intervening time. This person, whose stature and breadth suggest the Jack of Spades, indicates other room into which the U. P. H. is taken and allowed to be seated.

The Jack (after examining the proofs of loss, taking a printed slip from a drawer)—"Sign this."

U. P. H.—"What is it?"

J.—"A waiver."

The waiver among other things binds the one signing it to accept whatever the adjuster decides shall be paid.

U. P. H.—"Why should I sign this at this time?"

The J.—"We need no sympathy Mr. P."

Exit U. P. H., uncertain whether he has any right at all.

Stanford White.

New York, August 24, 1906.—I have read your article on the murder of Stanford White, and was glad to find a few kind remarks as well as the exaggerated ones that are published here in the World. Decent people do not consult that paper, but we who knew and admired Mr. White for his goodness of heart, as well as his genius for detecting such scandalous articles, I take an especial interest in this case as I was most kindly assisted by Mr. White. Very truly yours, R. T.

Always Time for the Argonaut.

Oakland, Cal., August 21, 1906.—I have much pleasure in renewing my subscription for two years. Since the 18th I have had little time for more than the daily paper, but always find an hour for the Argonaut—a habit of many years. Its visits are like those of an old friend. Keep up the good fight for insurance that pays as it collects. Yours, very truly, Geo. Vine

Bethel, Vermont, July 11, 1906.—In a recent issue see that you published a request for back numbers. I have, I think, a complete file of the copies from 1831, 1905, to April 7, 1906, which I will gladly send if you wish for them.

Wishing you renewed success and prosperity, I am Yours respectfully, Flora C. Kend

SOLDIERS WORKED WITH LOVE.

San Francisco Hospitality Had Made them Grateful and Willing.

Editor Argonaut: Permit me to offer you a few lines bringing upon a matter of general interest to the friends I have left behind me in a city towards which my heart has turned and from which I have been forced to leave after a delightful sojourn of the winter months. I will not say never to return, because if you do all that you can there will be opportunity still for many of us, retired veterans of the civil war, to find a home within the precincts of the City of the Argonauts.

J. P. FARLEY, U. S. A.
Hotel Shirley, Denver, Col., Aug. 6, 1906.]

There are those who remember now having laughed at the ridiculous sight of San Francisco's buildings swaying crazily on their foundations. But that was before the fire had taken its fearful hold upon the city, before it had swept away ninety per cent of San Francisco's wealth, and driven three hundred thousand people from their homes. The terror of the fire changed all the natural mirth to madness, and every one realizes what a providential thing it was that the troops were so quickly called on guard throughout the city. They did much, indeed, to bring the people to their senses; that is, to curb their senses as remained. And those who were mercilessly paid the maximum price for it. It had been made terribly clear to every one that there would be no mitigation of crime in any of its aspects, and it is known now that several persons have been shot or killed for disobeying the orders which it was imperative should be obeyed.

But this is not all. We have but to recall the instant occasion when Lieut. Charles C. Pulis of the Artillery Corps narrowly escaped with his life. This officer was in jeopardy more than once on the day which will be long recorded in the annals of history. In the early morning at the Presidio he narrowly escaped from the falling wall of the wrecked building as he was passing through its portals, and then again, later in the day, when he was carried to the General Hospital of that post with a fractured skull due to a premature blast of dynamite. Yet it was the engineer, the artilleryist and the officer of the mines, with their zealous and well disciplined soldiers who in their co-operation with the civil authorities, aided materially in saving the residence portion of San Francisco from utter destruction. (Note: Reference to these officers and soldiers has only to do with demolitions, and does not refer to the highly efficient work of the Infantry and Cavalry.)

It has been said by the Mining and Scientific Press, of San Francisco, that there was no system in the method of mining during the conflagration in that city on the 18 and 19th of April; but the editor of the journal mentioned, however, credits the officers of the navy from Midway Island with having taken hold towards the last and directed the blasting in a scientific manner. But it is to the article "How the Army Worked to Save San Francisco," by General Funston, which appears in the July number of the Cosmopolitan, that we must turn for a clear and concise statement. Here he says:

"The amount of dynamite in the early hours of the day (April 18th) was too small to accomplish much. When it was obtained it was by the tug from the California Powder works at Pinole. I doubt if any one will ever know the amount of dynamite and gun cotton used in blowing up buildings, but it must have been tremendous as there were times when the explosions were so continuous as to resemble a bombardment.

"Most of the work was done under the instructions of Captains Coleman and Biggs, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., who, however, ascertained the wishes of the fire and police officials as to the buildings to be destroyed. The work Lieut. Pulis of the Artillery Corps was very seriously injured by a premature explosion. While the old brick buildings were reduced to piles of rubble by these explosions, the modern steel and concrete structures remained as impervious to the heavier shells as they had been to the earthquake.

"In the succeeding two days, block by block and street by street, and hour after hour, the firemen, police, and soldiers fought the conflagration, in the hope of possible success. Scores of buildings were blown down by dynamite and gun cotton, and others were set on fire in order to check the conflagration by backfiring."

I myself incline to believe that, as the Scientific Press stated in its issue of May 5th, 1906, it was to the force of the wind and the persistent application of the plants and sacking, soaked in waters found in kitchen sinks, by heroic firemen that eventually saved the northern section of San Francisco.

Until that I have heard or read respecting the conduct of the officers and soldiers of the regular army in San Francisco, nothing has so impressed me as a conversation had with Major G. W. Ruthers, U. S. A., who, during a service of fourteen years in the Eighth Infantry, and also for some years in the Submarine Department, had four successive terms of duty around San Francisco. At my request he has stated his views, and, from my way of thinking, what he says should find its echo in the heart of every officer and soldier of our Army. Here are his exact words:—

"I do not think the regular troops that went to the assistance of San Francisco, at a time of greatest need, expect or deserve commendation, any more than a friend and neighbor who tries to save the life and property of another.

"During more than fifty years, the people of San Francisco have had the army among them, and nowhere on this earth, have officers and men received as warm and sincere welcome.

"The enlisted men have been always treated kindly and considerately by the citizens and the municipal authorities; indeed the latter have gone far out of the way in the direction of patience and leniency.

"The officers felt as much at home in the households of the city as in their own quarters. They were welcomed and always made a part of the social and official functions of the city. The people considered them a part of them; and in turn officers and men felt for San Francisco and its people a love and affection which no other city or people have ever won from such a body of men. So, when the beautiful and beloved city was threatened with destruction, the heart of every officer and man was filled with deepest personal interest and sympathy; and though called into action in obedience to orders, every one of them felt he was being given the opportunity to assist in saving the lives and property of friends and rendering aid to the homeless.

"The American regular soldier is ever sublime in face of danger or calamity. His training teaches coolness and intelligent individuality, willing and unquestioned obedience to those under whom he serves. Those of us who know him best, take off our hats to him.

"Had the troops not been ordered into the city as organizations, they would have been there as individuals, with or without permission, trying to save life and property.

"The rations stored at the Presidio and other posts were at once turned over to the homeless people, and I am sure there is not an officer or soldier who knew San Francisco who would not have shared his last ration with the people without thought where the next would come from.

"San Francisco was not a city which boasted of hospitality, but there was more real hospitality there than any other place in the world."

It is clear that Major Ruthers is disposed to rest the obligation where it rightfully belongs—with the army—and not with the good people of the stricken community.

Of course our soldiers ever have rendered a good account of themselves in cases of this kind, as may be instanced when the cities of Chicago, Boston, and Baltimore were threatened with extinction by the fire fiend.

But there is another story to tell in this connection. It was in the year 1832, the trying days of nullification, when in Charleston harbor the red-hot-shot batteries were prepared preliminary to shelling the city. Orders were received from Andrew Jackson countermarching his previous instructions, and the day was postponed when the State of South Carolina should seek to withdraw herself from the Union.

During the so-called nullification period, as I have it from my father, who commanded Castle Pinckney with Company C, First Artillery, at the time, the alarm bells were rung and the soldiers, ever ready to obey the mandates of humanity, sprang to the relief of the citizens of the city, which but a few days before they were under orders to destroy. The question may be asked: Did Beauregard think, with grateful remembrance, of that dark night, far back in the early "thirties," when Charleston's storehouses were aflame, while he dictated the message to Robert Anderson, permitting him to march out of Fort Sumter, on the eventful evening of April 13th, 1861, with colors flying and drums beating, to bring away his company property, and saluting his flag with fifty guns?

Will San Francisco ever forget the days succeeding the fatal hour, five fifteen A. M., April 18th, 1906, when that hospitality and bounty, which the officers, soldiers, and sailors, of our Army and Navy had enjoyed for so many years, was in kind and degree reciprocated by actions which bespoke the gratitude of men who were only ready to sacrifice life itself in response to the call of duty?

A. M. Garland succeeded Alexander Center in the Pacific Mail Company, September 1st, with the title of freight traffic manager. For several years Garland was in charge of Pacific Mail business in Central America, and a few months ago, when Alexander Center signified his intention to resign, he was selected to take his place.

Walter E. Dennison writes to the Argonaut to suggest that Frisco for San Francisco is not altogether void of pleasing suggestions as "Frisco was the god of peace and pleasure among the ancient Saxons."

POLITICO-PERSONAL.

Congressman J. C. Needham, of the Sixth California District, has been nominated for re-election. He is now serving his fourth term.

It is noted that the Cannon buttons are out, and that they carry the words attributed to Mr. Roosevelt: "Mr. Speaker, you will be the next President."

"Mr. Gompers may find," says the Portland Oregonian (Rep.), "that when he puts his 'O. K.' brand on a candidate it is equivalent to an invitation to some people to 'kick me here.'"

John A. Johnson, the Democratic Governor of Minnesota, has been nominated for re-election and also named as a "logical running mate" for W. J. Bryan on the national ticket in 1908, the latest addition to a list that is growing rapidly.

For United States Senator, John T. Morgan and Edmund W. Pettus had no opposition in the primary election of Alabama. For alternate United States Senator, Joseph F. Johnston, John H. Bankhead and John B. Knox led the poll.

At the Republican primaries in Tucson and other Arizona towns last week the voters went on record as opposed to joint Statehood. In Tucson the anti-jointure ticket received 402 votes against 243 cast for jointure. In outside precincts the result was similar. A feature of the voting was that Mexican electors voted almost solidly in favor of jointure.

Joseph Pulitzer, proprietor of the New York World, who is at Bar Harbor, received a visit a few days ago from District Attorney William Travers Jerome of New York. Mr. Jerome is practically the only rival of William Randolph Hearst for the Democratic nomination for Governor of New York.

Mr. Addicks, of Delaware, is still active. His latest exploit has a certain tragic aspect for his former lieutenants in State politics, for he has sent autograph letters to them all demanding an accounting of the money furnished by him to the party in the campaign of 1904. Addicks pretends to have "consulted counsel" and to be prepared to push the matter in the courts, if necessary.

"John Sharp Williams also came home from abroad yesterday, on the steamship Majestic, which fact has not been proclaimed at all noisily," says the New York Evening Post. "This lesser leader greatly overestimated the appetites of the interviewers and the nimbleness of the photographers when he planned to sail in a vessel that would cross the bar on the same day with the ship bearing a greater one."

Senator Tillman met with a reverse in the South Carolina primary election. He supported Richard L. Manning for Governor and was opposed to M. F. Ansel, who stood on a local option platform. Nearly every county gave Ansel a working majority. A majority of the dispensary advocates, for whom Tillman made twenty speeches, were elected, but the head of the ticket is opposed to the State dispensary system.

The Attorney-General of the State of Texas has rendered an opinion nullifying the nomination of E. H. R. Green, son of Mrs. Hetty Green, of New York, as the gubernatorial nominee of the Republican party. Because of a split in the party, separate conventions were held, one faction being known as the reorganized Republican party and the other as the Regulars. Mr. Green was nominated by the reorganized faction.

Independent papers say that Senator Penrose's organization and his political future are in danger. Louis Emery, Jr., the fusion candidate for Governor of Pennsylvania, has begun a speaking tour of the State. For forty days and forty nights he will assail the Penrose machine. He is said to be a born fighter and to be imbued with the idea that he will win. Mayor Weaver of Philadelphia will join the Emery campaign and will also speak from the stump.

The New York Evening Post remarks that the "points played up" in the account of the Bryan meeting printed in Mr. Hearst's American, were the arrival of Mr. Hearst, his reception, his enthusiastic greeting, his receiving of guests in his box, his neighbors in the boxes, his departure, his difficulty in gaining his cab, and his visit to Mr. Bryan at the hotel of the latter. And the Post concludes: "Among those present, besides Mr. Hearst, was one William J. Bryan of Nebraska."

One day last week President Roosevelt had seven guests at luncheon. They included Francis E. Leupp, Commissioner of Indian Affairs; Lyman Abbott, editor of Outlook; Silas McBee, editor of the Churchman; Count Gleichen, British military attache; Leigh Hunt, Brander Matthews, and Representative Herbert Parsons, chairman of the New York County Republican Committee. Before taking his carriage for Sagamore Hill, Mr. Parsons predicted the end of the Odell rule in New York on September 25, the date of the Republican State convention.

PETHERICK'S PERIL.

A Story of Adventure.

[In a short story competition the author of "Petherick's Peril" received a prize of five hundred dollars for the story of adventure which is here printed. It is the first purely literary work of its author, Mr. E. W. Thomson, who, by the way, has had quite a checkered career. In 1864, at fifteen, in search of adventure, he joined a cavalry regiment at Philadelphia, and served before Petersburg until the end of the war. In 1866 he was with the Queen's Own against the Fenians in Canada. For several years he was surveyor and civil engineer, camping constantly in the backwoods. He then joined the staff of the Toronto Globe, where he remained four years. This story was done in a single night.

It was printed in the Argonaut some years ago, and is not forgotten, for every now and then we receive a request to reprint it. The copyright is now vested in the American Baptist Publication Society, by whose permission it is republished here.]

Each story of the Shelton Cotton Factory is fifteen feet between floors; there are seven such over the basement, and this rises six feet above the ground. The brick walls narrow to eight inches as they ascend, and form a parapet rising above the roof. One of the time-keepers of the factory, Jack Hardy, a young man about my own age, often runs along the brick wall, the practice giving him a singular delight that seemed to increase with his proficiency in it. Having been a clerk in the works from the beginning, I have frequently used the parapet for a foot path and although there was a sheer fall of one hundred feet to the ground, have done it with ease and without dizziness. Occasionally Hardy and I have run races, on the opposite walls, an exercise in which I was invariably beaten, because I became timid with increase of pace.

Hopelessly distanced last Wednesday, while the men were off at noon, I gave up midway, and looking down, observed the upturned face of an old man, gazing at me with parted lips, wide eyes, and an expression of horror so startling that I involuntarily stepped down to the brick-layer's platform inside. I then saw that the apparently frightened spectator was Mr. Petherick, who has been for some weeks paymaster and factotum for the contractors.

"What's the matter, Petherick?" I called down. He made no answer, but walking off rapidly, disappeared round the mill. Curious about his demeanor, and after some little seeking, found him smoking alone.

"You quite frightened me just now, Petherick," said I. "Did you think I was a ghost?"

"Not just that," he replied, sententiously.

"Did you expect me to fall, then?" I inquired.

"Not just that either," said he. The old man was clearly disinclined to talk, and apparently much agitated. I began to joke him about his lugubrious expression, when the one o'clock bell rang, and he shuffled off hastily to another quarter.

Though I puzzled awhile over the incident, it soon passed so entirely from my mind that I was surprised when, passing Petherick in the afternoon, intending to go aloft, he said as I went by:

"Don't do it again, Mr. Fraser!"

"What?" I stopped.

"That!" he retorted.

"Oh! You mean running on the wall," said I.

"I mean going on it at all!" he exclaimed. His earnestness was so marked that I conceived a strong interest in its cause.

"I'll make a bargain with you, Mr. Petherick. If you'll tell me why you advise me I'll give the thing up!"

"Done!" said he. "Come to my cottage this evening, and I'll tell you a strange adventure of my own, though perhaps you'll only laugh that it's the reason why it sickens me to see you fooling up there."

Petherick was ready to talk when Jack and I sat down on his doorstep that evening, and immediately launched into the following narrative:

"I was born and grew to manhood near the high cliffs on the coast of Cornwall. Millions of sea-fowl make their nests along the face of those wave-worn precipices. My companions and I used to get much excitement, and sometimes a good deal of pocket money, by taking their eggs. One of us, placing his feet in a loop at the end of a rope and taking a good grip with his hands, would be lowered by the others to the nest.

"When he had his basket full, they'd haul him up, and another would go down. Well, one afternoon, I thus went dangling off. They paid out about a hundred feet of rope before I touched the ledge and let go."

"What ledge?" asked Jack.

"Oh," said Petherick, after a pause. "I see it will be troublesome to make you understand the situation." Then, after reflecting for some moments:

"You must know that most of the cliffs along that coast overhang the sea. At many points one could drop six hundred feet into the sea, and then be forty or fifty feet from the base of the rock he left. The coast is scooped under by the waves. But in some places the cliff wall is as though it had been eaten away by seas once running on higher levels. There will be an overhanging coping; then, some hundred feet down, a ledge sticking out farther than that of the top; under that ledge all will be scooped away. In places there are three or four such ledges, each projecting further than those above. These ledges used to fall away occasionally, as they do yet, I am told, for the ocean is gradually devouring that coast. Where they did not project farther than the upper coping, one lad would swing like a pendulum on the rope, and get on the rock, if not too far in, then put a rock on the loop to hold it till his return. When a ledge did project so that one could drop on it, he hauled down some slack, and left the rope hanging."

"Did the wind ever blow it off?" asked Jack.

"Seldom, and never out of reach," said the old man. "Well, the ledge I reached was like this" (illustrating with his hands): "It was some ten feet wide; it stuck out maybe some six feet farther than the cliff top; the rock wall went up pretty near perpendicular, till near the coping at the ground, but below the ledge the cliff's face was so scooped away that the sea, five hundred feet below, run in under it nigh fifty feet.

"As I went down, thousands of birds rose from the jagged places of the precipice, circling around me with harsh screams. Soon, touching the ledge, I stepped from the loop, and, drawing down a little slack, walked off briskly. For fully a quarter of a mile the ledge ran along the cliff's face almost as level and even in width as that sidewalk. I remember fancying that it sloped outward more than usual, but instantly dismissed the notion, though Gaffer Pentreath, the oldest man in that country side, used to tell us that we would not get the use of that ledge always. It had been as steady in our time as in his grandfather's, and we only laughed at his prophecies. Yet the place of an old filled fissure was marked by a line of grass, by tufts of weeds and small bushes, stretching along as far as the ledge itself, and within a foot or so of the cliff's face.

"Eggs were not so many as usual, and I went a long piece from my rope before turning back. Then I noticed the very strange conduct of the hosts of sea-fowls below. Usually there were hundreds, but now there were thousands on the wing, and instead of darting forth in playful motions, they seemed to be wildly excited, screaming shrilly, rushing out in terror, and returning in masses as though to alight, only to wheel in dread, and keep the air in vast clouds.

"The weather was beautiful, the sea like glass. At no great distance two large brigs, and nearer a small yacht lay becalmed, heaving on the long billows. I could look down her cabin stairway almost, and it seemed scarcely more than a long leap to her deck.

"Puzzled by the singular conduct of the sea-birds, I soon stopped, and set my back against the cliff to rest while watching them. The day was deadly still and very warm.

"I remember taking off my cap and wiping the sweat from my face and forehead with my sleeve. While doing this, I looked down involuntarily at the fissure at my feet. Instantly my blood almost froze with horror! There was a distinct crack between the inner edge of the fissure and the hard-packed, root-threaded soil with which it was filled. Forcibly I pressed back, and in a flash looked along the ledge. The fissure was widening before my eyes, the rock before me seemed sinking outward, and with a shudder, and a groan, and a roar, the whole long platform fell crashing into the sea below! I stood on a margin of rock scarce a foot wide, at my back a perpendicular cliff, and five hundred feet below the ocean, now almost hidden by the vast concourse of wheeling and affrighted birds.

"Can you believe that my first sensation was one of relief? I stood safe! Even a feeling of interest held me for some moments. Almost coolly I observed a long and mighty wave roll out from beneath. It went forth a high, curling crest—a solid wall of water. It struck the yacht stern on, plunged down on her deck, smashed through her swell of sail, and swept her out of sight forever.

"Not till then did my thought dwell entirely on my own position; not till then did I comprehend its hopelessness! Now my eyes closed convulsively; to shut out the abyss down which my glance had fallen; shuddering, I pressed hard against the solid wall at my back; an appalling cold slowly crept through me! My reason struggled against a wild desire to leap; all the demons of despair whispered to me to make an instant end. In imagination I had leaped! I felt the swooning helplessness of falling, and the cold, upward rush of air.

"Still I pressed hard back against the wall of rock, and, though nearly faint from terror, never forgot for an instant the death at my feet, nor the utter danger of the slightest motion. How long this weakness lasted I know not; I only know that the unspeakable horror of that first period has come to me in waking dreams many and many a day since; that I have long nights of that deadly fear; that to think of the past is to stand again on that narrow foothold, and to look around on the earth is often to cry out with joy that it widens away from my feet."

The old man paused long. Glancing sideways at Jack, I saw that his face was pallid. I myself had shuddered and grown cold—so strongly had my imagination realized the awful experience that Petherick described.

"Suddenly," said the old man, "these words flashed to my brain: 'Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? And one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father. Fear not, therefore; ye are of more value than many sparrows.' My faculties so strained I seemed to hear the words. Indeed, often yet I think that I truly hear a voice utter them very near me.

"Instantly hope arose, consciously desperate indeed, but I became calm, resourceful, capable, and free unaccountably aided. Careful not to look down, I opened my eyes and gazed far away over the bright sea. The rippled billows told that a light outward breeze had sprung up. Slowly and somewhat more distant, two brigs moved toward the horizon. Turning my head, I could trace the narrow stone of my footing to where my rope dangled, perhaps three hundred yards distant.

"It seemed to hang within easy reach of the cliff face, and instantly I resolved and as instantly proceeded to work toward it. No time remained for hesitation. Night was coming on. I reasoned that my comrades thought me killed. They had probably gone to view new condition of the precipice from a lower station, on their return would haul up and carry off the rope, made a move toward it. Try to think of that journey.

I nodded to him silently.

"Shuffling sideways very carefully, I had not more than five yards before I knew that I could not continue to look out over that abyss without glancing down, and I could not glance down without losing my senses. I have the brick line to keep eyes on as you walk along factory wall: do you think you could move along it without looking down as you would have to? Yet it is only a hundred feet high. Imagine five more such walls on top of that, and you trying to move sideways—incapable of closing your eyes, forced to look down, from end to end, yes, three times farther! Imagine you've got to go or jump off! Would you not, in an ecstasy of nervous agitation, get down face-first at full length, clutching your hands, and with shut eyes feel your way? I forced to lie down and bawl, but of course that was impossible."

"Still there was a wall at your back," observed Jack.

"That made it worse. The cliff seemed to press inward against me. It did, in fact, incline very slightly outward. It seemed to be thrusting me off. Oh, the horror of that sensation. Your toes on the edge of a precipice, and the implacable, calm mountain apparently weighing you slowly forward."

Beads of sweat broke out over his white face at the horror he had called before him. Wiping his lips restlessly with the back of his hand, and looking askance at the narrow pathway, he paused long. I saw its edge and the dark gleams of its abysmal water.

"I knew," he resumed, "that with my back to the wall I could never reach the rope. I could not step toward it and step forward, so narrow was the ledge. Motion was perhaps barely possible that way, but the breadth of my shoulders would have forced me to move somewhat more outward, and this I dared not and could not do. Also, to see a solid surface before me became an irresistible desire. I resolved to try to turn around before resuming the desperate journey. To do this I had to nerve myself for one steady look at my footing."

"In the depth below the myriad sea-fowl then rising on the black water, which, though swelling more and more the rising wind, had yet an unbroken surface at the little distance from the precipice, while further out it began to jump to white-caps, and in beneath me, where I could not see it, it dashed and churned with a far-pervading roar that I could barely distinguish. Before the descending sun a heavy bank of cloud had appeared. The ocean's surface bore that appearance of intense angry gloom that often heralds a storm, but, save the deep murmur going out from below my perch, all my hearing was deadly still.

"Cautiously I swung my right foot before the ledge and carefully edged around. For an instant, as my shoulder rubbed against the rock, I felt that I must fall. I did stagger in fact, but the next moment stood on the face to the beetling cliff, my heels on the very edge, and the new sensation of the abyss behind me no less horrible than that from which I had with such difficulty escaped. I stood quaking. A delirious horror thrilled every nerve. The skin about my ears and neck, suddenly cold, shrank convulsively.

"Wild with fear, I thrust forward my head against the rock and rested in agony. A whirl and wind of sudden wings made me conscious of outward things again. Then a mad eagerness to climb swept away other feelings, and my hands attempted in vain to clutch the cliff. Not daring to cast my head backward, I drew it to the side, like between my raised shoulders and chin against the precipice, and gazed upward with straining of vision on under my eyebrows.

Far above the dead wall stretched. Sideways glances gave me glimpses of the projecting summit coping. There was no fear in that direction. But the distraction of scanning the cliff side had given my strained nerves lief: to my memory again returned the promise of the Almighty and the consciousness of His regard. Once more my muscles became firm-strung.

"A cautious step sidewise made me know how much I had gained in ease and security of motion by the change front. I made progress that seemed almost rapid for me rods, and even had exultation in my quick approach of the rope. Hence came freedom to think how I should get on reaching it and speculation as to how soon my comrades would haul me up.

"Then the idea rushed through me that they might even yet draw it away too soon; that while in my clutch might rise from my hands. Instantly all the terrors of my position returned with tenfold force; an outward rust of the precipice seemed to grow distinct, my trembling hands told me that it moved bodily toward me, the scent behind me took an unspeakable remoteness, and from the utmost depth of that sheer air seemed to descend suddenly a deadly and a chilling wind. But I think I did not stop for an instant. Instead a delirium to move faster possessed me, and with quick, sidelong steps—my flowing foot striking hard against that before—someones on the point of stumbling, stretched out like the sacrificed, I pressed with mortal terror along.

"Every possible accident and delay was presented to my excited brain. What if the ledge should narrow suddenly to nothing? Now I believed that my heels were supported in air, and I moved along on tip-toe. Now I was convinced that the narrow pathway sloped outward, that this slope had become so distinct, so increasingly distinct, that I might at any moment slip off into the void. But dominating every consideration of possible disaster was still that of the need for speed, and distinct amid all other terrors was that sensation of the dead wall pressing silently and inexorably pressing me outward.

"My mouth and throat were choked with dryness, my convulsive lips parched and arid; much I longed to press them against the cold, moist stone. But I never stopped. Faster, faster—more wildly I stepped—in a delirium I rushed along. Then suddenly before my staring eyes was a well-remembered edge of mossy stone, and I knew that the rope should be directly behind me. Was it?

"I glanced over my left shoulder. The rope was not to be seen! Wildly I looked over the other. No rope! mighty God!

"But what! Yes, it moves!—it sways in sight—it appears—to return again to view! There was the rope directly at my back swinging in the now strong breeze, with a motion that had carried it away from the hurried glances. With the relief tears pressed to my eyes, and—face bowed to the precipice, almost thankful for a little time of the hungry air beneath—I uttered deep thanks to my God for the delivery that seemed so near."

The old man's lips continued to move, but no sound came from them. We waited silent, while with closed eyes and bent head, he remained absorbed in the recollection of that strange minute of devoutness.

"I stood there," he said at last, "for what now seems a space of hours, perhaps half a minute in reality. Then the chances still to be run crowded upon me. To turn around had been an attempt almost desperate before, and certainly, most certainly, the ledge was no wider where I now stood. Was the rope within reach? I feared not. Could it sway toward me? I could hope for that.

"But could I grasp it should I be saved? Would it yield to my hand—coming slowly down as I pulled, trailing from a coil above, trailing over the ground at the top, running fast as its end approached the edge, falling suddenly at last? Or was it fastened to the accustomed stake? Was any comrade near who would summon aid at my signal? If not, and if I grasped it, and if it held, how long should I swing in the wind that now bore the freshness and tremors of an imminent gale?

"Now again fear took hold on me, and, as a desperate man, I prepared to turn my face once more to the vast expanse of water and nothing beyond that awful cliff. Closing my eyes, I writhed, with I know not what motions, easily around, till again my back pressed against the precipice. That was a restful sensation. And now I made the decision of my fate. I looked at the rope. Not for a moment could I fancy it within my reach! Its sayings were not, as I had expected, even slightly varied; but when falling back against the wind, it fell outward, as though the air was eddying from the wall.

"Now I gazed down steadily. Would a leap be certain death? The water was of immense depth below. What chance of striking it feet or head first? What chance of preserving consciousness in the descent? No, the leap would be death; that at least was clear.

"Again I turned to the rope. I was now perfectly operate, but steady, nerved beyond the best moments of my life, good for an effort surpassing the human. Still the rope swayed as before, and its motion was very peculiar. I saw that I could touch it at any point of its vibrations by a strong leap.

"But could I grasp it? What use if it were not firmly secured above? But all this time for hesitation had gone by. I knew too well that strength was mine but for a moment, and that in the next reaction of it I should drop from the wall like a dead fly. Bracing myself, I watched the rope steadily for one round, and as it returned against the wind, jumped straight out over the heaving Atlantic.

"By God's aid I reached, touched, clutched, held the strong line. And it held! Not absolutely. Once, twice, and again it gave—gave with jerks that tried my arms. I knew these indicated but tightening. Then it held firm and I swung turning in the air, secure above the waves that beat below.

"To slide down and place my feet in the loop was the instinctive work of a moment. Fortunately it was of dimensions to admit my body barely. I slipped it over my thighs up to my armpits just as the dreaded reaction of weakness came. Then I lost consciousness.

"When I awakened my dear mother's face was beside my pillow and she told me that I had been tossing for a fortnight in brain fever. Many weeks I lay there, and when I got strong I found that I had left my nerve on that awful cliff side. Never since have I been able to look from a height or see any other human being on one, without shuddering.

"So now you know the story, Mr. Frazer, and have had your last walk on the factory wall."

He spoke truer than he knew. His story has given me such horrible nightmares ever since that I could no more walk on the high brickwork than along that narrow ledge in distant Cornwall.

COMSTOCKONITIS.

Venus de Milo she stood on her rockery.
"Goodness!" she said, "I feel rather Comstockery!
Here without underwear, corsets, or sockery!

Goodness me, what would St. Anthony say?
Art can't go walking in clothes that are rational;
Sculpture cut decollete, as a fashion 'll
Make Mr. Comstock become Carrie National—
No lady's safe in museums to-day."

Then spake Apollo in marble pallidity,
Stretching his limbs to a classic rigidity.
"Venus, my dear, in the name of stupidity,
Where are my trousers?—that tailor is late!

How can I stand in my godlike placidity?
Tempting the young in these days of humidity—
Gee! I'm ashamed of my shameless solidity—(Isn't that Anthony out by the gate?)"

So spoke the Classics, a stony procession of Arms, legs and figures whom Fear had possession of—
What if the Syndicate for the Suppression of Vice should attack them with chisels and hammers?
They were poor pagans, and death seemed so hideous!
All of the Classics from Borglum to Phidias
Murmured "Our hearts are as pure as St. Lydia's—Pardon our nighties—we've ordered pajamas!"
—Wallace Irwin in New York Globe.

The European press is repeating a curious little story—which may or may not have a basis of fact—concerning the recent visit which the ex-Empress Eugenie paid to the Emperor of Austria at Ischl. It had nothing to do, so the tale goes, with either politics or matrimony. In reality the ex-Empress wished to return to Franz Josef a letter written by him in the latter sixties to the Emperor Louis Napoleon. The Emperor of Austria was then full of anger against the Germans, because of Sadowa, and in this letter he is said to have promised the full help of the Austrian army for France if Prussia attacked or provoked her. Napoleon III, knowing that the Emperor was a constitutional, not an absolute, monarch, never regarded the letter as anything more than a generous expression of sympathy, but as such he prized it highly. Many a time, it is said, he showed the letter to intimate friends at Chislehurst, and asked, What would have happened if the Austrian Emperor had been an absolute monarch? At his death the letter could not be found. According to the gossip, the Empress Eugenie had it, and at Ischl returned it to its writer. The impotent pledge, if it ever existed, must have stirred some bitter memories in the minds of both the giver and the recipient.

Tolstoi said recently to Henry Nevinston, the English writer on Russia: "You are young and I am old, but as you grow older you will find, as I have found, that day follows day, and there does not seem much change in you, till suddenly you hear people speaking of you as an old man. It is the same with an age in history; day follows day, and there does not seem to be much change, till suddenly it is found that the age is become old. It is finished; it is out of date. The present movement in Russia is not a riot, it is not even a revolution; it is the end of an age."

Miss Elizabeth Bolt started a factory at Wakefield, Mass., on a small scale a few years ago and now employs more than four hundred men and women, who turn out about 600 dozen pairs of stockings daily. Miss Bolt understands her work thoroughly, having been a mill girl herself.

It takes 3,000 silkworms to spin enough silk for one lady's dress.

FRENCH NAME FOR BAD LUCK.

The Pretty Parisiennes will not Pronounce It, but Say "Cherries."

As saucy as they are beautiful, it is said that the fair ones of Paris whose favorite promenade is the famous Allee des Acacias, fear but one thing on earth. This is "the guigne." If you ask what it means, you will be told it means "bad luck"; but it is more, explains the Paris correspondent of the Portland Oregonian. In one sense it means the hoodoo. In another, you may call it the "aura" of bad luck, or the "microbe" of bad luck—and it is catching. In still another sense it is viewed as an intelligent entity, that can be offended and placated.

The lovely Dorgere, of The Varieties, was recently given a mandolin that had belonged originally to Josephine, the unhappy wife of the Great Napoleon, and subsequently to the ex-Empress Eugenie. As she touched it reverently, she brought from it a sad, little air.

"What is it?" asked the happy giver. "I don't know," she answered. "Oh, you were improvising?" he said. "No, it must be a reminiscence," she said. It was sad and pretty. She found herself humming it.

But the Guigne set in at once! Her bull-pup sickened; her sable stole was stolen; she quarreled with two good friends; her auto broke down daily, and she got a pimple on her nose. Finally, when an incapacitating sore throat declared itself, she sought the advice of specialists.

"Get rid of the mandolin," advised Wiehe. And two days after she had presented it to the Josephine Museum at Malmaison, the sore throat left her, the pimple disappeared, the pup recovered, the stole was found, her friends became reconciled, the auto began running perfectly—and M. Samuel gave her a fine new role!

There are specialists of the Guigne. The lovely sibyl-faced Robinne is one, so is Pena Conchita, so is Chavita—both these latter are of Andalusian gypsy blood.

There are certain things that Pena Conchita can not be persuaded to do. She would rather break an engagement than dance on a Friday, but that is nothing. She will not set foot on the stage if a red-headed man be there. "Judas was red-haired," she explains.

All this is, nevertheless, but the outer edge of the great mystery of the Guigne—pardon, the Cerises. It is the one word of the French language that must never be pronounced. The essence of the Cerises lies in this fact: Originally it was merely a Parisian theatrical superstition, applying particularly to the first representation of pieces. To pronounce the word was found to be particularly fatal. Bizet laughed at the superstition during the rehearsals of "Carmen," and, at the end of the second act, during its last rehearsal, he walked to the center of the stage and laughingly exclaimed: "Zut for the Guigne?" Every one knows the otherwise unaccountable frost the great opera received during its early representations—and how Bizet committed suicide, imagining it to be a failure.

The French have several names for cherries. What we call ox-hearts they call "bigarre"; what we call pie-cherries they call "cerises"—and "cerises" is the general loose name for the fruit; while a big, black, juicy variety is named "guigne," spelled and pronounced the same as the word for persistent bad luck. Therefore, instead of saying "guigne," they always say "cerises."

Harduin, the Table Talk man of a great Paris daily, wrote a witty editorial railing at these omens. The celebrated Liane de Pougy answered him with an experience in point. "It is certain," wrote Liane, "that the boast of good luck will tend to make good luck cease; and if one fears a bad thing may happen, nothing is so sure to bring it about as to talk of it. Dorgere related her experiences of the mandolin. 'I have had convincing proofs that there are lucky and unlucky inanimate objects,' she wrote. 'If the object brings you bad luck, get rid of it at once! If a person brings you bad luck avoid that person!'"

The dashing Madeleine Thierry told how, after several years, she rediscovered a girl friend in great distress. She took her in and treated her like a sister. As a result the bad luck attached itself to Madeleine!

"I had a run of—cherries—that lasted me three months," she affirms, "and I got rid of it only when my girl friend suddenly married a wealthy man and went off with him. He has since lost half his money, and if I should ever see her coming down the street again I'd turn and run the other way."

Three of these noted beauties—de Villiers, Robinne and de Mernand—confessed to the belief in unlucky persons to the extent of keeping tab on every new acquaintance. "I keep a little notebook," wrote Robinne, "and I see no harm in jotting down the date I make any new acquaintance. In parallel columns I note the good and bad things happening to me—with the dates. When I find the dates getting to correspond—why, I find it prudent to act in consequence."

PANAMA PICTURES IN RHYME.

Work of the Late James Stanley Gilbert,
American Poet of the Isthmus.

[Editor Argonaut: I take the liberty of handing you the inclosed clipping with the request that you let the many friends of Mr. Gilbert on the Pacific Coast learn of his untimely death through the columns of your valued paper.

At the same time I am presuming, as a close friend of the author, to send you personally a copy of the latest edition of "Panama Patchwork," in the hope that in its perusal you may learn to know and love our Gilbert as we knew and loved him. Faithfully yours,

Herman B. Mohr.
Cristobal, Isthmian Canal Zone.
August 20, 1906.]

For more than twenty years Mr. Gilbert was a resident of what is now the Canal Zone. He was a native of Middletown, Conn., and thirty years of age when he accepted a position with the Panama Railroad. As commissary for the company he continued in its service until five years ago, when he took a partnership in a business house of Colou. During his life on the Isthmus Mr. Gilbert made friends of the many who came to know his gifts, and to respect his integrity. He died August 15, 1906.

One of Mr. Gilbert's diversions was to set down in familiar rhymes the chief events and moving influences of his home surroundings. His observation was keen, and his reflections were always kindly, even when humorously cynical. His verses are unusual in locale, color, and treatment. From his volume, "Panama Patchwork," a more informing view of the country and its picturesque phases of life may be drawn than from many more formal descriptive works.

The poet had few illusions concerning his surroundings, and in "The Isthmian Way" he shows his contempt for tendencies that are not all native:

To how and scrape and shake your hand,
To greet you with a smile so bland,
That you will think no other friend
Can toward you half the good intend;
But still to cherish in one's heart,
Enough rank hate to fill a cart—
This is the Isthmian way.

To huy for gold and silver pay,
To answer yea while thinking nay,
To horrow some one's little wealth,
And leave the country for one's health;
To plot and scheme and slyly seek
To make some decent man a sneak—
This is the Isthmian way.

To kiss the man who wins success,
And kick the man whose luck is less;
To make of vice heatitude,
And virtue of ingratitude!
Accept all favors, but omit
To e'er return the benefit—
This is the Isthmian way.

To curry favor with the great,
And pander to one's meanest trait;
To smash the Decalogue to bits,
But give your neighbor's weakness fits!
Oppress the weak, uphold the strong—
In short, do everything that's wrong—
This is the Isthmian way.

To wage a miasmatic strife,
And suffer all the ills of life;
To eat and drink one's self to death,
And curse God with one's latest breath;
And then a "heavenly mansion" fill
Prepared for one on Monkey Hill—
This is the Isthmian way.

God grant that haply some of us
Escape the general animus,
And travel, though but falteringly,
The nobler path of eharity;
Tho' stumbling often, still to find
More cleanly records left behind
Than by the Isthmian way.

Here is a glimpse of one of the native beauties, described as "A Frijoles Washer-Girl":

A dream in living bronze she,
A dusky goddess full revealed;

Clad hut in Nature's modesty—
Her wondrous beauty unconcealed.

Half to her knee the rushing stream
An instant pauses on its way;
The ripples in the sunshine gleam,
And tiny rainbows round her play.

Lithe as the bamboo growing near
Within the tangled, tropic glade;
As graceful as the startled deer
Half hidden in the distant shade.

The limbs, the hips, the swelling bust
Of famed Olympus, fairest queen;
Ne'er modelled yet on lines more just
Was ever sculptured marble seen!

Her curl-fringed eyes, now black, now brown,
Are depths of passion unexplored;
Her teeth, a glistening, pearly crown
A rajah would delight to hoard.

A dream, a dream in bronze she,
A dusky goddess full revealed!
Clad hut in Nature's modesty—
Her wondrous beauty unconcealed!

When a new-comer begins life in Panama his first inquiries and his first instructions are concerning the healthful aspects of his surroundings, and the reverse. In "Yellow Eyes" the poet tells of the experiences soon to be undergone:

You are going to have the fever,
Yellow eyes!
In about ten days from now
Iron hands will clamp your brow;
Your tongue resemble curdled cream,
A rusty streak the centre seam;
Your mouth will taste of untold things,
With claws and horns and fins and wings;
Your head will weigh a ton or more,
And forty gales within it roar!

In about ten days from now
You will feebly wonder how
All your bones can break in twain
And so quickly knit again!
You will feel a score of Jaels
In your temples driving nails!
You will wonder if you're shot
Through the liver-case or what!
You will wonder if such heat
Is 'nt Hades—and repeat!
Then you'll sweat until, at length,
You—won't—have—a—kitten's—strength!

In about ten days from now
Make to health a parting bow;
For you're going to have the fever,
Yellow eyes!

In spite of all the curses that rest on Isthmian soil, the country has a fascination for many who know of fairer lands. The feelings of those who can not or will not resist the tropical languor are described in "The Paradise of Fools":

Nineteen hundred miles from home
We have crossed the ocean's foam;
Left our kin and comrades dear,
Shed the customary tear;
Left whatever life is worth
For the rumpest place on earth—
For the Paradise of Fools.

All good things to eat and drink,
Left for what? You'd never think!
Tough old bull-heef, mud-fed swine,
Store-made liquors, logwood wine!
Every blessed day the same;
Change is nothing but a name
In the Paradise of Fools.

Recreation? There is none;
If there were, 'twould weary one!
Innocence and sportiveness?
Bitter foes and nothing less!
Cards and cocktails? Yes, galore!
Only these, and nothing more
In the Paradise of Fools.

Hold! There's one thing I forget;
Scandal peddling's left us yet!
God knows, there's enough of that
To make a shrunken mummy fat!
Be the subject low or high,
We must gossip—or we die
In the Paradise of Fools.

Yet we're happy, lithe, and gay;
Else we'd go away and stay!

How we kick and squirm and shout
O'er attempts to drive us out!
We are all content to dwell
In this suburb of—ah well!
In the Paradise of Fools.

The picture presented in "La Canti-nera—A Memory of June, 1902," is a sunburned photograph of army life, hideous but real:

As she scrambled down from the transport's deck,
Her figure parodied grace;
Eighteen at the most and a physical wreck,
Yet she had an angel's face!

From head to foot
Clung dirt like soot—
There was dirt on her angel's face,
—Yes, dirt on her angel's face!

Her hair in inky loops hung low,
O'er a soldier's canvas coat,
And a tattered shift yawned wide to show
A short and sunburned throat!

No lingerie—
We all could see
Her short and sunburned throat!
—Yes, more than her sunburned throat!

Her dress—her what? She had no dress;
Call it skirt for lack of a name—
('Tis a guess, the wildest kind of a guess)

Put shamelessness to shame!
So scanty and torn,
And carelessly worn,
It put shamelessness to shame!
—Yes, shamelessness to shame!

She gathered her kit and passed us by,
Foul bedding and pots and hags;
A babe on her hip—another one nigh—
Nakedness, filth and rags!
On the endless tramp
From camp to camp,
In nakedness, filth and rags!
—Yes, nakedness, filth and rags!

A drab and a drudge—a regiment's Thing
To abuse, dehauch, dehase;
And yet—as tho' guarded by Beauty's wing—
Her face was an angel's face!
Tho' sadly hedimmed,
'Twas Beauty who limned
The lines of her angel's face!
—Yes, modelled her angel's face!

What of it, you ask? Oh, nothing but this:
I think it not often the case
That one clearly beholds in ignorance, bliss,
And 'tis proved by an angel's face!
For ignorance
Of innocence,
Shone from her angel's face!
—Yes, gave her an angel's face!

Another singer, not in "poverty" as Tom Hood's suffering seamstress sang, is pictured in these stanzas. They are the "Song of the Prickly Heat," an affliction not indigenous there, but probably as intense as anywhere on earth:

With face drawn into a scowl,
With teeth well into his tongue,
Perspiring, like any old leaky pump,
Squirmed a man no longer young.
Scratch, scratch, scratch,
From forehead down to feet!
And still though his voice with anger rang,
'Mid grunts and curses he hoarsely sang
This song of the prickly heat!

Itch, itch, itch,
Till night drives the day away!
Itch, itch, itch,
Till day drives the night away!
Arms and stomach and legs,
Neck and ankles and back,
Digging them all till they scorch and bleed,
From one to the other with lightning speed,
Like a demented jumping-jack!

Oh, 'tis off with your coat and vest!
'Tis off with your shoes and pants!
Till, naked and bare, your skin you tear

In a wild St. Vitus dance!
Scratch, scratch, scratch,
With ever waxing ire!
While into each pore a needle darts,
And the cuticle hurus and shrivels a smarts
Like hlisters of hell's own fire!

Itch, itch, itch,
While the months a-whirling go!
Itch, itch, itch,
As the years to decades grow!
Oh, God, for a moment's rest!
Or, if I can't be granted that,
In one spot quench the teasing flame,
Or blot that spot from my tortur frame—
The spot that I can't get at.

With face drawn into a scowl,
With teeth well into his tongue,
Perspiring, like any old leaky pump,
Squirmed a man no longer young.
Scratch, scratch, scratch,
From forehead down to feet!
And still tho' his voice with anger rang
(I wonder himself he doesn't hang)
'Mid grunts and curses he hoarsely sang
This song of the prickly heat!

In this poem, "On Roncador," noted the end of one of the famous ventures of the American navy:
No more the boatswain's pipe shall call
To quarters on her deck!
On Roncador, on Roncador
She lies—a lonely wreck!
No more shall bugler colors sound,
Nor tuneful taps shall play!
On Roncador, on Roncador,
In silence ends the day!

No more shall curious visitor
Be shown her famous gun!
On Roncador, on Roncador,
Her guerdon she hath won!
Haul down the flag left flying there—
No record let there be
Of how we lost on Roncador
Our veteran of the sea!

'Tis better thus to lay away
A memory of the past,
Whose strife hath ended in a peace
Forevermore to last!
Rest on, thou brave old Kearsarge, rest
The waves that round thee surge
Shall on the shore of Roncador
For ages chant thy dirge!

A spot of melancholy yet impelling interest is described in "On the Brow of the Hill," with its accompanying note:

[The cemetery of Monkey Hill, Mount Hope—by which latter name is more euphoniously though less widely known—is situated about two miles the southward of Colon, and overlooks a wide expanse of diversified tropic country. At its base lies the extensive plant of the Panama Canal Company, and, beyond, the straggling little city and broad Caribbean Sea. The spot was first used as a burial-place about the year 1853, shortly after the beginning of the work on the Panama Railroad.

Although of such recent origin, the is probably no more populous Necropolis in the New World; and while many of the tales that are told of it are considerably exaggerated, they all, unfortunately, have a foundation in fact. Should Macanlay's Traveler in his lonely wanderings visit this tragic mount, visions, perhaps not so extensive but certainly as melancholy as those which could appear to him on the ruins of London Bridge, would materially assist in his speculations upon the littleness of man and the barrenness of life.

You rotting cross that marks the place
Of ended quest in stranger land
The canceling months will soon efface,
Nor leave a vestige of it stand.

Yet hear the tale those ruins tell,
Ere he who knows the story falls;
And tarrying on this hill of hell,
Oheys the last, most dread of calls.

These are verses that the poet has inscribed for his epitaph:

When I am dead no graven stone
Thou need'st erect to make it known
That one lies there of whom 'twas said faults were not of heart, but head,

And such as all men should condone.
My sins are mine and mine alone!
I, no man's thoughts be once misled,
O tastes for eulogy be fed
When I am dead!

Pity, tell the truth: that may atone
For a life of folly like my own,
By warning others not to tread
The path o'er which my feet have bled.
I have no "mantles" round me thrown
When I am dead!

The selections are from the third edition of "Panama Patchwork," a careful and well-bound volume of nearly 200 pages. The book is dedicated to President Roosevelt "in honor of his sole determination that the great Panama Canal shall be built for the glory of America and for the benefit of all nations." The frontispiece is an engraving of the famous bronze, "Columbus and Indian Girl," presented by Empress Eugenie to Colombia and transferred to M. de Lesseps, and now set at the Atlantic entrance to the Panama Canal.

The will of Herman Oelrichs was filed in New York September 10. His estate was given to his brother and sister. His will receives only some pieces of jewelry, and other personal effects. The will contains the following: "As my wife has an ample fortune of her own I make no request to her. As my son, Herman Oelrichs, Jr., is the heir and next of kin of my wife, and will doubtless be amply provided for by his mother in her last will and testament, or by the law in the event of her intestacy, I make no bequest or devise to him other than the piffling bequest contained in this will."

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Rt. Rev. William H. Hare of Sioux Falls, Episcopal bishop of South Dakota, has sent out notices printed in the Sioux language, informing the Sioux members of the church, several thousand in number, that the annual convocation will be held this month at Santee Indian agency.

Signor Caruso, the Italian tenor, is reported to have won $10,000 in six nights' play at Ostend, and then to have lost it all in one sitting. In spite of the anti-gambling law passed three years ago betting is rampant there. Many well-known French, Russian and American plungers are present at the gaming tables.

President Roosevelt is emphatic in his refusals to have a life mask made. The President has no especial objection to being preserved otherwise; he sits for his photo at reasonable short intervals, and has given sittings which look to the preservation of his likeness in the dignity of oil. But he has a horror of being spattered over with clay and breathing through quills.

For the first time in the history of Mississippi as a State a woman is a full-fledged member of the Governor's staff, the appointment having been made by Governor Vardaman of Miss Henrietta Mitchell as aide-de-camp, with rank of colonel. The young lady has been a leader in society at the Mississippi capital for some time and is an accomplished horsewoman.

General Baden-Powell, the hero of Mafeking, is a sculptor of no mean ability. A bust of Captain John Smith, which he made and presented to the State of Virginia, has just arrived in Richmond, where it will be placed permanently in the State capitol. The bust comes to Virginia as an interesting and appropriate gift just at this time, when preparations are in progress for the Jamestown Tercentennial Exposition of 1907, which will commemorate the first permanent English settlement in America, brought about through the courage and abilities of John Smith as a colonizer. General Baden-Powell comes from the same stock, his family being the direct descendants of a brother of the captain.

Thomas Bent, the premier of Victoria, introduces songs in his speeches. A word or a phrase strikes a chord of memory, recalls some half-forgotten melody and then the premier breaks forth into song. Replying to criticism,
Mr. Bent says he never introduces songs of the present day, of which he has a very poor opinion.

Mrs. Carrie R. Sparklin, who was elected president of the National Woman's Relief Corps at its annual convention in Minneapolis, is a past department president of Missonri and an active member of Ransom Corps of St.
Louis. Mrs. Sparklin was prominently identified with the work of the World's Fair in St. Louis and was chairman of the committee that raised funds for the Fraternity building.

Baron Jularo Komura, one of the most remarkable of the young statesmen of Japan, is now Japanese Ambassador to Great Britain, and was recently received at his new post with honor. He had just relinquished the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, a position which he had filled with dignity and success since 1900. The Ambassador belongs to none of the four great feudal clans, but is of Sammrai caste, and thus, though he is essentially a self-made man, belongs to the aristocracy. Komura was one of the young men chosen to acquire a modern education at Harvard University. There he remained for five years, and was the first Japanese student to receive a degree from the university. After diplomatic service in China, he went as Minister first to Washington and then to St.
Petersburg. At the Portsmouth Conference none had more influence than Baron Komura. His countrymen had entire confidence in him, and probably their faith in his patriotism and astuteness led them to accept the bargain he made as quietly as they did.

VANITY FAIR.

Nearly a million dollars' worth of precious stones and jewelry will be put upon the market by the trustees of Leland Stanford Junior University.

The collection belonging to the late Mrs. Jane Stanford is world famous. The jewels were gifts from the late Senator Stanford to his wife, made at various times during their lives, and comprise some of the largest ropes of diamonds in existence. Some of the rubies in the collection are said to be the most valuable in the world. The emeralds and pearls have also been for many years the envy and admiration of lovers of precious stones in all parts of the United States.

In 1899 Mrs. Stanford deeded these jewels to the trustees of the University. Just prior to her fatal journey to Hawaii Mrs. Stanford executed a document providing that upon her death these jewels should be sold and the proceeds of the sale used to form a library fund. Her wishes in this respect are now about to be carried out.

English society continues to honor the charming American actress who has been prominent through the gay summer there.

At Lord Roseberry's hall—the great event which wound up the season—every one said that Maxine Elliot (Mrs. Nat Goodwin) was the handsomest woman in the room. The host himself took her straight to the Princess of Wales, to whom she was introduced for the first time, and although, as every one knows, that lady is far from keen on American women, she made quite a fuss over the actress and then and there invited her to come and have tea with her at Frogmore House, Windsor. Lord Roseberry danced twice with Mrs. Goodwin, and Lord Dalmeny and his brother, Neil Primrose, were also on her programme. If it was for the sake of effect she decided not to wear a single jewel, she certainly succeeded, the more so because on the occasion every woman in the room had on all her best jewels. Mrs. Goodwin's frock was a Doucet creation of rose pink tulle, simple in itself, yet stamped with the indelible cachet of its designer. Deep red roses rested in her corsage and there was a berthe of wonderful old lace. Wherever she moved people asked who she was.

Admiration for the smart costumes affected by Americans is not general in fashionable London unless the wearer is already an established favorite.

Consuelo, Duchess of Manchester, is remarkably consistent in the matter of her frocks. During the season just passed, she wore various tones of purple and mauve all day long as well as at night. Although she exhibits wondrous draperies, one thing is to be said for her, she never dresses too young for her age. Like all American women, she has a great penchant for the floating veil to which the British have never really taken. Her headgear invariably boasts it, and like all her garments, it too, is purple or mauve. The story goes that the King once said to her, "Duchess, what is the idea of these rags you tie round your hats?" She replied she always wore one because she wanted to make quite sure that no one would take her for any nationality except that of an American, and all American women wore "rags" on their hats when they came over here!

There are indications that even the students at theological seminaries are considered not proof against some temptations.

Word comes by way of Trenton, New Jersey, that the Princeton Lodge of the Women's Christian Temperance Union is about to become actively mindful of the morals of Princeton University, and to exert itself to wean the Princeton students, including those of the theological seminary, from drinking, smoking, and playing cards, says Harper's Weekly. There is another awful thing the members should pay some attention to. College boys spend hours and lifetimes of valuable time in looking at the girls. Is there a more distracting practice or one less favorable to study? It would be a great feat for the W. C. T. U. to reform the Princeton youth in this particular, putting blinders on them if necessary, but preferably by persuasion.

Are we in danger of spoiling our golf? asks William Inglis, an authority on the game, in a recent magazine article.

The question invariably arises when one considers the remarkable record made a few days ago by the professional player, Willie Anderson, on the Onweutsia links, one of the longest courses in the country. He did the eighteen holes in sixty-seven strokes in the morning and sixty-eight in the afternoon. It is no disparagement of Anderson's skill to say that the accomplishment of this wonderfully low score was made possible by the latest improvements in clubs and balls.

The average man plays golf for exercise and amusement. Naturally we all hate to do anything that is recommended because it will do us good. It can not be denied that the greatest amount of exercise in golf consists in the tee shots and the strokes through the green. In the earliest days of the game, what with rough courses, balls not too well balanced, and crude clubs, the number of strokes needed to play eighteen holes was far greater than the number today. Even so recently as in the early days of Horace Hutchinson, at Oxford, his tutor in logic inexorably defined golf as "putting little balls into little holes with instruments very ill adapted to the purpose."

How we have changed all that! From the moment, not so remote, that golf crossed the Atlantic, the fertile American mind has busied itself in devising schemes to enable the player to lessen the number of strokes. What folly!

The good player could drive the old hard gutta-percha ball 180 or perhaps 200 yards. Presto! An American makes a ball whose core is a mass of rubber hands tightly wound around one another, and the new ball is so much more springy than the old that the driver sends it commonly enough from 230 to 260 yards, and the giants of the game have several times driven more than 300 yards.

Today one manufacturer gives us a pneumatic ball, another uses inner wrappings of silk, still another includes a drop of mercury in the heart of the ball, so that it will run more truly on the putting-green.

And all to what purpose? Why, to lengthen the stroke and so cut down the number of strokes. But, some one asks, don't we play golf as a most pleasant exercise, and therefore wouldn't it be better to increase rather than diminish the number of strokes? No, no. We really play golf for the noble purpose of cutting down records.

Some directions that are more easily remembered than the usual examples are given from a recent volume, "The Cynic's Rules of Conduct."

"When in the street with a lady, a gentleman should not light a cigarette unless the lady does."

"When you step on a lady's toes, make some off-hand remark about her feet being too small to be seen. This is older than the cave-dwellers, but it still works."

"Don't forget to tell her that she's not like other girls. It always works, whether you spring it on the belle of the village, the girl with a hare lip, or the bearded lady at the circus."

"If you use the same solitaire for the second engagement, don't refer to it as killing two birds with one stone."

"At week end bridge parties no really nice girl will cheat on the Sabbath day."

"Don't marry for money, but never let money stand between a girl and her happiness."

"It is not good form to congratulate a girl friend upon her engagement. Simply remark: 'So you lauded him at last.'"

Another batch of the same rules is taken from the department given up to society events.

"When at a wedding breakfast try to remember that you will probably have other opportunities of drinking champagne."

"The chief duty of the best man is to prevent the groom from escaping before the ceremony."

"Remember, too, that perhaps you are not the sort of husband that father used to make."

"In taking soup try not to give others the impression that the plumbing is out of order."

"On returning from the altar be careful not to step on the bride's train. There's trouble enough ahead without that."

"At afternoon funerals wear a frock coat and top hat. Should the funeral be your own, the hat may be dispensed with."

"Those who live in glass houses should be polite to reporters."

"The father gives the bride away, but the small brother would like to."

They who make the glasses we sell are skilled workmen of the highest grade.

STAGE GOSSIP.

Mary Van Buren is appearing at Morco's Burbank Theatre, Los Angeles, in "Madame San Gene."

Robert Mantell will play six weeks in Dominion of Canada before going to New York. His season began September 3 at Sydney, Cape Breton. He will act Sylock for the first time in Montreal, where his Iago, also, will be made known.

The San Francisco earthquake has brought to light several plays claiming originality in mechanical effect. It may be of interest to note that, many moons ago, Bartley Campbell had a similar effect in "Clio," while a few years later Wilson Barrett used the same idea in "The Land of the Living." The "sensation" was, however, first introduced four centuries ago by the Italians (1480). They had intricate machinery for the simulation of such phenomena as thunderbolts and earthquakes. In 1692 the first attempt in England to mimic an earthquake was made at Southwark, London. Another proof of "nothing new under the sun."

William Pruette is a member of the supporting Richard Golden in "The Truants," which has scored a success at the Majestic Theatre in New York. Julia Sanderson and Vera Michel were engaged for the piece has been ended, and later press reports praise the work of the latter.

New York dramatic critic follows a piece of Richard Golden in "The Tourist" with a paragraph about Henry E. Jones in "The Man on the Box," and says that "while the front legs of the 'Tourist' in 'Evangeline' of years ago were entertaining a houseful of people at the Majestic Theatre the hind legs—were charming another houseful at the Lyric Theatre." The critic's authority is at fault. Golden played Le Bon, the notary, when Dixey was owner of the dancing heifer.

The success of "The Hypocrites" is due to make certain that in the future of Henry Arthur Jones's plays will be represented initially in New York.

After Conreid's heavy losses last season in San Francisco, which included disappearance of $80,000 in prospective profits, the manager declared he would never again make a road tour to the Metropolitan Opera Company. He has changed his mind, however, and is in the Northwest will, for the first time, hear grand opera as it is given at the Metropolitan. As far away as Seattle, Portland, and Spokane the stars will travel. Only the Italian wing of the company will go farther than St. Paul and Minneapolis, according to the present plan. As many Northwesterners as are able to put up sufficient guarantee will probably be visited; consequently Butte, Helena, Boise and Walla Walla may hear grand opera for the first time.

David Bispham is devoting his time to the selection of a cast for the production of La Lehmann's opera on the subject of "The Vicar of Wakefield." Another English woman-composer of operas, M. Ethel Smyth, has finished a new score (her third). It is entitled "Les Frangeurs," and will be heard in the autumn at Prague and Leipsic.

The stock company at the Belasco Theatre, Los Angeles, is to appear in "The School for Scandal," with Amelia Gurner as Lady Teazle, Hohart Bosworth as Charles Surface, William Yerkes as Sir Peter Teazle, Richard Van as Careless, Marie Howe as Mrs. Clor, Adele Farrington as Lady Sowerell, Margaret Langham as Maria, Marie Cahill has opened her season in a new musical play, "Marrying My," by Edwin Milton Royle, with music by Silvio Hein and lyrics by Benjamin Hapgood Burt. William Courtland, Eugene Cowles, Ray Atwell, Charles Dickson, H. Guy Woodward, Mark Smith, Annie Buckley and Virginia Stanton are members of the company.

William A. Brady has induced Maud Henson to return to the stage and join the company that is to support Grace George at the Manhattan Theatre, New York. She has made a long record of successes in important roles since she took the parts of the boy, Shakespeare Jarvis, in "The Lights of London," and of Rose Guerin, the danseuse, in "A Parisian Romance." Probably her greatest triumph was as Henriette in the famous Palmer revival of "The Two Orphans."

Lotta Crahtree, who gave $1,000 for a programme at the benefit for the San Francisco sufferers, is said to be the richest actress in the country, and her fortune has been estimated at sums varying from $800,000 to $1,000,000.

E. A. Fischer, who formerly conducted a vaudeville theatre in San Francisco, has established a playhouse in Los Angeles.

The American press agent seems to be neglecting his opportunities; at least, one of his British brethren is pointing the way for him. Miss Godwynne Earle, who is appearing at the London Coliseum, has been advised to make a halloo ascent every now and then to counteract the effect of hard work upon her nerves. So, with Mr. Spencer, the aeronaut, she has been taking the rest-cure and air-cure combined, floating over London in the car of his halloo. This innocent little advertising scheme has benefited the health of the actress and the receipts at the theatre box office.

Jerome K. Jerome's new play, "Sylvia of the Letters," a comedy written especially for Annie Russell, will be produced this season.

Grace George, Wright Lorimer, Robert B. Mantell and Wilton Lackey will appear in Ibsen plays this season. Boston will see Wright Lorimer first as Hjalmer Ekdal in "The Wild Duck."

In "The Illusion of Beatrice," in which Maude Fealy will star, the ingenious stage manager has introduced the novelty of an elevator as an entrance for the characters to a bachelor's apartment.

A young San Francisco playwright, Charles Kenyon, has been vindicated in his claim to the authorship of "The Flag Station," a one-act drama which Arnold Daly will include in his repertoire next season. Kenyon is the son of Dr. C. G. Kenyon of San Francisco and the brother of Albert Gilman Kenyon. He has been playing the piece in question under the title of "The Operator" in vaudeville.

The Orpheum.

R. G. Knowles, who is said to be the first American to make an Englishman laugh, will make his first vaudeville appearance in San Francisco this Sunday afternoon. McMahon's Minstrel Maids and "Watermelon Girls," nine in number, in an old-fashioned black face exhibition, indulge in songs and witticisms. Tim McMahon and Flora Chappelle will present their original conceit, "Twenty Minutes From Train Time," abounding in comedy. The Arihos, European novelty acrobats, will appear for the first time. Chinko, the juggler; Fiske and McDonough, the comedy duo; Minnie Kaufmann, the trick cyclist; the Italian trio of operatic vocalists, and Orpheum moving pictures will complete a varied program. Every kind of amusement is to be found on the grounds of the Chutes, where the Orpheum is located, and rare animals are to be gazed at in the Zoo.

The Masonic Temple site at the northwest corner of Montgomery and Post streets has been sold, and the transfer to the purchaser will be made within a few days. The price is $750,000, and the purchaser is Rudolph Spreckels for the First National Bank. A Class A building will be erected on the site, to be the home of the bank.

The formal opening of the new Hillside Clubhouse was held September 8 in the new quarters of the club at Berkeley. The building was designed by Prof. Bernard Mayheek, contains an auditorium that will seat 400, and is surrounded by grounds tastefully decorated.

A ten-story building, to be called the History block, will be erected on the site of the old History building, on the south side of Market street between Third and Fourth streets, by the Bancroft estate.

The University of California announces six Symphony Concerts, to be given in the Greek Theatre by the University Orchestra, with Dr. J. Fred Wolfe, Professor of Music in the University, as conductor, at half past 3 o'clock on the Thursday afternoons of September 13 and 27, October 11 and 25, and November 8 and 22, 1906. The University Orchestra will be made up of the best professional musicians of San Francisco and its vicinity. Season tickets, reserved, will be $5, and for the unreserved section $3. Season or single tickets may be obtained by mail, also at the Greek Theatre on the day of each concert, or at the music stores in San Francisco and Oakland. In undertaking an annual series of Symphony Concerts, the University seeks to serve the highest interests of the community. Except for the musicians and the conductor, no individual receives any remuneration.

Adolph Cassier of Dedham, Mass., and Helena Cassier Hellman of Boston, brother and sister of Louis P. Cassier, the magazine publisher, who was killed last July in the railroad wreck at Salisbury, England, have joined issue with Gertrude Spooner Cassier of Scituate, Mass., who claims she is the real widow of the late publisher, and that Agnes Nichols Cassier of Trumbull, Conn., was not his wife, to prevent a division of the estate, estimated at $500,000.

The Mechanics' Mercantile Library has reopened at the new library building, 99 Grove street, corner of Polk. A large number of volumes of technical and scientific works, as well as of the latest fiction, is already on the shelves and the library will be restored to its former position within a very short time.

LITERARY NOTES.

A Study of Contemporary Society.

Blemishes of style, defects of construction, the failure of the author to work out the process by which the soul of the erring wife is cured, do not materially detract from the importance of "In Cure of Her Soul," by Frederic Jesup Stimson—a sane, strong and solid novel. Like "The House of Mirth," to which it may well be compared, the story is, largely, a study of the appalling corruption of some circles of contemporary American society, although greater verisimilitude is lent to the picture in the present volume by the author's sympathetic limning of wholesome types. The central theme is the defecation of the dollar, with its pregnant possibilities in this country for "position" and vacuous pleasure. "In Cure of Her Soul" is a sermon on the low ideals of smart society.

The outline of the story is simple enough. The hero, Austiu Pineknev, leaves the Harvard Law School with old-fashioned ideas, which he is successful in holding. All about him others are making fortunes by shady means, but he achieves a dignified success honestly, and identifies himself with the cause of labor, but without becoming a socialist. He is prominent in a series of episodes—a strike in New Hampshire, a railroad conspiracy in Baltimore, miners' troubles in West Virginia. The author's knowledge of law and politics adds to the effectiveness of these descriptions.

Pineknev, from pure chivalry, marries a pretty girl to enable her to escape from her engagement to an odious millionaire. But the social life of New York and Newport and the Berkshires proves disastrous to her selfish nature, and the marriage seems a hopeless wreck. But a noble Southern girl comes into his life, and helps him to keep his ideals alive. The author introduces her as a type of the better sort of rich people. The wife, however, has a change of heart, and there is a happy and conventional ending.

Published by D. Appleton & Co., New York.

In Defense of Divorce.

There are 377 pages on marriage, giving in marriage, and getting out of marriage, in "Whom God Hath (Not) Joined Together," by Orr Kenyon. The author holds a brief for divorce, and his narrative is almost a tract in defense of the practice. The principal character of the story is Judge Koons, of the David Harum type, who is forever delivering homilies to his office boy, if no more appreciative listener be near, on the reasonableness of divorce. The judge has searched the Scriptures and the early Fathers, and woe betide the luckless domineer who says there should be no divorce, except for adultery. His favorite argument in favor of remarriage for the deserted is St. Paul's "But if the unbelieving depart, let him depart. A brother or sister is not under bondage in such case." The author enlists our sympathy for Ernest Sterling, whose wife neglects children and home in pursuit of the "higher truth." She finally deserts him, and, although a minister, he divorces her, and justifies his action at a meeting of the church conference. Sterling meets Marian Gordon, a charming young woman, who, also, has had matrimonial troubles, and is likewise a divorcee, and they are married, to live, let us hope, far from the hum of the divorce mill. We are introduced to several happily mated pairs, to relieve our minds from the miseries of the unfortunate ones. If the reader has not had enough of the discussion on divorce in the story, he will find an essay, at the end of the book, on the history of the dissolution of the marriage bond.

"The Voyage of the Arrow," by T. Jenkins Hains, is a sea yarn of the old-fashioned sort. The Arrow is captured on the high seas by a gang of convicts who have seized and burned the English ship on which they were being transported. There is storm and shipwreck, murder and piracy, love and romance enough to satisfy the most ardent lover of sea tales of adventure. Published by L. C. Page & Co., Boston; $1.50.

Three years ago a little volume, "Letters from a Chinese Official," was enthusiastically and highly extolled. Its anonymous author purported to give an Eastern view of Western civilization. It is now said that G. Lowes Dickinson, the English essayist, was the author. The arguments, sophistries, and paradoxes, however, might have (and have) been used by Chinese writers. William Jennings Bryan has just published a reply in "Letters to a Chinese Official." It is a brilliant and effective defense and criticism, written in clear and direct English. Published by McClure, Phillips & Co., New York.

The geography of Holland, the outlines of its history, and its quaint customs, are interestingly taught children in "Our Little Dutch Cousin," by Blanche McManus. Published by L. C. Page & Co., Boston; 60 cents.

Southern California has a poet who is almost without honor in his own country. He is Robert Cameron Rogers, a Santa Barbara newspaper man, author of the recently published volume, "The Rosary and Other Poems." "The Rosary" is the well-known verse of Nevin's popular song. Mr. Rogers does not people his muse with symbolism, impressionism, or abstract subtleties; he is content to sing wholesome songs on sane themes. This is the author's third volume of verse. Published by The John Lane Company, New York; $1.50 net.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

Thoreau's journal, occupying thirty-nine volumes of closely written blank-books, containing the record of the observations and meditations of a lifetime, and completed forty-four years ago, has just been published for the first time.

Mrs. Bash, the wife of Captain Bash of the United States army, sailed on the transport Thomas a few days ago for the Orient. Mrs. Bash was formerly Miss Bertha Ruukle, and is well known as author of the "Helmet of Navarre" and other novels.

An inside record of the voyage of Admiral Rozhdestvensky's fleet to the Far East, and its destruction at the Battle of Tsushima, has appeared in an English translation. It is the diary of M. Politovsky, the chief engineer of the fleet, who was killed in the fight. Its contents show that Admiral Rozhdestvensky's command was in no state to meet Togo's fine squadron.

Mark Twain will appear before the public presently with his new volume, "The $30,000 Bequest," which will include some established favorites.

A movement has been started by the American and British literary men in Rome to purchase by popular subscription the house on the Piazza di Spagna in which John Keats died and to establish therein a permanent memorial of Keats and Shelley, consisting of their works in various editions, together with portraits and manuscripts connected with them.

Moncure D. Conway's latest book is called "My Pilgrimage to the Wise Men of the East," because it contains his memories of and conversations with leading Buddhists, Brahmins, Parsees, Moslems, and others in India, his impressions of the country, and follows his saunterings among ancient shrines.

Prof. Lamprecht, the eminent German scholar, has published an account of his visit to America and a survey of the intellectual development. His meeting with his countryman, Carl Schurz, in New York, is thus described: "I was asked in a company: 'What should be the chief characteristic of a biographer?' and as I answered, 'Love for his hero,' some one stepped forward and presented the question: 'What should be the attitude, then, of an autobiographer?' It was Carl Schurz, who was just then writing the story of his own life."

Mary Cholmondeley's novel, "The Prisoners," which she has been writing for three years, is out.

There is hardly any more offensive cant in the world than that which pretends that real literature is not produced for money, declares a writer in a London weekly. Much of the greatest would have been left undone if there had been no money to be got out of it. The sharp tooth of necessity gnaws the man of genius until it drives him to his desk. He would often be well content to let his great thoughts escape in talk, or to dream his dreams in silence. But he has Abbotsford to make into a feudal mansion, and we get the Waverley novels; or he has his old mother to bury, and he turns out "Rasselas." Does anybody suppose lazy Goldsmith would have given us "The Vicar of Wakefield" if he had seen no potential coats and ruffles and howls of punch in quills and ink and paper? Thackeray wrote "Vanity Fair" as Shakespeare wrote "Hamlet"—in the way of business.

Walter A. Johnson, formerly of Doubleday, Page & Co., and others, have purchased The Four-Track News from George H. Daniels, and beginning with the October issue the new publishers will change the name to The Travel Magazine.

Thomas Hood lacks such a biography as his merits deserve, and "Literary Bypaths in Old England," by Henry C. Shelley, soon to appear, will somewhat amend this deficiency.

Theocritus on Agradina.

The spacious cities hummed with toil;
The monarch reared his towers to the skies;
Men dived the fruitful soil
And studied to be wise.
Along the highway's rocky coil
The mailed legions rang;
Smiling unheeded mid the moil
The Poet sang.

The glittering cities long are heaps;
The stately towers lie level with the plain;
The desert serpent sleeps
Where soared the marble fane.
The stealthy, bead-eyed lizard creeps
Where gleamed the Tyrant's throne;
That grandeur dark Oblivion steep,
The song sings on.
—Thomas Nelson Page in The Atlantic Monthly.

Jack London will sail from San Francisco in a few weeks with his wife and his wife's uncle in a boat forty-five feet long; he intends to go around the world, touching at the Hawaiian Islands, Samoa, Tasmania, New Zealand, Australia, the Philippines, and Japan. Korea, China, India, the Red Sea, the Mediterranean, and bordering lands, will be visited and described for an American magazine. Mr. London believes his voyage will be unique as well as enjoyable, and prides himself on the fact that he will have no crew except his one friend, a man of sixty years. His boat will be "ketch-rigged" and carry an auxiliary engine and propeller for emergencies.

WHAT PRESS CLIPPINGS MEAN TO YOU

Press clipping information is information you can obtain in no other way. As a business aid, Press Clippings will place before you every scrap of news printed in the country pertaining to your business. They will show you every possible market, big or little, for your goods, openings that you would never hear of in the ordinary way, and they give you this information in a fresh and valuable form.

If you have a hobby or wish information upon any subject, press clippings will give you any subject or topic. Press clippings will give you all the current information printed on any subject.

The cost for any purpose is usually but a few cents a day.

THE INTERNATIONAL PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

the largest press clipping bureau in the world, reads and indexes 55,000 papers and other periodicals each month, and even if you are now a subscriber to some other clipping bureau, it will be to you to investigate our superior service.

Write for our book about Press Clippings and our Daily News Reports, and ask about The International Information Bureau, which supplies complete manuscripts or material for addresses, essays, lectures and debates, and complete and correct information upon any subject at a reasonable cost. Address

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

occasionally they manufacture a good story in London. One of the latest tells of a family passionately devoted to a large whist which was plunged into mourning by the loss of the father. A discussion arose as to whether the deceased would have chosen to be hurried or cremated. The decision was left to the eldest son, who, looking at his mother, said, "I will leave it to you." To which the lady replied: "I make it uples."

There was a "stub" railroad that ran from Anaconda, Daly's winter home, to the main line of the Northern Pacific at Garrison, where it connected with the splendidly equipped trains, serene voyagers upon the prairie-sea, to leave St. Paul and swing across the continent through canyon, forest, and lake, dropping headlong down the west side of the Cascade Range into Seattle the third day out. These trains went the by way of Missoula, near Daly's winter home. In winter, storms in the mountains delayed these fliers; in spring, the creeks; in summer, heavy passenger loads; and in the fall, the cumbersome equipment of the harvests. It was once on the witness-stand under cross-examining fire by a representative of the Northern Pacific Railroad. "Where do you live?" the first question was sharply asked. "I have a residence at Anaconda and one at Hamilton," replied Daly. "Well," immediately queried the lawyer, "where do you spend most of your time?" Quick as the flash of a quail's eye came the answer: "At Garrison, waiting for Northern Pacific trains."

Professor Wiley, the chemist of the Department of Agriculture, recently went to a Washington store for the purpose of purchasing a fountain pen. The young man at the counter furnished the professor with a sheet of paper, a bottle of ink and several of the fountain pens, so that he might try each one. In doing so the professor soon moved the sheet with the words "tempus fugit" the clerk looking on the while with kindly interest.

"If you should buy one and it doesn't suit you, Mr. Fugit," said he, "you can take it back and take another."

I was at an afternoon party. The hostess, anxious for a sensation and desiring something other than the orthodox to hit reader and the fraudulent palm-reading, engaged a troupe of performing artists for the entertainment of her guests. The party was a great success. When it came up a loud wail rent the air. It was the voice of the impresario frantically in distress.

"What is it? Tell me, I implore you," said the hostess.

"Oh, madame, I have lost one of my artists. Where has it gone?"

"At that moment a lady wearing a gray dress brushed past him."

"Oh, madam, pardon," said the artist, "I am greatly relieved, lightly picking something from her shoulder; 'vun of my artists.'"

An old-time English barrister was John Williams, a sarcastic wit and a factor with an intense prejudice against marriage. His clerk one day asked him for a holiday to get married, and some months afterward, on entering his chambers, Williams found his dead body suspended from the door. He engaged another clerk, and asked him he was married. "No," the clerk replied; but thinking Williams would regard marriage as a guarantee of steadiness, he added, "but I am going to be." "Very well," replied Williams, "but understand this—when you hang yourself, don't do it here!"

"The easiest money I ever made," said a Philadelphia shipping man the other day, "was handed to me in New York not long ago. I was visiting there and had a little time to myself, so I bought a paper and went down to the river front. I saw an advertisement in the paper saying that a tug was to be auctioned off that day, so I went to the place and stood around examining the tug. After a while a man who had been watching me came over and began asking questions. I told him I was interested in boats and was from Philadelphia. Then he asked: 'What are you doing down here?' 'I came down to this auction sale,' I said. 'Well,' said the man, 'if you want to keep on the right side of the boy you'll do something for me. Here's $100; do not bid on the tug.' I took the money and departed. I had not the slightest intention of bidding."

A certain college professor having ordered from a music publishing house a copy of a "Valse Impromptu" by a certain French composer, received an "Impromptu Waltz" by another man. The publishers, when called to account for their mistake, replied rather insolently that they had been in the music publishing business a long time, and had yet to discover the difference between a "Valse Impromptu" and an "Impromptu Waltz." Would Dr. Smith kindly state to them that difference?

"Gentlemen," wrote the genial professor in answer. "I have not like yourselves, been in the music publishing business, and am therefore not fully qualified to inform you; but since, in your extremity, you have appealed to me, I would venture to suggest that the difference between a 'Valse Impromptu' and an 'Impromptu Waltz' may be similar to the difference between a blind Venetian and a Venetian blind."

An unpopular man, who was refused membership in a West End club, had the audacity to write to the club secretary, demanding the name of the man who had blackballed him. The secretary could not resist the chance of sending the following reply: "Sir: I have received your letter demanding the name of the man who blackballed you. His name is Legion."

Henry Skerrett, of Oswego, ran away from his family a year after his marriage. That was about 1880, and a few months ago, taking up a local paper in Chicago, the deserter read in the "personal" column:

"If Henry Skerrett, who, twenty-three years ago, deserted his poor wife and babe, will return home, said babe will be glad to knock the stuffing out of him."

A farmer who went to a large city to see the sights engaged a room at a hotel, and before retiring asked the clerk about the hours for dining.

"We have breakfast from six to eleven, dinner from eleven to three, and supper from three to eight," explained the clerk.

"Wa-al, say," inquired the farmer in surprise, "what time air I goin' ter git ter see the town?"

Gen. Fred D. Grant has a favorite story illustrating his famous father's aptness in summarizing a situation in a few words. He says that Mrs. Grant once asked her husband to discharge their old coachman, who had again made a hotch of some simple errand. "Well, mother," replied the hero of Appomattox, "if John could do everything you wanted him to do and do it right he would not have to be our coachman."

A certain well known lawyer excelled in cross-examination. His gift of humor often served him where other methods were unsuccessful. For instance, a young woman in the witness box was asked her age. She hesitated to reply.

"Don't hesitate," said the lawyer. "The longer you hesitate the older you are."

The witness took the hint.

It is one of the traditions of the Senate of the United States that no new Senator shall make a set speech till he has served a year or longer. Old Senators are very impatient of new comers. Edmunds of Vermont once allowed it to be understood that he would soon retire. Idaho had just been admitted as a State. Senator McConnell of Idaho, the day after he had been sworn in, took up a position in the middle aisle and in a foghorn voice made a speech.

While he was holding the fort, Edmunds entered the chamber. He stopped short and gazed at the speaker with the utmost astonishment. Leaning over to the Senator next to him, he asked: "Who is that person?"

"A Senator from Idaho."

"You don't say so! When did he come?"

"He was sworn in yesterday."

"Sworn in yesterday and making a speech to-day," mused Edmunds. "Well, well, if that doesn't heat all! It looks like it's time for me to quit." And in a few days he resigned.

Senator Ingalls, during his early life, was unable to restrain his propensity to indulge in sarcasm. This habit eventually lost him his place and his popularity. On one occasion an intimate friend wrote to him urging the appointment of another friend to a position under the Government. To this letter the Senator returned a very sarcastic answer, and received the following reply: "My Dear Senator: I think it would be well for you to reserve your sarcasm for the rapidly increasing number of your enemies, instead of offering it to the decreasing number of your friends, of whom I am one." It is said Mr. Ingalls never forgot the rebuke, but it was too late.

Mrs. Maud Miller Hipple, advocate of a course in "motherhood" for young matrons, tells this:

"A young mother was walking with her husband on the Atlantic City board walk. Suddenly she gave a little cry of pleasure.

"Oh," she said, "there is nurse—nurse wheeling baby."

"And she ran lightly to the luxurious coach of leather, with its swan-shaped carriage and its rubber-tired wheels, and she pushed back the parasol that shaded the occupant from the sun."

"Then she gave a great start.

"Why, nurse," she cried, "where's the baby?"

"The nurse gasped. 'Goodness gracious, ma'am! I forgot to put him in!'"

The servant-girl problem has attracted the attention of the California Promotion Committee, which has sent instructions to its Eastern bureaus at New York to visit Ellis Island and have the incoming women from European countries told of the advantages of California. They will be given an idea of the wages paid out here, the class of work and other necessary information.

PERSONAL.

Notes and Gossip.

A chronicle of the social happenings during the past week in the cities on and around the Bay of San Francisco will be found in the following department:

The engagement is announced of Mrs. Elue Gardner Hodgson, daughter of Major and Mrs. John Bigelow of Minneapolis, and niece of Mrs. Henry L. Dodge of this city, to Mr. Walter Remington Quick of San Francisco. The wedding will take place in about six weeks at the bride's home in the East.

The engagement is announced of Miss Martha S. Spencer, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. John C. Spencer of Palo Alto, to Mr. Otto Wedemeyer, formerly of California, but now of New York.

Mr. and Mrs. James Benjamin Clifford have sent out invitations to the wedding of their daughter, Evelyn, to Mr. Sylvanus Cobb Farnham, on Wednesday evening, September 19th, at half after eight o'clock, at Trinity Episcopal Church. There will be a reception after the ceremony in the Guild room.

A pretty family wedding took place on Monday, September 10th, at the home of Mrs. Rebecca D. Benjamin, when her daughter, Miss Florence Edith, became the wife of Mr. Walter Scott Levin of New York city. After two weeks of travel in Southern California, Mr. and Mrs. Levin will return to San Francisco and will reside at 2712 Pine street.

Cards have been received from Mr. and Mrs. John Carroll Chase of Derry, New Hampshire, announcing the marriage of their daughter, Carolyn Louise, to Dr. Raffaele Lorini, on Saturday, August 25th, at their home. Dr. and Mrs. Lorini will make their home at Hotel Del Coronado.

Lieutenant-Commander Barnes, U. S. N., was the host at a luncheon on board the U. S. S. Pensacola, at Yerba Buena Island, on Wednesday of last week, in honor of Miss Martha Calhoun. Those present were Mrs. A. H. Voorhies, Mrs. Malcolm Henry, Miss Calhoun, Miss Laura Doe, Paymaster Knowles, U. S. N., Paymaster Perkins, U. S. N., Dr. Monger, U. S. N., and Dr. W. Smith, U. S. N.

Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Hooper Jackson entertained at a dinner at the Claremont Country Club on Saturday evening of last week. Their guests were: Mr. and Mrs. William Lynham Shiels, Mr. and Mrs. Harry East Miller, Miss Bernice Macdonald, Miss Elizabeth McNear, Benedict Taylor, and William Benedict.

Mr. Almer Newhall was the host at a yachting party last week in honor of Miss Edna Montgomery, who is soon to be married to Lieutenant Edward A. Sturges, U. S. A. About twenty-five guests were present.

Commander and Mrs. Henry C. Gearing entertained at a large card party at their quarters at the Mare Island Navy Yard on Friday night of last week, about eighty guests being present. Five hundred was played and the prizes were won by Mrs. Samuel L. Graham, Miss Susan Persons and Civil Engineer H. H. Rousseau.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Annexed will be found a resume of movements to and from this city and Coast, and of the whereabouts of absent Californians.

PERSONAL.

Army and Navy.

The latest personal notes relative to army and navy people who are or have been stationed at Pacific Coast points:

Lieutenant-General Charles F. Humphrey, quartermaster-general, U. S. A., who left on Sunday morning last for the South, to inspect Fort Rosecrans, San Diego, will upon his return here, spend a few days before returning to Washington, D. C.

Colonel E. E. Dravo, chief commissary, Department of California, U. S. A., left for the East on Sunday evening last with the remains of his wife, who died at their home at the Presidio. Services were held there on Sunday afternoon, but the interment will take place at Arlington, upon the arrival of her daughter, Mrs. Woodruff, from Paris. Colonel Dravo has been granted one month's leave of absence, with permission to apply for an extension of leave.

Major William R. Purnell, U. S. A., recently, is relieved at his own request from duty at St. Matthew's School, Burlingame, and will proceed to his own home. By direction of the President, Captain Edward C. C. Ord, U. S. A., retired, is designated as professor of military science and tactics at the school.

Captain Richardson Clover, U. S. N., M. Clover and the Misses Dora and Beatrice Clover, who have spent the summer at their country place, Lavergne, in the Santa Valley, expect to return to their home in Washington, D. C., about October 1st.

Captain Henry T. Fergusson, U. S. A., commissary of the Presidio Post will, in addition to his other duties, assume charge of the office of the chief commissary of the Department of California during the absence of Colonel Dravo in the East.

Lieutenant F. L. Pinney, U. S. A., who commanded the gunboat Villa Lobos on the Yangtze River, returned last week on the America Maru, having completed his duty on the Asiatic station.

Lieutenant E. H. Campbell, U. S. N., is ordered detached from duty at Washington, D. C., and to the Union Iron Works, San Francisco, for duty in connection with the Milwaukee, with a view to being ordered as a navigator of that vessel when completed.

Lieutenant E. B. Fenner, U. S. N., is detached from the Naval Academy at Annapolis and ordered to the Independence at Mare Island and thence to the Milwaukee when placed in commission.

Lieutenant C. F. Nicholson, Seventh Cavalry, U. S. A., having been discharged from the General Hospital, Presidio of San Francisco, returned to his position in the Philippines on the transport Tamas last week.

Lieutenant Hugh S. Johnson, First Cavalry, U. S. A., has been relieved from duty here, in connection with the relief of the 10th, and has rejoined his regiment in Texas.

Lieutenant Tilman Campbell, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., judge advocate, general court-martial Presidio of San Francisco, has been ordered to proceed to Benicia Arsenal for the purpose of securing certain evidence necessary in the trial of an arrested man, now pending at the Presidio.

Lieutenant Casam J. Bartlett, assistant surgeon, U. S. A., has been upon the recommendation of the chief surgeon of that department, relieved from duty at Ft. Miley and ordered to proceed to the Det. of Recruits and Casuals, Angel Island, for duty.

Lieutenant Carl L. Stone, Philippine Scouts, U. S. A., who arrived in San Francisco on September 4th, too late to secure transportation on the transport Thomas, which sailed September 5th, is detailed on special duty at department headquarters in this city until the sailing of the next transport for Manila.

Veterinarian Richard B. Corcoran, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Presidio of San Francisco, is ordered to proceed on or about October 1st, to Camp Tacoma, Washington, for duty with the First Battalion, Field Artillery.

Captain Daniel W. Ketcham, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Lieutenant Graham Parker, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Lieutenant G. B. G. Hanna, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., have been appointed in pursuance of instructions from the War Department, a board to meet at the Presidio of San Francisco to examine into and report upon the qualifications of First Sergeant Richard H. Harris, 38th company, Coast Artillery, for the position of sergeant-major, Artillery Corps, junior grade.

A board consisting of Captain Harry L. Thorne, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Captain Sterling P. Adams, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., Captain Mathew C. Smith, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., and Veterinarian Richard B. Corcoran, Artillery

Corps, U. S. A., have been appointed to meet at the Presidio of San Francisco and at Madeline, California, at the call of the senior member of the board for the purpose of inspecting horses to be purchased for the army.

A board consisting of Captain Alonzo Gray, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., Captain Herbert B. Crosby, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., Captain Dwight E. Aultman, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., and Veterinarian H. W. Peter, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., is appointed to meet at Condon, Oregon, at the call of the senior member of the board, to inspect horses to be purchased for the army.

A general court-martial has been appointed to meet at the Presidio of Monterey, with the following detail: Captain William H. H. Chapman, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., Captain George B. Pond, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., Lieutenant Aubrey Lippincott, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., Lieutenant James M. Petty, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., Lieutenant John Randolph, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., Lieutenant William B. Wallace, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., Lieutenant Burt W. Phillips, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., Lieutenant Oscar A. Russell, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., Lieutenant Robert J. Binford, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., judge advocate.

Mrs. W. G. Miller, whose husband, Lieutenant-Commander Miller, U. S. N., has been ordered to sea duty, has arrived in California, and is the guest of her parents, Rear-Admiral Bowman H. McCalla, U. S. N., retired, and Mrs. McCalla, at their home in Santa Barbara.

A general court-martial was appointed which met at the Presidio of San Francisco on September 4th, consisting of the following officers: Captain Elisha S. Benton, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Captain Arthur T. Balentine, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Captain Ernest A. Greenough, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Captain Charles C. Pullis, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Lieutenant Samuel D. McAllister, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Lieutenant Graham Parker, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Lieutenant James B. Taylor, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Lieutenant Tilman Campbell, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., judge advocate.

The marriage of Mrs. Isabel Fallon Brittan, the divorced wife of Colonel Nat Brittan, wealthy citizen and clubman of San Francisco, to District Attorney J. J. Bullock of San Mateo County, at Redwood City, took place last week. As Miss Fallon of San Jose, the bride was one of the belles of twenty-five years ago, when she became the wife of Colonel Brittan. Her father was one of the pioneers of California. The couple lived in the groom's handsome home until suit for divorce was filed in the courts here some years ago. Attorney Bullock attended to the legal affairs of Mrs. Brittan and recently represented her in an action brought by her former husband to reduce the alimony of $200 a month to $50 a month because of his great loss of income bearing property in the San Francisco fire. The matter was finally settled out of court by the payment of a lump sum to Mrs. Brittan.

The contest begun to set aside the will of Edgar F. Preston has been settled. Col. Preston, who was a well-known San Francisco attorney, died a year ago, leaving his entire estate to his wife. The property included the home at Portola, near Redwood City. Randolph Preston, son of the testator by his first wife, moved to set the will aside, alleging the existence of a subsequent will, also unsound mind on the part of his father, and undue influence over him.

A dollar subscription fund for the purchase and preservation of the house in New York where President Roosevelt was born, says the Springfield Republican, is the only alternative, it may be, to the sale of the property into irreverent hands. The Roosevelt Home Club has gone under for some reason, and the courts will permit the sale of the house for $60,000. It would be a shame to have the place turned into a saloon.

The mayoralty contest in Los Angeles next fall promises to be a warm one. The Los Angeles News says that there will be at least five tickets in the field—the Republican, Democrat, Municipal Ownership, (Labor) Socialist, and Prohibition.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

The cause of hay fever in men is the kissing of grass widows—Kansas City Journal.

Somebody will have to crawl under the Russian revolution and see what ails the blamed machinery.—Chicago Tribune.

"Soakski takes more interest in his business than any one I know." "What's his business?" "He runs a pawnshop."—Cleveland Leader.

"The suppression of the automobile would be a great damage to trade." "Do you sell benzine?" "Oh, no, wooden legs."—Umoristico.

Clerk—"What kind of a hammock do you want, miss?" Summer Girl—"Oh, a little one. Just about big enough for one—but—er—strong enough for two."—Life.

"Hey, there, it is forbidden to walk on the railway tracks." "Do not be afraid, my good man, we have come here to escape the automobiles."—Umoristico.

First Barnstormer—"Yes, my old daddy used to implore me not to become an actor." Second Barnstormer—"It was noble of you to accede to his wishes."—Cleveland Plaindealer.

For a little while they were between the devil and the deep sea. Then the woman got her some dresses made, and went down to the latter. But the man, after some hesitation, went to the former.—Puck.

"Pa," said Johnny, "that poem Sister Jane wrote is no good." "How do you know?" queried father. "Because," said Johnny, "I tried to feed it to the goat and he wouldn't eat it."—Detroit Free Press.

"Carlo, you do not love me any more!" "My treasure, why do you say such a foolish thing?" "Because it is impossible for you to love a woman who has worn a dress as long as I have this one!"—Per Ridere.

"Senator, do you believe every man has his price?" "Certainly," replied Senator Badger. "But that's no sign he will get it. Very often I have been given twice what I had the nerve to ask for."—Milwaukee Sentinel.

"What is reform?" asked the argumentative man. "Reform," answered the world-weary one, "usually consists in merely compelling a man to stop doing things his way and making him do them yours."—Washington Star.

"Yes, sir; I'm the publisher of this paper. Is there anything I can do for you?" "I am looking for a job as a proofreader." "We don't need proofreaders any more. We have adopted the reformed spelling."—Chicago Tribune.

Jack—"I knew a man who stole a kiss from a pretty girl. He paid the penalty for larceny." Katharine—"Ah, indeed! And what was the penalty?" Jack—"Hard labor for life. He married the girl."—Philadelphia Bulletin.

"See that man there?" "Yes; what about him?" "One of our great millionaires, but he's lost his appetite. The poor devil lives on milk and crackers. Pass the corned beef and cabbage, please, and praise the Lord."—Atlanta Constitution.

"I wonder now," mused the dog, "what fool thing it is that my master wants me to do with that hoop he is holding out before me. Maybe he wants me to jump through it. I'll do it, and see." How little it takes to make a man happy!—Chicago Tribune.

"Habiliments for Infants" is a sign in a clothing store in Boston. A Western visitor, seeing it, stopped in amazement. "What does that mean?" he asked his better-acquainted fellow Westerner. "That?" said the other. "Oh, that is Boston dialect for kids' duds."—Youth's Companion.

The wife of the Pittsburgh millionaire reached her breakfast-table in fear and trepidation. The waiting-maid offered her the morning papers. "No, Marie; never give me those when John is out of town on business. I can't bear to think what they might contain." And she sipped her coffee with heavy eyes.—Judge.

"Mother," says the doubting wife, "I do not believe Henry is all that he should be." "What is wrong with him now, Agnes? A short time ago you were complaining that he stayed out too late of nights. Is he staying out later than ever?" "No. He spends every evening at home now, and really that looks to me as though he had something on his conscience."—Life.

The disappearance of the American flag from the China seas seems certain. A cable to the New York Times from Yokohama, says: The competition for the trade of the Pacific between the various steamship companies is exciting lively interest in Japan and China. Shipping men here are positive in their belief that the Japanese companies will force their rivals out of business. It is definitely understood that since the failure of the shipping subsidy bill in America, the Toyo Yusen Kaisha Company will buy out the Pacific Mail Company. Its fleet consists of the Mongolia, Korea, Siharia and China, all fine steamers, 10,000 to 15,000 tons burden. The lost Manchuria belonged to this fleet.

Manager George D. Dornin advises that the City Department of the Springfield is now open in the Kohl Building. The General Department will occupy its old quarters on the California-street side, third floor, as soon as rooms are restored, and furniture, now ordered, made ready. Temporary Department headquarters will remain for the present at 1112 Broadway, Oakland. The Springfield is among the companies which are adjusting and paying policy holders' claims in the San Francisco disaster involving $1,600,000. The payment of this sum will leave the company's capital $2,000,000, its reserve for reinsurance (or unearned) premiums $3,132,531.00, as appears by its financial statement of December 31, 1905, intact, and a net surplus of over $400,000. The assets of the Springfield at the close of 1905 were $7,156,531.72.

The Cuban Tangle.

The protracted insurrectionary movement in Cuba has led President Roosevelt to take action. Without order from Washington the commander of the American cruiser, Denver, had landed sailors in Havana at the request of President Palma. Thereupon President Roosevelt recalled this landing party, but at once took dispatch to Havana Secretary of War Taft and Acting Secretary of State Bacon to endeavor to settle matters. At the same time he addressed a long letter to Mr. Tiesada, Cuban Minister to the United States, in strong terms, urging the Cubans "to band together, to settle differences, and to remember that the only way to preserve the independence of their Republic is to prevent the necessity of outside interference." Later in the letter President Roosevelt adds: "It is, in my judgment, for the sake of Cuba, imperative that there be an immediate cessation of hostilities." Under the Platt amendment to our treaty with Cuba there is no question as to President Roosevelt's right to interfere. It is a regrettable duty, but it is inevitable. We destroyed the former government of Cuba, which, however great may have been its troubles with its Cuban subjects, was at least responsible to foreign governments for any outrages on their citizens. Now that we have destroyed that government and placed the reins of power in Cuba in the hands of a weak oligarchy, we are responsible to foreign governments for any violence to the persons or property of the citizens of other governments. The Liberal party declare that the last election was fraudulent, and that Palma and his henchmen are usurpers. They also declare that the mass of the people are on the side of the insurrection. As the so-called Cuban "government" is beyond question unable to repress the insurrection, the United States must intervene in order to protect the persons and property of all foreigners, including its own citizens. If we do not intervene, European governments will do so. We very much fear that this Cuban insurrection will result in our government becoming permanently embroiled in the Pearl of the Antilles, and then we shall have another tropical entanglement to add to our already existing tropical troubles.

Governor Pardee and the Book Trust.

We have received a letter from Mr. F. A. Binney of San Diego, in which he says: "Have you read what the Los Angeles Times has said about Governor Pardee's connection with the Book Trust? Why have you not exposed it? I thought Pardee was an honest man, but the Los Angeles Times shows him to be a common grafter."

The reason that we have not "exposed" this matter is because we believe Governor Pardee to be an honest man, and the opinion of the Los Angeles Times about him would not change ours. The school-book question has been a burning one in this State ever since it was a State. It will doubtless so continue. It makes little difference what course the State officials may follow in the matter of school books. If they confine themselves to home-made school books they will be accused of patronizing an inferior product. If they place in the schools text books manufactured elsewhere, they will be accused of dishonest collusion with the Book Trust.

The Los Angeles Times is in most respects one of the best daily newspapers in California. Perhaps it is the best. We often think so. The only thing that makes us doubtful as to its excellence every other newspaper is its intemperate and unscrupulous assaults on its enemies, political and other. So unscrupulous and intemperate are these assaults that they defeat their own ends. On the minds of fair and intelligent men such attacks make absolutely no impression. Even if the Argonaut did not believe and know Governor Pardee's character to be of the highest—even if it knew nothing at all about him—the fact that the Los Angeles Times was assailing him for personal or political reasons would suffice to leave our opinion concerning him absolutely unchanged.

We have not investigated the "Governor's connection with the Book Trust," nor have we the time or inclination to do so. In past years we have compared the books produced by the State of California, by individual publishers, and by the Book Trust. We know very little about oil, beef, leather, whiskey, or other necessities controlled by trusts, but we do know a good deal about books. Our judgment in the past has been that the school books produced by the Book Trust are infinitely superior to any of the text books produced by other publishers, including the State of California. If the books produced today by the Book Trust are as good as those produced some years ago by the Book Trust, the writer, were he a State official, would not hesitate for a moment in ordering the text books of the Book Trust for the children of California. Then he would submit with what resignation he could to being roundly abused by the press of the State for his "connection with the Book Trust." But he is not a State official, and he thanks God that he can say so.

Trade-Unions in the Campaign.

Last March one hundred trade-union men, headed by Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, were in Washington attempting by petition to bring about legislative action affecting labor interests. Their bill of grievances was presented to President Roosevelt, Speaker Cannon, and Senator Frye, acting President of the Senate. The President answered courageously, saying that the delegates' fear of an influx of Chinese labor was groundless, and commenting freely on the other points presented. Speaker Cannon replied hotly, in effect telling them that the Nation's lawmakers could be depended upon, without interference, to manage the affairs of state; and Senator Frye did not reply at all.

The labor leaders then announced that all candidates for re-election this fall to Congress would be asked to state, over their signatures, their attitude toward labor. One hundred and twenty-three letters, in answer to queries sent by Mr. Gompers, were received from Representatives in different sections of the country, and many of them are printed in the September issue of the official organ of the American Federation.

The chief points in the bill of grievances filed by the officers of the Federation are: Violation of the spirit and the letter of the law forbidding more than eight hours' work on Government projects; protesting against convict labor; demanding the enforcement of the Chinese Exclusion bill; petitioning for laws protecting seamen's rights; urging a bill restricting immigration; asking measures to secure a higher standard of ability on the part of those manning vessels; remedy for the invasion of the personal liberty of workmen under the anti-trust and interstate commerce laws; an anti-injunction bill, curtailing the power of judges in labor disputes; demanding the right of petition.

Of the 123 letters published, 64 are printed without comment, 55 are accompanied by adverse criticism from Mr. Gompers, and only four receive favorable comment. Letters are printed from five California Congressmen, Representatives Kahn, Hayes, Smith, Needham and Knowland.

Representative Hayes, in his categorical reply, agrees that the grievances call for redress. Representative Kahn says, briefly, he favors the measures and will support them; "and yet," comments Mr. Gompers, "Mr. Kahn voted to annul the eight-hour law on the Panama Canal construction." Representative Needham is in favor of an eight-hour schedule, but believes there may be exceptions, such as the Panama Canal, when it would be unwise to make the schedule mandatory. He believes the issuance of injunctions, to which exceptions may be taken, are rare.

Gompers replies at length to these statements. "If Mr. Needham," he says in part, "were a workman and had an injunction issued against him, restraining him from exercising his lawful rights, he would realize that the abuses of the issuance of injunctions are not so rare as he imagines. Labor insists on the enforcement of the eight-hour law except in great emergencies, yet if exceptions should ever be made they ought to certainly not apply in such a torrid zone as the Panama Canal."

Representative Smith writes, "My attitude toward the interests you represent is doubtless known to your representatives on the coast—to Furuseth, Macarthur, and McCarthy. Of course you have kept tab on my votes here." "Yes," replies Gompers, "we have kept tab on Mr. Smith's record and he voted for the annulment of the eight-hour law in the Panama Canal construction."

Representative Knowland takes up but three of the points of grievance, and says he agrees on them with the Federation. He also is reminded that he voted to annul the eight-hour law.

The officials of the American Federation now propose to fight the re-election of those members of the House who refused or failed to give satisfactory answers to the questions framed from the bill of grievances. The Republican leaders, who say that the Democrats answered glibly because the responsibility of legislation is not on their shoulders, propose to meet the issue squarely.

When it was announced that Mr. Gompers intended to make an active fight against the re-election of Representative Littlefield of Maine, as a test case, Secretary Taft and Speaker Cannon at once entered into the campaign in support of Littlefield. Scores of addresses were made by both sides in Littlefield's district. The labor leaders made much of the decision of the Panama Canal commission to employ Chinese. In replying to the attacks of Gompers and his associates, Cannon and Taft asserted that Congress has not been unfriendly to labor, and they justify the employment of Chinese by showing that the Federation cannot supply men to work on the canal. Referring to the anti-injunction bill, Speaker Cannon said:

"Mr. Gompers has blacklisted us because Congress failed to pass that law. He has read us out of civilization, but, speaking for myself, I had rather quit public life now and at the age of 70 quit forever, true to the civilization we have developed, true to the distribution of powers to the legislative, executive and judicial which we check on each other, than to retain public office at such a sacrifice to my own self-respect and such a terrible cost to the country."

Representative Dalzell, who is regarded in the House as the spokesman for the Pennsylvania Railroad and the United States Steel Corporation and other steel interests not at war with the big trust; Representative Lorimer, who showed himself friendly to the meat packers during the inspection-bill fight; Parker of New Jersey, one of the avowed aristocrats of the House; Jenkins of Wisconsin, chairman of the Committee on Judiciary; Longworth of Ohio; Sherman of New York, and Speaker Cannon will also have all the energy of the Federation directed against them. A campaign fund of $2,000,000 is being collected by the Federation of Labor.

The New York Evening Post considers Mr. Gompers's queries "essentially impudent," and continues:

That the average Congressman still has a lurking fear of the hurt that he considers may be done to his political career by that almost demonstrated myth, the "labor vote," is shown by the success Samuel Gompers has had in demanding categorical replies of all the candidates for election to the House as to their attitude towards union legislation. The cool effrontery of Gompers in holding up candidates from every State in the Union and demanding that they give him satisfactory assurances before he would extend to them his approval is something to be marveled at.

Nor does the Chicago Chronicle credit the voting strength claimed by the trade-unionists. It asks:

Will not this talk (of legislating for special interests) be stimulated when the labor organizations and their women and children, aggregating, at a liberal estimate, 10,000,000 people, undertake to control the Congress of the United States against the best interests of the other 70,000,000 people?

The New York World believes the movement to be one of vast importance:

"If the union men of the country follow the Federation there will be the greatest revolution this country has ever known. There are approximately 2,000,000 votes in the bodies that compose the Federation. They constitute one-seventh of the voting population. With their sympathizers they probably constitute a fifth. There are at least 250 of the 386 Congressional districts where one-tenth of the voters going from one party to the other would change the political complexion. A change of 56 votes would turn the Republican majority into a Democratic one. In nearly every one of the fifty-one districts the Republican majority two years ago was not more than 3,000. In many it was less than 1,000, and in a number less than 500."

There is no encouragement for Mr. Gompers in the result of the Maine election. Littlefield's plurality is reduced, it is true, from 5,400 to 1,200, but his three colleagues, who were not fought by Gompers, have reduced majorities in nearly the same ratio. Vinal Haven, the principal labor town in Knox County, gave Littlefield a plurality, while two years ago it was carried by his opponent. It is acknowledged by Democrats and Republicans alike that the prohibition question, dissatisfaction with the liquor law for which the Republicans stood, occasioned the numerous unexpected upheavals. Sixteen out of the twenty municipalities in the State went Democratic; two years ago, eighteen gave Republican majorities. The Republican vote was larger than four years ago, but the Democratic vote shows an increase of nearly 60 per cent.

First Insurance Case in Court.

Although nearly two hundred suits have been filed against the defaulting fire insurance companies doing business in San Francisco, it was only last week that there was a joinder of parties in a decisive case. This was the suit of the Strauss Realty Company against the Transatlantic Fire Insurance Company of Hamburg, to recover $10,000 on two policies, one for a building on Battery street (which is in San Francisco's former downtown business district), and the other on Kearny Street and Union Square Avenue (which is in San Francisco's former uptown retail district). We mention this because some of the crooked insurance companies have been working with maps having what they call "earthquake zones," inside of which zones they claim that the earthquake destruction was complete. These insurance zones, we may remark, are very crooked and usually take in the whole city.

The Transatlantic Company alleged that the fire was caused by "the hand of God" in the shape of an earthquake, followed by governmental and municipal chaos, including the usurpation of authority by the Federal troops and the militia. The plaintiff's witnesses testified that no such conditions prevailed.

The welching insurance companies have laid great stress on the fact that a fair trial of these insurance cases could not be had in San Francisco "by reason of the intense prejudice prevailing there among judges and juries." They have, therefore, struggled to transfer all such cases from the State to the Federal courts. This case was set for trial in the United States Circuit Court. Justice W. W. Morrow, the judge of this court, is and has been for many years a San Franciscan. Although he is beyond question an upright and impartial judge, he doubtless felt that he would be accused of sympathizing with the unfortunates who had been wrecked by earthquake and fire and then ruined by defaulting insurance companies. Therefore he absented himself from the bench, and his place was occupied by Judge Whitson, of Washington. Coming from so distant a point, this gentleman could scarcely be accused of local prejudice, even by crooked insurance companies.

In view of the possible accusation, by the insurance company's attorneys, that the jurors might be prejudiced, the venire was made from several hundred talesmen coming from various counties in California where the earthquake was felt very slightly or not at all, and where there was no fire. As showing the impartial character of these jurymen, the foreman was Timothy Hopkins, a millionaire domiciled in San Mateo county, but having large property interests in San Francisco; oddly enough, he testified that he had no insurance on any of the buildings he had lost by the fire, and that he had "no prejudice against insurance companies." When cross-examined he admitted that he had "a prejudice against people who failed to keep their contracts." But the court decided that a juror who believed in keeping contracts was not thereby disqualified.

It would take too much space to recapitulate the evidence. Many witnesses were called. Among others Mayor Schmitz testified that the municipal government was in working order during and succeeding the catastrophe; that martial law was never in force; that the Federal troops reported to him and were under his control; that he had no knowledge for four or five days of the presence of the militia in San Francisco; that all of the municipal officials were transacting such business as was brought to them. M. H. De Young testified that his new Chronicle building (which was across the street from one of the buildings involved in the case) was uninjured before the fire, as also was the case with the Palace Hotel and other buildings in that vicinity. Various municipal officials testified that they performed official acts on that day. Many witnesses testified that there was no rioting and no disturbance, other than the from the fire.

It did not take long to decide the case. We part of Judge Whitson's decision verbatim. He said:

"Section 1511 of the Civil Code provides that when an prevented or delayed by an irresistible superhuman cause, the act of God—the par whom is cast the duty to perform it is excused therefrom.

"I hold that this does not apply to a case involving the of money only, where the acts have all been done from wh payment would naturally result as a matter of law.

"Loss by earthquake or other overwhelming disaster is cepted. Applying the rule that the courts ought to adhere letter and spirit of a contract as the parties have made it, be held that the insurance company undertook to guarantee loss by fire from whatever cause, unless expressly excepted policy itself.

"I am not in sympathy with those decisions which bri and incorporate into insurance policies, on one pretext and a condition or provision which the parties did not see fit to when the contract was made. Invoking in this case the o rules which govern in the construction of contracts, the co must be that those exceptions which were inserted in this constitute all the exemptions from liability upon which the de can rely.

"It follows from these views that there is no evidence be jury which could bring the case within the exceptions conta the policy, and, accordingly, there must be a verdict for the tif.

"Gentlemen of the Jury, there can be but one verdict case. If you should return a verdict for the defendant th would be compelled to immediately set it aside. On the puted facts and admissions here the plaintiff is entitle verdict for the full amount of its claim, which is $10,000, with $58.33, interest, makes a total of $10,058.33. Ther will be your duty, under the instructions of the Court to this verdict."

How entirely admirable is this clear-cut prese of the law and the facts. How it brushes aw, th contentions of crooked companies and the sophist of superserviceable attorneys. The insurance com undertake to indemnify against loss by fire from wh cause unless expressly excepted by the policy. / The claim for exemption made by this company w incorporated in the policy, therefore, its claim o liability falls to the ground. Of course this d covers only those policies containing no eartha clause. But we are convinced that even those, hec construed in the clear light of the cour pom before a fair-minded judge and an impartial jury most of them fail to hold. As the Argonaut has fore remarked, we have seen no earthquake clause rich intrinsically means that the insuring company ex easily excepted itself from liability by fire due to eartha. Their earthquake clauses all evidently mean non-liability for earthquake damage and not non-liability fr damage due to earthquake, and we believe the cou will so construe.

The jury in this case did not leave their seats. they gave the verdict as instructed by the court, in acco nce with the law and the facts.

This decision is an auspicious augury for future ses Let us hope that all of the cold-feet companie the crooked companies, and the welching companies n be made to settle up.

The Eastern Summer.

Out here in California we have thought ther was a good deal to kick about, and perhaps there wa the East, however, they have been drenched in w through the now expiring summer. Harper's Veky remarked acridly the other day that many thousa of people were returning from the mountains who in ded to spend next summer at the seashore, while many ousd were returning from the seashore firmly dete ned to spend next summer in the mountains. Probabl both are right, and probably both groups, at the end next summer, will think that they are wrong. Jestingside, there are not enough swear words fitly to characize the summer which has just been experienced in the East. It has rained almost incessantly. During the mo of August there fell in the city of Washington 15 ches of rain. And lest it be thought that this is li our cool, refreshing rain showers we hasten to expla that with this Eastern rain there went the awfullest, test, muggiest weather that they have had in Washing du the whole summer, and that is saying a grea deal. In California we have none of the humid heat at is experienced in the East and that is so trying. With high humidity and a temperature of eighty, life re is almost unbearable. So with the heat, the mu ness, the humidity, the mosquitoes, and the almost ir ssant rain of the past summer, the dwellers in the East year have been in hard luck. Perhaps they pity us for living in an earthquake country, but on the whole living in California is not so bad after all, even with an earthquake every forty years or so.

Eight Dollars per Day.

We have received the following from an Argonaut reader who does not understand why bricklayers should get $8.00 per day while a carpenter gets only $4.00.

Editor Argonaut:—I notice in your article "Labor Selling in San Francisco," that bricklayers get $8.00 per day. Why? A bricklayer's time worth so much more than other skilled mechanics—carpenters, machinists, etc.? While a carpenter has to supply himself with about a hundred dollars' worth of tools, the bricklayer only has to have a trowel, level, and plumb, costing only $10.00 to $15.00. A carpenter has to use considerable brain in fitting, joining, mitring etc., while the bricklayer only has to lay his wall in plumb and level, the bricks and mortar being right to his feet on the scaffold. The small business men having from $2,000 to $5,000 invested in their business, nine-tenths of them scarcely make $3.00 per day, and many of them have to put in 12 to 15 hours at that, besides considerable risk and competition. I don't blame any men for asking all they can, but I can't see why there should be so much difference.

H. A. J.

either do we. In fact, the reason for "so much difference" between the pay of bricklayers and editors, painters and painters (we do not mean house-painters, but picture-painters, the kind that paint "hand-colored" pictures), plasterers and parsons—these assailing differences have greatly perplexed and pained us. Only the other day there was a bitter complaint in some Omaha paper touching the hard-heartedness of Mr. Bitter. It seems that, in order to shame the United States, he wired from New York to add a dollar a day to the pay of all his men "in the mechanical department." But not a word was said, commented the Bitter Critic, about the men in the editorial room and the local room. Did Mr. Hearst raise the editors' wages or the reporters' wages? asked this Bitter Critic. He not only did not raise them, went on the Bitter Critic, but more than once he has lowered them in consequence of the high wages he pays in the mechanical department. Warming up to his work, the Bitter Critic went on to point out that once upon a time the writers of the San Francisco press determined to band themselves together into a union—a genuine, hard and fast union, which should have strikes, walk-outs, tie-ups, walking delegates to call out the fair men and to rebuke the "scab" editors, conference committees which would graciously accept continual increases of salary and thus permit the low, base publishers to get out their papers. Who was it put the kibosh on this writers' union? According to the Bitter Critic it was Mr. Hearst. While he loudly encouraged his men (in his mechanical departments) in unionizing, he silently scared them (in his writing departments) from organizing by underhand but brutal intimidation that any man who was unionizing in his editorial or local rooms would get his walking papers pretty quick. Were it not for this, the Bitter Critic, there would be today a well-organized, compact and homogeneous writers' union in San Francisco with a charter from the Amalgamated Association of Newspaper Men, News Boys and Newspaper Janitors' Union of North America. Anticipating objections which might be made to the writers' lack of loyalty to one another, the Bitter Critic added that they had intended to come under the wing of the Typographical Union and become a kind of annex, which he added ingeniously would have "forced the boys to stick together."

From this it is apparent that nearly all of the writers of the modern daily newspapers—the men who sit on editorial tripods, the star space-writers, and so on down to the cub reporters—are classed lower than the men in the mechanical department. Why then can our correspondent object when a bricklayer gets $8.00 a day and a small tradesman about $3.00? True, as the small tradesman has from two to five thousand dollars invested in his business, while the bricklayer has but ten dollars' worth of trowel and plumb. As he says, the small tradesman puts in from ten to fifteen hours a day, while the bricklayer works eight hours and is prevented by his "secret maximum" from laying too many bricks.

What is the reason for this? What is the remedy? The reason is "lack of organization." The remedy is "organization." Had Mr. Hearst's writers organized, the workmen in his local room would today be receiving the same consideration as the gentlemen in his mechanical departments. Were the small tradesmen to organize and stand fast, they would do as well financially as the bricklayers. We ought all of us to organize. Lawyers, doctors, dentists, midwives, clergymen, burglars, merchants, shop-keepers, editors, reporters, chauffeurs, professors, teachers, stenographers, policemen, firemen, street-sweepers, sewer-cleaners, lamp-lighters—in short, the vast mass of unorganized labor ought to be organized. If this were done, the inequitable conditions of which our correspondent complains would speedily be remedied. Merchants and shop-keepers could set a union price on their goods, and any one selling below the minimum would be declared "unfair." A reporter asked by a newspaper proprietor to report a strike truthfully would be justified in refusing, in appealing to the walking delegate, and in calling out all hands. In a non-union quarter of the city—say the residential section of the rich—union policemen would not be permitted to lay a hand on union burglars. In case of a fire in such a "scab" section the union firemen would be forbidden to squirt fair water on unfair houses. Union postal carriers in such unfair districts would drop the mail in the sewer traps. Dentists could refuse to relieve the pain of a sufferer with non-union teeth. When a non-union lady in an interesting condition called in the doctor, he could refuse to deliver her of an unfair baby. A clergyman in good standing would be perfectly justified by union rules in refusing to marry a young woman without her union card. So would a priest be justified in refusing spiritual consolation to the moribund or even to shrive a dying strike-breaker.

It would not be long, as our correspondent must see, before this rigid organizing would bring about an amelioration of the ills of which he complains. Then we would all of us have our wages raised. Even editors, special writers, and reporters might, like the bricklayers, get as much as eight dollars per day.

That is, nearly all of us might. There are weak spots in this scheme. We greatly fear the clergymen. Probably some sickly clergyman, with eight or nine children, would take a job during a clerical strike on the puerile plea that his family needed bread. In that case there would be only one thing to do—the "union sympathizers" would have to cave in his skull with a brick and then drown the children.

But that would be all right. These little matters would adjust themselves. Organize! Let that be the watchword. Put none but union men on guard.

Select Your Own Nominees.

The conventions of the two great political parties in California have met, nominated, and adjourned. Both of them have declared for the direct primary. Judging from the comment concerning the "programming" of both conventions, it is high time. We do not believe all the tales told of the inside workings of these conventions. Nobody could believe them all, for they are contradictory in the extreme. Still, while all of them are not true, some of them may be, and it is certain that many of them will be believed. But the stories of graft and bribery which have sprung up like mushrooms since the Republican convention we utterly disbelieve.

Leaving these campaign fairy tales, the fact remains that both political conventions have declared for the direct primary. Their legislative nominees have only to put into shape the machinery for the direct primary. But we advise the people and the press throughout the State to demand explicit pledges of their legislative nominees, Republican and Democratic, in order that they may not fail to carry out the undoubted desire of the people for the direct primary.

Probably the citizens of California consider that our State is more progressive than the Southern States. California exceeds many of them in population and probably all of them in resources. California is richer than two or three of them put together. Yet by yesterday's legislation the people of these Southern States are now enabled to express distinctly their choice of men to represent them. In this regard California is far behind the States of the South, retrograde as many of them are.

For a score of years many States in the Union have been clamoring for the election of United States Senators by popular vote. As it requires the approval of both Senate and House and an amendment to the Constitution, this change in the organic law has been deemed impossible, and many men do not consider it possible even in the distant future. Yet in no less than eleven Southern States the people, by primary vote, this year have chosen their United States Senators. These eleven States are Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia. The people have chosen the men, and the legislators will elect the men chosen by the people. In Alabama, both of the Federal Senators, Morgan and Pettus, are past eighty years of age; the people of Alabama have by direct vote indicated their preference for the continuance of both in office. But they have also gone so far as to choose three men as alternates to succeed the aged incumbents in case of disability or death. Think what intrigues to thwart the people's will would convulse California if we had two Senators of nearly ninety!

Illinois indicated its choice for Senator at the recent primary election there. In Iowa the conventions of both parties have declared in favor of the direct primary. So has Wisconsin. Even the conservative old States of Vermont and New Hampshire are agitating in this direction. In the recent Oregon election the candidates were voted for in the party primaries, and then at the regular election the nominees for United States Senator were put on the ticket. Thus the legislature is bound to elect the people's choice.

Not only the office of United States Senator, but any office may be placed at the disposal of the people by a wise law like that of Wisconsin. Under such a law any citizen may aspire to any office. But the boss-ruled methods by which political nominations are secured at present do not commend themselves to sensitive, high-minded, honorable men. This does not mean that all the candidates who secure the nominations are low-minded and dishonorable. But it does mean that the methods to which they must stoop almost demand a coarse, callous mind.

In this great State of California we have a population of nearly two millions. Yet out of the hundreds of thousands of voters how many ever dream of aspiring to political office? The number is so small that in the whole State it might be counted by a few hundreds. True, the sneer at "office-seekers" is perennial. But the ambition to serve one's country and one's State is surely an honorable one. Were more honorable men to seek such service the government of both country and State would be better. Under the action of a wise primary law any ambitious young man would find it easy to secure a nomination for public office if his neighbors thought that he was worthy. And who can tell better regarding the worth of a man than his neighbors? As it is now, nine-tenths of the nominees for political offices get them at the behest of some political boss. And the boss generally chooses not the most honorable, or the most worthy, but the most "useful." The term "usefulness" in politics has a very sinister meaning.

Since the last election there have come of age in California several thousand young men. They will cast their first vote for Governor and State officers next November. If matters continue as they have been in the past, these native sons of the State, no matter how ambitious, will find themselves as completely debarred from any chance to hold public office as if they were Chinese. They will find in every county of the State that there is a "court-house ring." They will find in every city of the State that there is a boss. When the State election comes, they will find that there is a State boss to whom the municipal and county bosses report. If these young men desire to have a fair show in the governing of their own State, where many of them were born, we advise them to see that their nominees for the legislature are pledged at once to pass a direct primary law. Do not let them try to foist on you vague generalities and trivial promises. Make them sign a pledge. Let every legislative nominee, Republican or Democratic, be made by the voters in his district to sign a pledge promising that he will not only vote for but work for the enactment of a law giving to the people of California a direct primary vote for all political offices. If he refuses to sign such a pledge, elect him—to stay at home.

A Savings Bank Run.

Strangers sojourning in San Francisco during the past few months have been in the habit of remarking that the people of this city are in a highly nervous, semi-hysterical, not to say panicky, condition. Various events would seem to confirm the truth of this belief. One of the latest has been the run on the Hibernia Savings Bank. It is hardly possible to discover the cause of the run. It is attributed by many people to false reports set afloat by certain insurance companies, whose policies the bank had refused to accept for its clients by reason of the bad faith of those companies in scaling down or repudiating their just liabilities. Whatever the cause, on Tuesday, September 11, a well-defined run began on the bank, with several hundred people in line early in the morning, which number had increased to a thousand by noon. Savings banks have the right under the law to demand notice of from ten to sixty days before paying out the amounts due their depositors. In times of financial stress and strain they are apt to invoke this assistance of the law. The Hibernia Bank, however, did not do this. At once they brought from their vaults hundreds of thousands in piles of gold and stacks of currency, and detailed a number of clerks to assist the paying teller. All day long and for some hours after the closing time the bank paid all of its depositors all that they asked for. A curious phenomenon was the presence of two long lines in the bank, the one of people withdrawing their money, the other of people depositing.

Some of the leading bankers and financiers of the city and State, when interviewed concerning this run, expressed unqualified surprise. I. F. Moulton, cashier of the Bank of California, said: "The Hibernia Bank is absolutely sound. If the run were to continue for months, the money in sight would not then be exhausted." I. W. Hellman, Jr., of the Wells-Fargo Nevada National Bank, said: "I can see no reason for this run. The Hibernia Bank is one of the safest savings banks in the United States. It always carries millions in government bonds and heavy cash balances." William H. Crocker, president of the Crocker National Bank, said: "The Hibernia Bank has been managed with extraordinary caution. It is as strong as any financial institution can possibly be." Rudolph Spreckels, president of the First National Bank, said: "The Hibernia Bank is well intrenched and perfectly solvent, and can without difficulty meet all demands. It holds from $16,000,000 to $18,000,000 in government bonds." James K. Lynch, vice-president of the First National Bank, said: "The Hibernia Savings Bank is absolutely stable." Ignatz Steinhart, manager of the Anglo-Californian Bank, said: "The Hibernia Bank is conservatively managed and is amply provided with cash and securities to meet all demands." Sig. Greenbaum, manager of the London, Paris and American Bank, said: "The Hibernia Bank is as good as any bank in this country. It has ample assets in United States bonds and other valuable securities to meet all demands." Daniel Meyer, the veteran private banker, said: "The Hibernia Bank has had more coin on hand in recent months than ever before in its history." L. G. Burpee, vice-president of the First National Bank of Oakland, said: "We consider the Hibernia Bank safe in every respect." Thomas Prather, president of the Union National Bank of Oakland, said: "This run will not amount to anything, because the Hibernia Bank can meet every call that is made upon it." W. W. Garthwaite, vice-president of the Oakland Bank of Savings, said: "The Hibernia is one of the strongest and soundest banks in the United States." W. G. Palmer, vice-president of the Central Bank of Oakland, said: "The Hibernia Bank can pay every depositor dollar for dollar." C. T. Rodolph, vice-president of the Union Savings Bank of Oakland, said: "The bank is in the hands of safe and shrewd men who will see that its depositors are protected in every way."

Anything that the Argonaut could add to these statements by leading bankers and prominent financiers would be unnecessary. We may add, however, that the last statement made to the State Bank Commissioners shows that the bank has nearly thirteen million dollars in United States bonds, which can be turned into coin in an hour by depositing them in the San Francisco Sub-Treasury of the United States. In other negotiable cash bonds the bank carries over eleven millions of dollars. As for its loans, it has always been one of the most conservative banks in California and has confined its loans strictly to lands which are outside of "boom" districts, and confined them also strictly to percentages which are well within the limits of conservative banking.

The Argonaut has no special interest in the Hibernia Bank other than this—that bank is one of the financial towers of San Francisco. As the Bank of California stands with the financial and mercantile classes, so stands the Hibernia Bank with the constructing, producing, and laboring classes. Were either bank to show signs of weakness it would threaten the stability of the entire financial structure of San Francisco. Therefore it is that the Argonaut departs from its usual rule, and assures its readers that, in its belief, any rumors touching the financial solidity of the Hibernia Bank are utterly unfounded.

California Democrats in Convention.

The State Democratic Convention at Sacramento September 12 nominated Theodore A. Bell by acclamation for Governor and passed a resolution reading William Randolph Hearst out of the party. Marshall Diggs and Thomas J. Geary would not allow their names to come before the convention, and James D. Phelan telegraphed to say that he would be obliged to decline the nomination should it be tendered to him.

There was no lack of enthusiasm for Bell, and it was noted that several prominent labor leaders of San Francisco were in close communication with the meeting, all working for the Napa ex-Congressman. For other places on the ticket there were few contests of interest, and the platform was adopted as reported from the committee.

Following is the ticket as named at the convention:

Governor—Theodore A. Bell, Napa.
Lieutenant-Governor—Thomas A. Toland, Ventura.
Secretary of State—Arthur L. Nichols, Butte.
Controller—John Markley, Sutter.
Treasurer—S. S. Bailey, San Francisco.
Attorney-General—W. Ona Morton, Los Angeles.
Surveyor-General—John C. Lane, Mendocino.
Clerk of the Supreme Court—J. E. Rainey, Santa Barbara.
Superintendent of Public Instruction—Miss Anna Williams, Modoc.
Superintendent of State Printing—E. I. Woodman, Sacramento.
Supreme Court.
Frank J. Murasky, San Francisco, long term; Jackson Hatch, Santa Clara, long term; J. Early Craig, San Francisco, short term.
Courts of Appeal.
First District—J. A. Cooper, San Francisco, presiding; John Garber, Alameda; M. T. Dooling, San Benito.
Second District—M. T. Allen, Los Angeles, presiding; M. L. Short, Kings; George H. Smith, Los Angeles.
Third District—Joseph W. Hughes, Sacramento, presiding; C. E. McLaughlin, Plumas; J. L. Prewett, Placer.
Railroad Commissioners.
First District—F. R. Peters, El Dorado.
Second District—James H. Wilkins, Marin.
Third District—R. Frank Going, Los Angeles.
Board of Equalization.
Second District—J. C. Downey, Alameda.
Third District—Richard H. Beamer, Yolo.
Fourth District—John Kastle, Ventura.
For Congress.
First District—F. W. Tafi, Del Norte.
Second District—W. A. Beard, Sacramento.
Third District—H. W. Brunk, Alameda.
Sixth District—Harry A. Greene, Monterey.
Seventh District—Convention meets in Los Angeles, September 20.
Eighth District—C. A. Barlow, Bakersfield.

First among the declarations of the platform adopted is an endorsement of William Jennings Bryan. Nominations for all offices at a direct primary and the election of United States Senators by the votes of the people are demanded. The Australian ballot is favored and the use of voting machines opposed. Ownership of public utilities by the people is demanded. The Republican members of Congress from California are scored for refusing to favor legislation relieving San Francisco of duties on material for rebuilding the city. The labor bills before Congress for restriction in the issuing of writs of injunction and the more complete enforcement of the eight-hour law were favored.

This is the resolution concerning the Hearst movement:

Resolved, That in the so-called Independence League we recognize a political machine created by W. R. Hearst for his own political preferment, and which he is the undisputed boss, and an ingenious endeavor to forestall and prevent the nomination of President and to encompass the defeat of America's greatest, William J. Bryan.

We therefore denounce such purposes and call upon a Democrats to oppose such ends.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

A Welch Within a Welch.

Place: A little tongued-and-grooved redwood carved out of room 19, Canning Block, Oakland, California.

Time: 11 o'clock a. m., Friday, September 7th, 1906.
An adjuster of the Trader's Insurance Company, Chicago, Illinois, sits in front of and facing a Victim on a low, bright-red settee.

Adjuster—"How much was the policy for?"

Victim—"550."

"What did it cover?"

"Law books and office furniture."

"What were they worth?"

"They cost $6000; they were worth at least $3000 the time of the fire."

"Any other insurance?"

"Yes; $550 in the Atlas; they adjusted it at the amount more than three months ago, and paid it."

"Then you had only $1,100 on what cost you $6,000? What did you have so little for?"

"I did not think the building could burn."

"What building was it?"

"The 'Cail Building.'"

"Did the 'Cail Building' fall down?"

"It had not up to a quarter before ten this morning."

"Did the military destroy the 'Cail Building'?"

"They had not when I just passed it."

"Did the floors fall in?"

"Go look at them. They are there yet. We are to be back in the building next March."

"What kind of foundations did the 'Cail Building' have?"

"They are concrete now, and I don't know of having been changed lately."

"Now, I have written down these answers here. You please take this paper into room 26 and sign your name to it before a notary you will find there?"

The Victim locates a fifty-cent piece in his right pants-pocket, takes in his left hand the paper of the 'Cail Building' has concrete foundation and did not fall down, gropes his way westward through dark and narrow hall-ways, no signs on the walls around several corners, until he finds "26"—"no sign else—on a door in a sort of a blind alley. He enters No. 26 is the inner room of a suite, the outer room which has windows on Thirteenth street.

With her back to a stationary wash-stand in the corner, stands a lady in white, holding up her two forearms as she wipes her hands on a soiled towel. She greets the Victim with a look of bored but to an inquiry. "Yes; there's a notary in the outer room and she inclines her head that way and calls him."

The notary pauses in the discussion of a list of figures he holds before him, looks the Victim over and he will be there in a minute, in a tone which says, "when I get ready," tilts his chair back a little farther and resumes the discussion of his list of figures, leaving the Victim standing in the middle of Number 26, with a lot of male and female clerks in the outer room looking at him with increasing curiosity, suspicion, and hostility.

A minute or so, of this, and the Victim suddenly threads his way back through the labyrinthian alleys, gets down the steep stairs, crosses Broadway to real estate office, finds an open-shop notary, pays him fifty cents and swears.

Back in Room 19.

Adjuster—"Well, I suppose you know what was done?"

Victim—"I know you have failed and are in the hands of a receiver and that I will probably get from 10 per cent down to 50 per cent, or less, of the face of my policy."

"Oh! I do not mean that. I refer to the adjuster's report."

"I don't know what you mean."

"Well, we are scaling all the policies regarding the amount of the loss."

"You can't scale mine."

The Adjuster laid down his pen and pushed his chair back from the table.

"Oh! all right. You are the doctor. That will then."

"You had better tell me just what you mean."

"I am only authorized to adjust your claim at 10 per cent of its face."

"You mean by that that you will cut my claim from $550 to $440, and then when the assets are paid out say 50 per cent, I will get only 50 per cent of $440, or 40 per cent of the face of my claim, that is $220 for $550?"

"That is just what I mean."

"But my property cost twelve times the amount of your policy, and six times the total insurance."

"I don't doubt it. That has nothing to do with it. If your loss were ten times greater it would make no difference. Those are my orders and I can not do otherwise from them one cent."

"That is a steal within a steal, and I won't consent to such an outrage."

"Very well; that is for you to say."

"Who gave you such orders?"

"Those are my instructions."

"Did the court in Chicago make such an order?"

"I don't know."

"Did the receiver make such an order?"

"I don't know."

The Victim rises and goes to the door.

Adjuster—"Say, come back. I might make it 20 per cent."

The Victim—"Good-day."

From Central America.

San Salvador, July 29, 1906.—I beg to enclose herewith check for renewal of my subscription for one year, which I believe becomes due some time in August.

I also beg to congratulate you on having been able to continue publishing your valuable paper, notwithstanding the terrible catastrophe of 18th April last, your first number after that event was the earliest of all the news and best account of same received here.

Yours very truly, W. E. Coldwell.

A BALLAD OF CHINATOWN.

Young Mr. Yan.

From Wallace Irwin's new volume of verse, its contents all redolent or suggestive of that San Francisco quarter, once famous but now obliterated, the following is taken. It is what most of the Chinese are not—true to the transplanted Oriental life.]

Yu can take a Chink away from 'is hop,
'Is lanterns an' gals an' pigs an' chop,
Yu can dress 'im up in yer Christian clo'es,
Put text in 'is head an' hymns in 'is nose,
But yu'll find when he's actin' a dead straight part,
He's a Chinaman still in 'is yeller heart.

Lend me a dime, boss—thank yu kind.
Not for opium, d'yu mind,
But a man must eat. Yes, young Mr. Yan
Was raised by hand on the mission plan—
'Merican talk an' 'Merican dress.
Wore 'em proper? I should say yes.

Yan got anxious to be a toff,
So he took 'is blouse an' 'is pigtail off,
Wore pink cuffs an' purple ties,
English overcoats, gentlemen's size,
Ready-shine shoes like the 'ristocrats,
Auburn gloves an' Panama hats.

Wasn't a dude on the Frisco line
Had pants more creased or a coat more fine.
Often I seen him—whole she-bang—
Struttin' at night through the coolie gang
Where the punk smoke blew from the joss-house nigh
An' the little Chink fiddles squeaked long an' high.

Yan's old man was a Canton Chink;
Stuck to 'is joss like meat an' drink.
Long silk skirt an' little black queue,
He prayed to 'is father—believed it, too—
So he didn't take stock in the mission school
An' spoke of 'is son as a "hip big fool."

Old man Yan kept a lottery-shack—
Restaurant front an' game out back,
Sat at 'is desk an' glared through 'is specs
At the guides an' the tourist rubbernecks,
As proud as a god an' rich as a Jew
(For reasons that him an' the sargent knew.)

The Chiny gals of the felt-shoe sort
Wasn't for young Mr. Yan, the sport.
He ran with a gal named Miss Ah Ti;
Shirt-waist lady with hair fluffed high
An' French-heeled shoes on 'er little feet—
Lived with white folks on Washington Street.

Civilized pair they was an' grand.
She played the pianna to beat the band
While Yan sang "Vilets" an' "Promus Me"
In a chop-suey tenor that reached high Z.
They spoke good English an' grammar, too,
'Most as proper as me an' yu.

Old man Yan when he heard the news,
He jumped plum out of 'is gunboat shoes,
For he'd bought Yan a wife in Chinytown—
Eight hundred dollars—fifty down—
An' a hundred more for a marriage-feast.
It was disappointin' to say the least.

So he sent for 'is offspring after a while
An' yippi-ki-yi-ed in high old style,
But the boy got sassy an' said that they Would skip an' git married in San Jose.
That was the night that the Yups broke out
For the highbinder killin' you read about.

It's a long tale, boss, how the row began
That set 'em to gunnin' for old man Yan.
They'd given the job to a moon-faced boy,
A genius for killin', named Ng Ah Poy,
Who went to the Clay Street lottery-shop
An' found the old gentleman smokin' 'is hop.

'Twas an easy job—jest a single shot
That tumbled the smoker out of 'is cot,
Where dead as a pig on the floor he lay—
Murderer, whisked by 'is friends away,
Sank like the ghost of a pipe-dream, down
Into the cellars of Chinytown.

Young Mr. Yan? When they come an' said
That the shake was up an' 'is dad was dead,
It was easy to see he had clean fergot
'Is ancestor worship an' all that rot—
Sey, how can a Christian un'erstand
When a Chinaman smuggles a gun in 'is hand?

* * * * *
'Twas Waverly Place on a Sunday night.
As I talked with Kelley by yonder light
A bunch of coolies tumbled pellmell
Out of the Wong Fook fan-tan hell,
An' right in their midst came a short-haired swell
With a Christian hat an' a Christian shell.

Somp'n was doin'. The crowd closed thick
As the grip o' death. Then there barked out quick
The forty-eight calibre bang-bang-bang!
And a dead man tumbled out of the gang.
He was a innocent moon-faced boy,
The genius for killin', named Ng Ah Poy.

The watchman's whistle piped over the square—
The cops come lopin' from everywhere;
Chinks began to scatter an' climb
Forty directions at a time,
Into the basements, into doors,
Into the stairways over stores.

Young Mr. Yan with 'is smokin' gun
Led the crowd in the general run.
See that joss-house. Turned up short

Into yon little, black, greasy court,
Where he sunk like the ghost of a pipe-dream, down
Into the cellars of Chinytown.

What has become of young Mr. Yan?
Yu can take a Chink away from 'is fan,
Away from 'is lotteries, fiddles, an' joss,
Yu can give 'is queue to the barber, boss;
But you can't git down to the roots that start
From the yeller base of 'is yeller heart.

A number of subscribers have commented on this paragraph which appeared in the issue of September 8th: "Mails now go in ten days (less) from Liverpool to Hongkong crossing America." By a typographical error the word in parenthesis was omitted. To amplify the information in the two lines, we give the substance of the mail contract just completed, by which ten days are saved in carrying the mails from London to Japan and China via Canada. Under a mail contract just completed with the British Post-office, mails will be carried to Japan and China via Canada in much less time than hitherto, says the Manchester (Eng.) Guardian. As a result of adding two fast new steamers—the Empress of Britain and the Empress of Ireland—to its Atlantic service, the Canadian Pacific Railway will, for the first time, carry mails in its own steamers and trains all the way from Great Britain to Hongkong. The time occupied from London to Hongkong will be 29 1-2 days, to Shanghai 27 1-2 days, and to Yokohama 22 1-2 days. Compared with the company's previous contract, this means a saving of 9 1-2 days to Hongkong, 8 1-2 days to Shanghai, and 8 1-2 days to Yokohama.

Damascus, whose pedigree is the longest of living cities, is losing its character. An enterprising Belgian company is cutting through it with an electric tramway, and is sprinkling electric lights in its ancient streets. What is more, the motive power for these installations is derived from the harnessing of the river falls twenty-two miles off, so that no feature of the modern invasion is spared the place whence the Jew of Tarsus escaped in a basket over the wall. The British acting-consul reports that three and a half miles of the tram-line are already being laid. Meanwhile traffic on the Hejaz railway, which some day may reach Mecca, finds a convenient entrepot in the old-time emporium of the slow-moving caravan.

King Edward's kitchen is finished completely in black oak, which was fitted up by George III at a cost of $50,000. There is also a confectionery room, pastry room and bakehouse besides the kitchen proper. The chef of the royal kitchen receives $3,500 a year, while under him are four master cooks, who in turn have a bevy of servants under them. The strictest economy is observed in the king's kitchen, and what food remains unconsumed is given to the poor, who apply daily at the castle gates.

Paris honors famous literary men by naming streets after them. The death of Henrik Ibsen has started talk of thus commemorating the great Norwegian. A dramatist of the lighter sort declared his readiness to vote for a Rue Henrik Ibsen on condition that there should also be a Rue Bjornstjerne-Bjornson. This, he explained, would not only be homage to the author of "Beyond Human Power," but would be productive of amusing results in the case of cabmen, as no doubt it would.

Public meetings are being held at Manila in keeping with the movement to secure an agricultural bank for the Philippines. A prominent Manila firm state that they hope to secure a minimum capitalization of 20,000,000 pesos. They state that the shortage in the hemp production, upon which the islands are dependent, will create a bad financial condition which a Government agricultural bank would greatly mitigate.

The number of male teachers in the United States is steadily decreasing. Statistics show that while in 1870 the percentage of male teachers was 41 and in 1872 it had increased to 42.8, in 1889-90 it had fallen to 34.5, in 1899-1900 it dropped to 29.9 and in 1903 it reached 25. Of the total number of teachers 113,744 were men and 341,498 women.

Recent experiments by medical experts in Rome have disclosed the fact that the increase in consumption and contagious diseases of a similar character is due to flies, just as the spread of malaria is due to certain kinds of mosquitoes. It is planned to kill flies by means of inoculated diseases, and it has also been suggested that money prizes be given for destroying a certain quantity.

Malaria used to kill 15,000 persons a year in Italy. In 1902 State quinine was introduced, and last year the mortality fell to 7,835.

POLITICO-PERSONAL.

Representative Joseph R. Knowland, of Alameda, has been nominated for re-election to Congress from the Third California District.

This new enthusiasm over Mr. Bryan is just the same as he has always excited—except on election day, remarks the Detroit Free Press.

The Connecticut State Democratic convention nominated Mayor Charles F. Thayer, of Norwich, for Governor, on a platform that made no mention of William J. Bryan.

The Maine election makes certain the continuance of a safe working majority in both branches of the Legislature for the Republicans, and the return of William P. Frye to the United States Senate.

After a warm contest in the Ohio State Republican Convention with Congressman Burton, the leadership of the party remains with Senator Dick. Dick and Foraker in the United States Senate had not entirely agreed with the policy of President Roosevelt on national legislation.

The Democrats of Colorado, after three days of struggle in convention, finally agreed on minor questions and renominated Alva Adams for Governor, a majority claiming that he should be vindicated in his claim that he was robbed of the Governorship two years ago in the Peabody-Adams contest before the State Legislature.

Congressman Theobald Otjen, of Milwaukee, who has held his seat since 1894, has been defeated for re-nomination at the primaries by William J. Cary, a member of the Commercial Telegraphers' Union. It is the first victory for the organized labor movement against objectionable legislators, and it is yet to be ratified at the polls.

Congressman John S. Little, Democratic nominee for Governor of Arkansas, received a majority of 50,000 over John I. Worthington, Republican, at the election September 4. Of the 135 members of the State Senate and House at least 125 will be Democrats. The Democratic State nominees other than for Governor had no opposition.

Senator Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, thinks it would be unwise at this time, when the Congressional campaign is approaching, to inject into the situation anything which would tend to disrupt the party and endanger its success, though at first he was inclined to issue a statement opposing Mr. Bryan's views of government ownership of the railroads. Democratic leaders, however, reserve the right to "trim" Mr. Bryan at a later date.

In Wisconsin Governor James O. Davidson has been nominated to head the Republican State ticket, having defeated Speaker Irvin L. Lenroot, of the last Assembly, his only opponent, by a majority that approaches 20,000. Davidson won the nomination in spite of the fact that United States Senator La Follette canvassed the State for Lenroot. It was the direct primary. Yet La Follette was believed to be an invincible boss.

Mr. Bryan claims that President Roosevelt has appropriated his political clothes, while some newspapers say that Mr. Bryan has taken Mr. Hearst's clothes by advocating Government ownership of railroads, observes a correspondent of the New York World. Recently Mr. Jerome insisted that Mr. Hearst had stolen his political clothes from him. Theoretically then Mr. Roosevelt has one political suit too much and Mr. Jerome has none at all.

The offer of W. R. Hearst to supply the New York election officials with new ballot boxes, in order to preserve those containing the ballots voted at the last election in New York City, has been rejected by the Corporation Counsel, acting for Mayor McClellan, and the Board of Elections. Instead, the Corporation Counsel has informed Mr. Hearst's counsel that an appeal would be taken to the Appellate Division from Justice Maclean's decision, refusing to permit the destruction of the ballots.

In his fight against the Republican railroad machine in New Hampshire, Winston Churchill, the novelist, has really started a formidable revolt, says the New York World. In the caucuses at Concord, the State capital, to elect delegates to the State convention which will nominate a candidate for Governor, his supporters in one city ward defeated United States Senator Gallinger, Chairman of the Republican State Committee; Samuel C. Eastman, who was slated to preside at the State Convention; James O. Lyford, naval officer at the port of Boston, slated to be Chairman of the Committee on Resolutions; Frank S. Streeter, counsel for the Boston and Maine Railroad and member of the Republican National Committee, and other prominent State politicians. It was a big killing for a beginner. Senator Gallinger's scalp alone would have been a big prize.

THE WIDOW'S DECISION.

A Vision of Paradise.

I was in Paradise, at the railway station. Trains were going in and out; the cars started empty, and came back more or less well filled.

St. Thomas was the station-master. I chatted with him, and he very civilly explained the working of the system.

"The trains," said he, "start from the Earth, touch at Hell, touch at Purgatory, and have their terminus in Paradise. We are very crowded just at present. For the last few months there has been a constant increase in the number of passengers for Paradise; every day there is a demand for more cars. Smallpox has something to do with it, but the revival of faith has more. You can judge for yourself. Ah, seventeen. The express is due. Yes, we have a fast express that comes right through from the earth. Do you hear the whistle? I want you to observe the incoming train. You see we have three classes of cars, first, second, and third; a baggage car and a compartment for dogs. The passengers are alighting; watch them. Not many people in the second-class cars; we don't recruit much from the lower middle-class—they are restless, voltairean and free-thinking, the lower middle-class. In the third-class cars we get crowds. The populace is wholly bad or wholly good; but, generally speaking, good. The first-class cars are crowded, too. Rich people are admirably facilitated for achieving salvation. Their time is their own, and even admitting that they give Satan the best part of their existence, they always find an hour here and there, from time to time, to make up their religious negligences. God is not so severe as He is supposed to be. He is satisfied with very little, do you know? Only stay here two or three days, you will see half a hundred trains come in, and there can not fail to be people that you knew in some of them. You'll see how easy it is to win Heaven."

St. Thomas is a communicative saint. He chattered away, but for the last few moments of his discourse I was not listening. I had seen the face of that twice widowed little beauty, Jeanne, Countess de Charmelieu, first my friend Gaston's wife, then my friend Armand's wife. I had seen her united to Armand at St. Clotilde's Church, and I remembered hearing the priest say: "Therefore be united on earth until you are eternally united in heaven." And here I saw her at the window of a parlor car; then, light and dashing, she sprang out of the car, showing her ankles a little, but then they were very trim ankles. She ran about in every direction, chirping, "Where's Paradise? Where is it? I have my ticket."

St. Peter went to her, and said:

"Your ticket, madame? Will you be kind enough to show me your ticket?"

"Here it is, sir."

"Perfectly correct; you may go in. Here are the gates of Paradise."

My little friend bowed prettily, and went in. An intense desire possessed me to follow her into Paradise. Who could tell? Perhaps Armand was dead, and my widow would find herself confronted by two husbands. I asked St. Thomas if he could manage it so that I might go in.

"Easily," he replied.

"Only for an hour, you know," I hastened to add. "But—shall I be able to go away again? For you know, however delightful Paradise may be, if I have a few more good years to spend on earth I don't care to miss them. Life is only for a time, and Paradise is for all eternity."

"Don't be afraid. They'll let you out. Come with me." And he led me to St. Peter. "Make a note of this gentleman," he said to him. "He is a visitor—he only wishes to go in and look about and come out again."

"Pass in, sir; pass in. I shall know you again."

There I was in Paradise, and in the nick of time. Armand and Gaston, who had been scanning the passengers as they arrived, had already rushed to their wife. Gaston had taken her right hand, and drew her on that side, saying:

"Jeanne, my dear Jeanne!"

Armand had taken her left hand, and drew her on that side, saying:

"Maud, my dear Maud!"

She had two Christian names, and it had seemed in better taste to her, in the intimacy of married life with her second husband, not to be called by the same name the first had made use of. She was an adorable being, replete with delicacy of feeling. Armand and Gaston meantime showed no intention of giving up.

"Jeanne!"

"Maud!"

"I am your first husband!"

"I am your second husband!"

"My rights are incontestable!"

"Sir, release this lady!"

"I have nothing to say to you, sir. I do not know you!"

He didn't know him! Why, they were intimate friends on earth, when they were alive, called each other by their first names, couldn't live without each other. Armand, the second husband, almost lived at Gaston's house, so much that gossip said—but where should we all be if what gossips say were believed!

The quarrel, meantime, was waxing hot between Armand and Gaston. Their voices rose. Existence is sweet in Heaven, but slightly monotonous; so the smallest event attracts as much attention as a runaway in a country town. The blessed came trooping up from every direction. Some took sides with the first husband, some with the second. Jeanne remained passive; she had freed her hands, and said nothing to either Armand or Gaston.

St. Thomas had come within the gates of Paradise when I did.

"This must often occur," I said to him. "A great many women on earth have two husbands."

"Very true, the novelty is that the husbands should claim their wife. Generally, under these circumstances, each husband tries to shove her off on the other."

"How is it when things are reversed, and there are two wives to a husband?"

"Oh, then it's very different; the women always quarrel as to which shall keep the husband. Women are wild to be married, even in Heaven."

Right here St. Thomas was interrupted by a loud cry that arose from the ranks of the blessed:

"St. Joseph! St. Joseph!"

It was in fact St. Joseph. He had been attracted by the noise and came that way.

St. Joseph was entirely the St. Joseph of the Italian school—brown drapery, gray hair and beard, a staff in his hand, and sandals on his feet, plus a very imposing aureole, and an air of prosperous, upper middle-class benevolence.

He paused, asked what was the matter, and was told how things stood.

"Well," said St. Joseph, "it seems simple enough. The lady is here as a recompense for her religious conduct and Christian feeling. She has a right to happiness of the most peaceful character and largest scope. Let her pronounce, and choose between these gentlemen."

"But," said Gaston, "what is reserved for the one who comes in a bad second?"

Gaston ran a racing stable during his earthly pilgrimage, and his abominable slang slipped out even in the presence of St. Joseph.

"Never fear," said St. Joseph, "I will give to him who is not chosen one of the unclaimed ladies who literally swarm in Paradise. Do not let us lose time, madame. Make your decision. Choose, if you please."

Silent and motionless, Jeanne stood between her two husbands, and both Gaston and Armand alternated like characters in a Greek play, seeking the words that might touch their wife's heart.

"I was so proud of your beauty, Jeanne," said Gaston, "and of the sensation it made in society. Luxury for you was what I lived for. Your diamonds and lace, your carriages, your horses, your liveries. And then your room, Jeanne, your cherry satin room! And then boxes, boxes for all the first nights. Three hundred francs I paid for one first night."

"Boxes!" broke in Armand. "He talks of boxes! Even before I was the husband I always paid for the boxes. The first night of the 'Petit Faust' cost me four hundred francs, and I gave five hundred for Patti's benefit."

"You pay!" cried Gaston. "Why, you dined at my table, sir, five days in the week, and you were always loafing in our box at the opera, you who make such an ado about three or four wretched theatre boxes sent to my wife."

"Two or three! Upon my word, such details are too petty."

"I quite agree with you," said St. Joseph, looking bored, and rearranging his aureole. "Be as brief as possible, if you please, gentlemen. Kindly express yourself in favor of one or the other, madame."

Jeanne would not speak, and the two husbands raved on.

"Remember, I gave up my career for you," said Gaston. "I resigned from the army because you didn't like living in a garrison."

"And I joined the Imperialists for you!" cried Armand.

"No politics!" said St. Joseph firmly. "Above all, nothing derogatory to sovereigns!"

"I shall obey you," said Gaston. "I have stronger claims than mere political affiliations. Our love, Jeanne! Remember! I was the first, the first! Our walks on your father's estate. Those shady little paths, when your head sometimes lay on my shoulder; our wedding day, when we came to my home, our home, at midnight, that bitter cold weather. The ground white with snow, do you remember? What a big fire there was at the chateau to welcome us! still the room was, how frightened we both were!"

"Sir," interrupted Armand, "your reminiscence in execrable taste."

"Very possibly, sir, but I may certainly be allowed to recall my confidence. My confidence was unbounded. How many of my friends came to perfidiously to say: 'Keep an eye on Armand,' me this gentleman. 'He is very fond of you, we all that, but there's somebody he's fonder of, and your wife.' I disdained their gossip."

"I have my own record on the ground of confidence," said Armand, proudly. "Later, sir, when my turn I was the husband, little calumnies were but about. It was Monsieur de Sericourt, that they to to watch, Sericourt, my best friend—how ridiculous!"

I observed that Jeanne could not control a little when she heard the name of Monsieur de Sericourt observed it, but Armand observed nothing, and

And when Sericourt was killed in Mexico, and my dear wife, permitted the unchecked outburst of natural grief, I received an odious anonymous 'Your wife,' it said, 'sheds more tears for the than she will ever give the husband.' I never

TEST PLAYS OF JONES AND PINERO.

Flaneur Describes Features of the New Theatrical Season in New York.

Comparison of the ability and the limitations, the merits and the demerits, of two great English playwrights is inevitable at this time. Henry Arthur Jones had first opportunity to gain the ear of the New York public, but it may not have been an advantage. The "Hypocrites" was produced at the Hudson Theatre at the opening of the season and "His House in Order" at the Empire Theatre only five days later. Pinero's play was, perhaps, more loudly heralded, and had a more personal interest in the fact that it presented in a leading role that distinctive, finished, and always popular if not great American actor, John Drew. Since both plays have been seen and discussed, it is easy to be discerned that the later offering has the greater share of attention, especially of those who talk of theatrical attractions.

The "Hypocrites," is, notwithstanding, the greatest of Henry Arthur Jones's serious dramatic efforts. It is a strong meat play. It bares for ridicule and contempt the weaknesses, the vulgarity, the pretense of good morals, the hidden enjoyment of dubious practices openly denounced, that the author ascribes to middle-class English respectability. There is some force in the suggestion that the dramatist brought his play to America for its initial production simply because he thought it would be better received out of England. Human nature enjoys the spectacle of punishment, or bear-baiting, when the punishment is for another class, the bear-baiting in another's garden with unfamiliar bears. The story of the "Hypocrites" is a purposeful one, its motive is clear, its conclusion is enforced. Leslie Faber and Doris Keane are the favorites in a thoroughly capable cast.

"His House in Order" has all of Arthur Wing Pinero's best qualities, though it is not above criticism. Its technique and literary finish it far surpasses the work of its brother author. Its characters are more universal, its plot so real or consistent. Its situations are theatrically strong, but not so logical. In fact, Pinero wins by daring and force, where less showy methods would permit cool consideration to expose a false conclusion.

The story of this latest, and undoubtedly one of the greatest of the Pinero plays, is not a nice one, but it is cleverly managed. The second wife of a curious specimen of Parliamentary English mediocrity is shown surrounded by the surviving members—father, mother, sister and brother—of the family of the first wife, still inmates of her husband's house. The family-in-law are all that can be imagined in the way of petty, jealous, nagging traits. The husband, still strangely wrapped up in the memory of the departed, in spite of his second matrimonial choice, fails to resent or even to realize the torture inflicted on his wife. An accident places in his wife's hands incontestable proofs of a scandal involving her predecessor, a scandal so grave, in fact, that the supposed son of her husband is shown to belong to another man. With these weapons in her hands the suffering woman proposes to drive away her enemies, but is rebuffed out of her purpose by her husband's brother, a boasting talker but an inconsistent performer. At the last, however, he produces the letters, confounds the husband, and blows up the nest of the merciless parasites.

When the play was produced in London last season, George Alexander and Irene Vanbrugh had the leading parts—the husband's brother and the wife—and here John Drew and Margaret Illington assume the roles. It is a disparagement of John Drew's art to say that Miss Illington is the central figure; the situations place the compelling interest in her, but Mr. Drew proves his ability to make the most of his opportunities, which are not good until the play has nearly reached its first real climax. The first two acts are comparatively passionless, but the third and fourth make amends. There are strong scenes then, for the thrills begin with the wife's discovery and her sudden command to the boy—"Let me have a look at you!" Throughout, the cast is worthy of the principals.

Both the English plays are already established successes. More than that, the season has opened with more successful plays by far than any previous autumn for a decade has known. Rose Stahl, whom you have seen in San Francisco in a playlet on the vaudeville stage, has won star honors on Broadway in a play, "The Chorus Lady," built on the lines of her former sketch. Her first great success was in London in the playlet, although she has done serious work in this country, following Mary Mannering in the title-role of "Janice Meredith." William H. Crane is doing only fairly well in Mr. Sutro's "The Price of Money." Helen Healy, a winsome singer and dancer, is the chief attraction of "The Man from Now," the musical farce written by John Kendrick Bangs, with songs by Vincent Brown, in which Harry Bulger is the star. Mr. Bulger's comedies are still familiar. "The Judge and the Jury," advertised in advance as "The American Play," and written by Harry D. Cottrell and Oliver Morosco, though produced at Wallack's Theatre was a cheap melodrama. But Belasco's two record-breaking attractions continue as in former seasons—Blanche Bates in "The Girl of the Golden West," and, at the Bijou, David Warfield in "The Music Master." The latter is nearing his six-hundredth performance and its departure for other cities.

New York, September 11, 1906.

Since more and more American tourists visit Spain each year, the news that the Alhambra, the Mecca of all pilgrims to that country, is in greater danger of total destruction than ever before will arouse interest. The Government contributes $10,000 a year for its preservation, but that sum has proved quite inadequate for present urgent needs. That the Alhambra has survived to this day is in itself a marvel. During its five centuries of existence it has been subjected to severe trials. Shattered, at one time, by an explosion, and shaken by earthquakes, it has at other times sunk so low as to be a habitation of smugglers, and even a stable for French army horses. The present danger lies in the fact that the foundations are being undermined by water from the old ruined conduits. The Government appropriations are insufficient to meet this condition, and a quarrel among the directors has resulted in the resignation, after thirty-five years of service of that eminent expert in Oriental architecture, Senor Contreras. He has restored many of the tiles, as well as the figures and colors and the other mural decorations, thus giving a fair idea of what the Moorish palace was in the days of its glory.

Mr. Asquith estimated Great Britain's revenue from death duties this year at $68,500,000. But millionaires have died one after the other, and although only one-third of the fiscal year has passed, Mr. Asquith is already over $10,000 ahead of his schedule. One of the millionaires who died recently was Sir Charles Tennant. Mr. Asquith married his daughter, and so the curious spectacle is afforded of the chancellor's death harvest including over $1,500,000 taken from his father-in-law to help along his budget. The death duties on Alfred Beit's estate were $5,000,000. The estate of George Smith of Chicago and Scotland, who died some years ago, yielded in duties $4,500,000. Other estates which have paid huge sums within the last few weeks are those of the Earl of Ilchester, Lord Masham, the inventor of textile processes and machinery; John Goddard, a retired provision dealer; Mr. Steinkopf, founder of a table water and owner of the old St. James Gazette.

Excavations of the ancient city of Gezer, mentioned in early sacred history, carried on by members of the Palestine Exploration Fund for the past three years, have developed numerous "finds," according to advices from Jerusalem published in the Biblical World. Eight cities have been found, superimposed upon each other, on the site of the old defense to the western road to Jerusalem from the foundations. The culture, history, religion and customs from as far back as 500 B. C. have been revealed by architecture, jugs, weapons, masonry, etc. Dr. E. W. G. Masterman, a member of the excavating party, writes as follows: "The earliest inhabitants lived in caves and made all their weapons and instruments of flint. In the middle period bronze is the only metal known, while at a time roughly synchronous with the coming of Israel iron appears and gradually replaces bronze."

Because the postal administration has imposed a duty of five pfennigs instead of two on postal cards intended for urban delivery, the citizens of Hanover have inaugurated a singular strike against the postal authorities. Instead of writing postal cards, they all write letters, and, not satisfied with sending their effusions in an envelope, they fill it with newspaper so as to bring the weight of the letter to the maximum of 250 grammes. As the envelopes they now use are of the maximum size tolerated of 15 by 25 centimetres, it is easy to obstruct a letter-box with only a dozen of such missives. The postal authorities are alarmed at this obstruction of the postal service, and it is probable that the former tariff of two pfennigs on postal cards will have to be re-established.

Parisian life seems to agree with Parisians. The latest figures show in the city 10,509 octogenarians, and 620 nonagenarians, of whom 89 are nearly 100. Six are over 102 years of age.

The largest topaz in the world, now in the Vatican at Rome, weighs seven pounds, and has carvings upon it that occupied three Neapolitan lapidaries 61 years.

Leadene tobacco boxes are apt to cause lead colic and paralysis, the metal impregnating the tobacco with acetate of lead.

ALFRED BEIT, DIAMOND MAGNATE.

Many-Sided as the Polished Gems from the Mines He Controlled.

London continues to tell good stories illustrating the many-sidedness of the late Alfred Beit, the South African diamond magnate. He was as generous as Russell Sage was penurious, and the extent of his charities will never be known. His hand was ever in his pocket. It is said that his gifts averaged more than $1,500,000 yearly. A leading writer remarks that only his personal friends knew the man.

His tastes were scientific, antiquarian, and artistic. In his Park-lane house in London he had several very fine old masters, notably Murillos, Rembrandts, and Rubens. He was a discriminating buyer, not prone to be deceived, but prompt to conclude a purchase if he were really bent upon it. As an instance in point, he went to stay with an Australian financier in Hertfordshire for the week-end. The house and grounds pleased him. After dinner he asked his host whether he cared to sell. "Yes," he was told, "at a price." "I want the place as it stands—furniture, servants, horses, and all," said Mr. Beit. A bargain was struck on the spot, the host only insisting on taking away his wife's portrait. Two days later Mr. Beit entered into possession.

Mr. Beit was at least once fascinated by the trooper's life. It was during Lord Randolph Churchill's visit to South Africa in 1891, when the camp fires were lit, and every one made merry with song and dance and champagne suppers. Mr. Beit was there, and resolved one night to enlist as a trooper on the morrow!

"What's the use of being a millionaire?" he exclaimed. "Nothing! A trooper's life for me! No cares, no troubles! All the world before you, and no worry from morning till night! A millionaire—suspect all the day long! I shall enlist to-morrow." But morning brought other reflections, and Mr. Beit did not become a trooper.

Now and then Mr. Beit did something to amaze the diamond trade—but not the public—an example being the occasion on which he had a pure white 428 1-2 carat rough diamond cut to a 228 1-2 finished stone and exhibited in a little shop window in the Rue de la Paix, Paris, the luxury capital of the world, as "a sample of our goods."

A story which Mr. Rhodes used to tell illustrates the financier's marvellous memory. Late one night in Kimberley, Mr. Rhodes, Mr. Beit, and some others had an important business transaction together, and an agreement was signed, of which Mr. Rhodes took possession. The next morning Mr. Rhodes failed to remember where he had put the document. Active search was made without its being discovered.

"Go and ask Alfred," said Mr. Rhodes, "he'll remember where I put it."

Mr. Beit was duly awakened. Turning round sleepily in his bed, he said: "It is in his left-hand waistcoat pocket. He took his waistcoat off because he felt too hot, and threw it under the sofa." The waistcoat was found; there, in the left-hand pocket, was the missing document.

His devotion to his old mother was a noteworthy trait. "You can't offer Jameson anything," Cecil Rhodes used to say, "and as for Beit, all he wants in this world is a thousand a year for his mother."

Mr. Beit had the highest regard for the business and technical genius of the American nation, and wherever he acquired new interests he passed by men of his own and his adopted nation, German and English, and obtained Americans. Wherever Mr. Beit's enterprises were found, in South Africa, South America, Australia, Korea, Siberia or elsewhere, the man in charge of the work was an American engineer.

In manner Mr. Beit was quiet, courteous and unassuming. No hint of the financial genius which he possessed was obtainable from a casual contact with him, and his personality was extremely deceptive. A summary of the way Billionaire Beit impressed those who met him casually for the first time is contained in a letter a military authority who came across him in South Africa a few years ago wrote home. "That he is a millionaire and a great financier I am informed on good authority and take for granted," wrote the army man. "Had I been in ignorance of his identity I should have taken him for a nonentity, and certainly not have given him the credit for being either millionaire or financier. He is a most unassuming and unostentatious man of wealth and as kindly, quiet and courteous as it is possible to be. Very ordinary and meagre in his ideas and commonplace in his conversation, he is one of the last men I should have picked out of a crowd as able and capable."

INVALIDISM AND WORK.

Philosophers, Poets, and Historians who Triumphed over Illness.

Dr. Johnson averred that every sick man is a rascal—a master of subterfuge, a cunning seeker for sympathy, a self-centered egotist, too lazy to call to his aid that determination and will-power that is often seen to have a healing influence as great as that of the ablest physician. It has been estimated that not less than one-tenth of the total population is afflicted by ills which greatly hamper the work of life, and many of these delicate men and women by refusing extreme submission to their ailments have to their credit astonishing tasks successfully performed.

Sophia P. Shaler, in "The Masters of Fate," has chronicled the achievements of scores of noted persons who have contributed to the world's poetry, art, philosophy, and science, in spite of grievous physical difficulties. Mrs. Shaler's book is an inspiring record of the magnificent courage of invalid heroes like Green, the English historian, who could with reason sign himself, "Faithfully (feebly, weakly, dizzily, mopily, faintly, dreamily, dully), J. R. Green," or that amiable sick man, Robert Louis Stevenson, who wrote, "I am about knocked out of time now; a miserable, snuffling, shivering, fever-stricken, nightmare-ridden, knee-jottering, hoast-hoast-hoasting shadow and remains of a man." "But," continues Stevenson, "the medicine bottles on my chimney and the blood on my handkerchief are accidents. They do not color my view of life."

It was an octogenarian United States Senator who, when asked for rules for longevity, replied: "Acquire a chronic ailment in youth, and nurse yourself through life—and work." Kant furnishes a lesson of this kind; although the great metaphysician was never entirely well, he performed a prodigious amount of intellectual work, and lived to be eighty years of age:

He obtained such control over his discomfort that when suffering from a pain in his head he could concentrate his mind so perfectly on a chosen subject that the pain was treated as if it did not exist. By sheer force of will he would also overcome sleeplessness caused by rheumatic attacks. "That these," he says, "were not imaginary pains was proved by the glowing redness which was seen the next morning on the toes of my left foot."

The pitiful account which Johnson gives of Pope's physical condition rests upon the authority of an old servant of Lord Oxford's who knew him after middle age:

"He was then so weak as to stand in perpetual need of attendance; he was extremely sensitive to cold, so that he wore a kind of fur doublet under a shirt of coarse, warm linen with fine sleeves. When he arose he was invested in bodices made of stiff canvass, being scarcely able to hold himself erect till they were laced, and then he put on a flannel waistcoat. One side of his body was contracted; his legs were so slender that he enlarged their bulk with two pairs of stockings."

All the testimony goes to show that he was a deformed and a hopeless invalid, that his mind was brilliant, his energy inexhaustible, and his will strong. Never, perhaps, was there united in one person talents so great and a capacity for drudgery so enormous. The Catholic religion which Pope professed deprived him of the public school and university training; it also cut him off from politics, from the bar and the pulpit. To the calling of literature, the only one left to him, he brought talent, ambition, and untiring industry. These powers, marshaled by the valiant spirit which animated his poor little frame, enabled him to become, while still a young man, the acknowledged head of English literature.

The author of the great "Principia" was diminutive and delicate if not an invalid:

Sir Isaac Newton once told Mr. Conduitt that he had often heard his mother say that when he was born he was so little that they might have put him in a quart cup. No one believed it possible for him to live. "But," says his biographer, "the frail tenement which seemed scarcely able to imprison its immortal mind was destined to enjoy a vigorous maturity." Newton lived to be eighty-five years of age.

Great soldiers have been accompanied by threatening afflictions they could neither overcome nor avoid:

Some of the world's foremost commanders—Julius Caesar, Napoleon, the Duke of Wellington, and Archduke Charles of Austria—appear to have been epileptics. At the battle of Wagram the archduke, it is said, had a seizure, which lasted about an hour; it was then that Napoleon gained the ascendancy. At the critical moment the fate of two great armies was in the hands of two epileptics. Cambyes, the conqueror of Egypt, Alfred the Great, and two of the greatest poets of Europe—Tasso and Byron—were subject to this disease, as was also the prophet Mahomet.

Pasteur, discoverer of the microbes of disease and corruption, was in the midst of his investigations which were to result so beneficially for mankind, when he was stricken with apoplexy:

After the stroke which threatened to leave the experimenter forever outside the door of his workshop, for twenty-seven years, under the discouragement of uncertain powers, Pasteur had labored, and during that time achieved perhaps his most important contributions to science.

In the case of Gray, the poet, the element of heroic fight, so conspicuous in the lives of other great invalids, was apparently wanting:

Although the author of the "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard," "The Pindaric Odes," "The Progress of Poetry," "The Bard," etc., only lived to be fifty-five years of age, the span of his life was longer than might have been expected from his delicate constitution. His frequent illnesses, which interrupted his work and compelled him to seek diversion in travel, were due to hereditary gout; this disease finally reached the digestive organs and produced what might be called nervous dyspepsia, ending in violent convulsions.

But whatever may have been the obstacle to Gray's productiveness, there was none to his power of acquisition:

It was conceded that he was, perhaps, the most learned man in Europe. He knew every branch of history, both natural and civil. Criticism, metaphysics, morals, and politics were his studies, voyages and travels of all sorts his amusements; he had a fine taste in painting, prints, architecture, and gardening; was a good botanist, entomologist, and zoologist; made researches in heraldry; was a fair musician; and was among "the first to discover the beauties of Nature in England, marking out the course of every picturesque journey that can be made in it."

Whatever defects may be laid at the door of Heine, the German poet, he can not be accused of self-repression or of encouraging low spirits in himself or others:

When it came to the worst, and the uninterrupted attacks of illness were prolonged to a twelve years' martyrdom, during eight of which he lay with spinal paralysis a prisoner to his bed, he showed heroic qualities, often those of the stoic, who, lacking faith in the gods and without enthusiasm, played his part as an artist. Heine was gifted with an indestructible delight in life. In one of his letters he says: "I am as sick as a dog and fight against sorrow and death like a cat; cats, however, have a tough life of it." At first he traveled in pursuit of health and consulted many doctors, hoping to find the skill which should loose him from the cold, valetudinarian role so repugnant to him. In his house of martyrdom, or rather it were better to say his house of discipline, he exhibited an almost preternatural activity of spirit—no degree of bodily suffering could quench his creative power; he jested and wrote to the last. During the time of his greatest affliction he published "New Poems," "Germany," "Atta Troll," three volumes of "Miscellaneous Writings," which contained his confessions, and also the "Romances." "These, composed in the terrible conditions to which he was reduced, must be reckoned," says his biographer, "among the greatest spiritual marvels of literary history."

Surely the immortal mind was never stronger in him than when from his "mattress grave," where he lay half-blind and paralyzed, his unconquered spirit sent forth this message, matchless in its pathos and irony:

"What avails it me that enthusiastic youths and maidens crown my marble bust with marble laurel, when the withered hands of an aged nurse are pressing a poultice of Spanish flies behind my ears? What avails it me that all the roses of Shiraz glow and waft incense for me? Alas! Shiraz is two thousand miles from the Rue de l'Amsterdam, where in the wearisome loneliness of my sick room I get no scent, except it be perhaps, the perfume of warmed towels. Alas! God's satire weighs heavy on me. The Great Author of the Universe, the Aristophanes of Heaven, was bent on demonstrating with crushing force to me, the little, earthly German Aristophanes, how my wittiest sarcasms were only pitiful attempts at jesting in comparison with his and how miserably I am beneath him in humor, in colossal mockery!"

A shining example of the power of an obdurate will to triumph over distressing sensation is found in the life of Charles Darwin:

For nearly forty years, the naturalist, characterized by Huxley as one of the most exact of observers, most cautious of reasoners, and most candid of expositors of this or any other age, never knew one day of the health of ordinary men, and thus his life was a long struggle against the weariness and strain of sickness. Yet he bore his ill health with such uncomplaining patience that even his children hardly realized the extent of his suffering; his wife, perhaps, was the only person who had any adequate conception of what he endured. It was owing to her constant care in shielding him from annoyance, and in leaving nothing undone that might alleviate the discomforts of his ill health, that it was possible for him to produce, besides his other great works, the "Origin of Species," designated by one of authority as "the most potent instrument for the extension of the realm of natural knowledge since the publication of Newton's 'Principia.'"

Robert Louis Stevenson, even from his boyhood, never knew the joy of a body free of ailments:

The life of a chronic invalid that Stevenson was compelled to lead was irksome to him above other men, for action was the breath of his nostrils. "Action over every obstacle," was a favorite maxim of his. A great part of his time he spent in bed, and for whole weeks together he was obliged to carry on conversation with his family and friends in whispers, as well as with the help of pencil and paper. Yet there is ample testimony that even under these circumstances his patience and sweetness were invincible, and his industry such that he seized and made the most of every day and hour of respite, contriving in this fashion to produce work surprisingly uniform in quality and quantity. During the three years he spent at Bournemouth, although so far as his health was concerned the worst and most trying of his life, in point of work they were the most active and successful.

It is not often that the sick man himself, except by example, is able to supply courage to others; but even this Stevenson succeeded in doing. He writes: My doctor took a desponding fit about me and scared Fanny into blue fits, but I have talked her over again." One of the most dismal pictures of his condition is contained in the following extract: "I am too blind to read, hence no reading; I am too weak to walk, hence no walking; I am not allowed to speak, hence no talking; but the great simplification has yet to be named; for if this goes on, I shall soon have nothing to eat—and hence—O hallelujah! hence no eating." Again he writes: "I had a very violent and dangerous hemorrhage last spring. I am almost glad to have seen death so close with all my wits about me, and not in the customary lassitude and disenchantment of disease. Even thus clearly beheld I find him not so terrible as we suppose."

The charming ease and vivacity of John Richard Green's style cloaks the research and indefatigable industry of the laborious student. His story is that of a brave man's struggle to do his work to the last, carried on with unsurpassed gallantry against agonizing difficulties:

Towards the end Green's work was done with great effort. For many weeks he could not sit up or take solid food. He was unable to hold a pen, or even to make pencil corrections on a proof. At intervals he could dictate for a short time, or go through references with his wife's help. Much of "The Making of England" was wholly rewritten four times. This extraordinary achievement tried his strength to the utmost; but it was no sooner published than he began to work upon the "Conquest of England." The historian's idea of a good literary style was the same as David's idea of a procession: "The singers go before, the minstrels follow after; in the midst are the damsels playing on the timbrels."

It is asserted that Green's force of will and enthusiasm for his work kept him alive for two years longer than any doctor would have thought possible. He told his wife that what kept him alive was dread of separation from her.

The last chapter of Mrs. Shaler's book is as interesting as those that precede it, and even more pathetic. When the work was planned, its cheering purpose first outlined, Nathaniel S. Shaler, for forty-three years lecturer on geology at Harvard, was a notable example of invalidism and energy. Before the volume came from the press Mr. Shaler's life-work was finished. Mrs. Shaler then added a brief tribute to her husband's memory and his life-long triumph over physical ills.

"The Masters of Fate" will commend itself to all who have an admiration for true courage, and especially to those who fight real ills and morbid influences.

All classes are affected by the new interstate commerce law, which provides that no railroad may give free transportation or reduced rates. While the law does not apply directly to travel within a State, it applies to local movements in the Territories as well as to journeys across State lines, and Arizona and New Mexico are noted as divisions in which the new rule will be enforced without distinction. Ministers' wives and families, colony promoters, United States army officers and their families, theatrical people, professors and school teachers are alike cut off from privileges formerly enjoyed. Heavy penalties are prescribed for violations of the law.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Thomas W. Lawson, of Boston, has abandoned business completely since the death of his wife, and has remained in strict seclusion at his country home, Dreamwold, in Scituate, more than a month.

Raphael Merry Del Val, secretary of state of the Vatican, was a distinguished theologian, student and linguist when that position was conferred upon him at the age of 38. His father was a Spanish diplomat.

Pope Pius X has appointed John J. McGrane, who is a diamond merchant in Maiden Lane, New York City, a knight of St. Gregory in acknowledgment of his services as conductor of the American pilgrimage to Rome. The conferring of this order of knighthood upon Mr. McGrane by the Pope is regarded as a mark of the most signal honor that can be granted a layman of the Roman Catholic Church.

Lord Curzon's loss of health, the result of his long and arduous labors in India, and the shock of the recent death of his wife, has induced his physicians to urge him to travel in order to obtain change of scene. It is understood that he will go to Canada for a long stay. He also intends to visit the headquarters of the American missions that did good work during the holague and famine in India and Arabia.

The new commander-in-chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, General Robert B. Brown, is a native of Ohio, and is sixty-one years old. He remained in the service for more than four years and received a medal of honor for distinguished and meritorious service. General Brown was the founder of the Ohio Soldiers' and Sailors' Home at Sandusky. For twenty years he has been the managing editor of the Zanesville Courier.

Jameson, who led the famous raid into the Transvaal, receives $125,000 from the estate of the late Alfred Beit, the South African millionaire. While those with whom he was associated were piling up huge fortunes he made practically nothing. Perhaps it was this absolute contempt for money which earned for him the devotion and confidence of Cecil Rhodes. It has just been brought to light that Jameson for years carried in his pocket Mr. Rhodes' power of attorney.

It has been widely reported that Andrew Carnegie's little daughter, Margaret, is suffering from dislocation of the hip from which she may never recover. A correspondent of the New York World recently visited the family and cables from Durnoch, Scotland, a denial of the report. He says that the child had "suffered from a sprained ankle, but now walks about the gardens." Mr. and Mrs. Carnegie are happy over her recovery. There is no disease of any kind and her ankle is improving steadily.

Francis Xavier Wernz, a German, on September 8, in Rome, was elected general of the Society of the Congregation of the Company of Jesus (the long and not generally used name of the Jesuit order), in succession to the late Father Martin, who died last May. Father Wernz was born at Rothwell, Wurtemberg, in 1842, and at the age of fifteen years entered the society of which he is now the chosen head. He was appointed professor in the Gregorian University in 1883, and has been rector of the University since 1894.

The great land holdings of Gen. Louis Terrazas, of Chihuahua, were mentioned in this column two weeks ago, but his 17,000,000 acres, though the largest, is not the only vast possession of Mexican soil. Among the Americans who have large ranches are Fleming & Ross, the Riverside Cattle Company, with 2,000,000 acres and a fine herd of Herefords. Phoebe Hearst, of California, has a magnificent place west of Minaca; the Millers and the three Mormon colonies control many thousand acres. Gordon, Ironsides & Ferriss, a Canadian company, have 1,000,000 acres; Lord Beresford, a relative of the Admiral, has a large ranch where he raises fine horses.

Two conspicuous men, one in England and the other in the United States—bear the same name—Winston Churchill. The Englishman is the most striking and picturesque figure in the Liberal party and a potential premier. In age the two are almost on an equality—the American Winston being thirty-five, his English namesake thirty-two. Both were war correspondents in Cuba, on opposite sides, in the Spanish war. Both were educated for the profession of warfare, the one at Sandhurst and the other at Annapolis. The Englishman's full name is Winston Leonard Spencer Churchill. In spite of their bearing the same Christian name and surname, the two Churchills are not related.

Major Carroll A. Devol, who has been in charge of the army transport service at San Francisco for nearly five years, has been ordered to Washington, and says: "I am very sorry to leave this coast. I like the detail here—I like the people of San Francisco, and I like the Coast in every way. I think this is the greatest army post in the Union. I am deeply attached to it."

The Swallow Song.

"O Swallow, Swallow, flying, flying South,
Fly to her, and fall upon her gilded eaves,
And tell her, tell her what I tell to thee.

"O tell her, Swallow, that thou knowest each,
That bright and fierce and fickle is the South,
And dark and true and tender is the North.

"O Swallow, Swallow, if I could follow and light
Upon her lattice, I would pipe and trill,
And cheep and twitter twenty million loves.

"O were I thou that she might take me in,
And lay me on her bosom, and her heart
Would rock the snowy cradle till I died.

"Why lingereth she to clothe her heart with love,
Delaying as the tender ash delays
To clothe herself, when all the woods are green?

"O tell her, Swallow, that thy brood has flown;
Say to her, I do but wanton in the South,
But in the North long since my nest is made.

"O tell her, brief is life, but love is long,
And brief the sun of Summer in the North,
And brief the moon of beauty in the South.

"O Swallow, flying from the golden woods,
Fly to her, and pine and woo her, and make her mine,
And tell her, tell her, that I follow thee."

The Pacific Mail steamship Mongolia, a sister ship of the Manchuria, went aground on Midway Island, 1200 miles northeast of Honolulu, September 16th. The passengers, including 200 in the cabin and 300 Asiatics in the steerage, were safely landed. The Mongolia is a sister ship of the Manchuria, which went ashore near Honolulu August 20th, and which was successfully floated after nearly a month's effort.

John D. Hooker, of Los Angeles, through Director George E. Hale of the solar observatory on Mount Wilson, has placed at the disposal of the Carnegie Institute the sum of $50,000 to be used for the construction of a gigantic disk for a reflecting telescope. "The Secret of my

VANITY FAIR.

Society hears by way of seemingly veracious reports from India that another Anglo-American marriage will take place, more interesting than any which has yet been celebrated.

At the time of the great Indian durbar Lord Kitchener had a large and splendid tent, where he lived and entertained during such time as he could spare from his duties as chief military participant in the various ceremonies. Among the American visitors was Mrs. Adair, a sprightly, white-haired matron, possessed of the wit, vivacity and slimmness of figure which Americans preserve better than any other women. Mrs. Adair helped to organize the social festivities in Lord Kitchener's tent. Mrs. Chauncey, another American, was her friend. Mrs. Adair introduced Mrs. Chauncey to Lord Kitchener, and she was invited to dinners and luncheons in the tent.

The Chauncey image was impressed ineffaceably on the general's heart before she departed for her distant home. He wrote long and interesting letters to the beautiful widow and was overjoyed when he found that she liked India well enough to pay a second visit to it. As a result of that visit it is said that the warrior has renounced his unfaith in wedded happiness.

There is good reason why women should feel an interest in Lord Kitchener. He is a rare combination of qualities. He is six feet two inches high, extremely handsome and as powerfully built as any prize fighter. At the same time he is a man of great intellect. No living general has had so much fighting as he.

He drove the Mahdi and his hordes from the borders of Egypt into the Soudan, following them up for 2,000 miles and finally catching them and slaughtering them almost to a man. After all British generals had made a mess of the Boer war, Kitchener was the one who finished it. He is now commander-in-chief in India and his next promotion will be to the supreme command in England. He is the only general whom the English regard as certain to succeed in anything he undertakes.

Why should such a man be a hater of women? For one thing, he considered it absolutely fatal to the highest military success to be tied to a woman or to be swayed by female influences in any way. As a horrible example, he had the venerable Lord Roberts, who has been made ridiculous by his wife's interference with his staff appointments and other military arrangements.

But now, if it be true that Lord Kitchener has found the ideal woman of perfect sense and judgment, all his objections must vanish.

He has a great deal to offer a bride. He will certainly be raised higher in the peerage. As a bachelor he has saved most of his large pay and has received special grants from the government. He owns a fine estate in England. Aspull Hall, and Elephantine island in the Nile, which is laid out with exquisite Oriental gardens, and is probably the most delightful winter residence that could be found.

Mrs. Chauncey is the daughter of Colonel J. H. Carr of Louisville. After her father's death she came East and married Samuel Sloan Chauncey, a New York millionaire. He died within a year or two, and his widow went to Europe, where she immediately made a splendid social success. Her engagement has successively been reported to James J. Van Alen, brother-in-law of Colonel John Jacob Astor; to James Henry Smith, the taciturn possessor of $50,000,000, and to the Earl of Rosebery, formerly Prime Minister of England. Probably they were only hopeless devotees.

Some of the difficulties that beset the wife of a brilliant husband are noted with sympathy by Mary Stewart Cutting in a recent article in Harper's Bazar:

It is no doubt a most bewildering thing to a woman if she does see that her husband is distancing her. There are so many kinds of being clever that a man is expected to be, that it isn't especially daunting to find him cleverer than she expected. But when his brains and his efforts raise him into a society where she had no foothold, where not only the men are on this different plane, but the women also, then she becomes conscious that there is a new condition of things.

She can let him move in this orbit entirely without her and drop down to the home level when he comes back there. She can try to take her place with him, defiantly, with the feeling, "I guess I'm as good as they are, anyway!" or humbly and sensitively feeling every mistake, every lapse self-consciously. That is the trouble, the terrible self-consciousness that will not let her sit, or smile, or speak, or hold her hands naturally, in the presence of people who know so well how to do these things. She can only answer questions and that badly; she can't converse with them. If by chance she forgets herself and does talk naturally she suddenly feels as if she has said the wrong thing, and that her husband is ashamed of her. She knows that he looks and talks like the other people, and she doesn't, and she knows that he knows it.

No one can be fitted either mentally or socially for another sphere of life by precept, but one's mind can learn a wider range even by reading novels and magazines of the day and talking about what is read. A very slight article may sometimes call out a real interchange of thought if one talks about it.

There was much criticism of the invitation to an English tailor, for the purpose of improving the uniforms in the American army, but the New York World shows that something may be said for British styles.

Broadly speaking, modern clothes date from the French Revolution. But it was England that took the pantaloon it received from France and transformed them into trousers, and gave to the long-tailed coat of the Empire the dignity of the double-breasted frock. England indeed has given us our entire outfit of coats—the covert, the paddock, the mackintosh, the invernness, and the ulster which it adapted from the Irish.

It has given us our outing wardrobe, from tennis cloths, for which the "flannelled fools at the wicket" were responsible, to golf coats and riding clothes. Only our baseball suits are native. England borrowed the bloomers of our Dutch ancestors and transformed them into knickerbockers, adding the Norfolk jacket to complete the costume. It gave us the jockey's cap and his riding tights. It provided tweeds and homespuns to relieve the sombre monotony of black, and taught us the comfort of the sack coat or "lounge" suit. From the "first gentleman of Europe" of two generations ago we get our Prince Alberts.

Before the tailor came to inspect American army wear the authorities had adopted a British choice of fabric.

England gave our army khaki, originally from India. And from India also by way of London came pajamas, puttees and the puggaree, not to mention the discarded cummerbund. In the matter of headgear England gave us the cloth cap. We have returned the compliment with the Panama and the developed straw hat. From the Mexican sombrero we have evolved the cowboy or Rough Rider felt.

But these are minor contributions. The source of the derby hat shows forth in its name, and the silk hat is as British an institution as Parliament. Although we are the world's shoe-makers, it is from England that we derive the special forms of footwear required by the sportsman and the athlete. Altogether our obligations to England as civilization's tailor and outfitter are many.

A change of fashion in faces, and men's faces at that, is noted by a New York correspondent of one of the leading journals of the national capital.

The tiny moustache is in again. The smooth-faced man has had his day and the chap with the drooping moustache must chop the droop off and curl up the ends if he wants to be considered smart.

Robert Walton Goelet has a model moustache for the fall and winter of 1906, as also have Dr. Leonard Stuart and Alfred G. Vanderbilt, De Lancey Kane, I. Townsend Burden, Paul Andrews, George W. Brooke, Jr., Marion Wright, W. S. K. Wetmore, Larry Waterbury, Center Hitchcock, E. J. Berwind, Charles B. Hillhouse, Reggie C. M. Oslrichs, Elisha Dyer, Jr., Pembroke Jones, Willie K. Vanderbilt, Jr., and Sidney Smith.

They may be said to be promoters of the new movement and leaders in the new style.

It is a sad discouragement for the American traveler in Europe to be told that it is hazardous to be affable with strangers, but the fact is emphasized by official announcement.

A Paris paper notes that American tourists have been more than ever victimized by thieves in Switzerland this summer. Continual complaints are being lodged by Americans, especially women, who have been swindled and robbed in the trains and at hotels. The authorities declare they are powerless to control the evil unless Americans will be more reserved in their manner. They say that the facility which American women pick up acquaintances when traveling makes them an easy prey.

It is not in America alone that there are steel kings and iron barons; nor is the press of this country the only one which heralds their goings and comings with infinite detail.

In Germany they have an "Iron Maiden," Fraulein Bertha Krupp, the richest woman in the empire, who is shortly to be married. Many American heiresses may, a Paris journalist reports, be richer than Bertha Krupp, but no other young woman rules over such a little world or such an army of subjects. Essen seemed to him like a small German State with Bertha Krupp as the princess. Her husband is merely to be the prince consort. She has a bodyguard of three thousand men to keep order in her great dominions. She has also her own ministry, consisting of the directors of the Krupp Company.

The heiress gave the reporter a few minutes, telling him, among other things how, like her father, she wished to live far from the madding crowd, and that she had never said all the stupid things American newspapers have put into her mouth. After her marriage, she explained, the management of the business will still remain in the hands of the board of directors, while she and her husband will devote themselves to the welfare works established by the company for the benefit of their army of employees.

STAGE GOSSIP.

James Neil and his wife, Edythe Chapman, have made a New York hit in their new sketch, "The Lady Across the Hall."

Harry Corson Clark is playing New England with a playlet called "Strategy."

The receipts for the six performances of the circus in San Francisco last week are said by the managers to be the largest ever known for the same period in the history of the American circus business. Not less than 60,000 people paid the price of admission to the shows, and many hundreds of people who could not obtain seats stood up.

Nance O'Neil played Lady Macbeth and Queen Elizabeth in Springfield, Mass., last week.

Laura Hope Crews has left "Brown of Harvard" and will be the ingenue with Margaret Anglin in "The Great Divide." Lolita Robinson, a young actress from San Francisco, will take her place. Miss Robinson made her start at the Alcazar Stock Company.

Ferd Michelena, a well known vocal teacher San Francisco, has arrived in New York, where he will establish himself permanently. Mr. Michelena's daughter, Vera, is in the cast of the musical comedy, "The Tourists," now playing at the Majestic Theatre in that city.

Florence Roberts hopes to have found a play that will serve as her principal new offering of the current season in "Maria Rosa," from the pen of Angel Guimera, who also wrote "Marta de los Lowlands." The play will be produced in New York next January, when Miss Roberts will have the title role, that of a young Catalan peasant woman. Heretofore the only presentations of the piece have been made in Barcelona and the City of Mexico, solely for copyright purposes.

Margaret Anglin and Henry Miller gave at many last week the first performance of William Vaughn Moody's "The Great Divide," the play in which they will open the Princess Theatre, New York, on October 1. Miss Anglin plays an Eastern woman who has a unique and mysterious love affair with a man typical of the Southwestern mines.

Frank Worthing shares the honors with Grace George in the New York success of "Clothes," a comedy by Channing Pollock and Avery Hopwood.

Manager Conried is enthusiastic over the singing engaged for the coming Metropolitan opera season, and especially concerning Miss Geraldine Farrar, who will make her debut in "Medora," a new production here. Miss Farrar is not only one of the most beautiful women on the operatic stage, but she has a glorious voice and great dramatic power, says Herr Conried. She is a California girl who sang for a while with the Savage Opera Company. Conried was attracted by her voice, and sent her to study with Jean De Reszke.

It is announced by the London Telegraph that Melina Patti has decided to close her professional career and that she will sing a farewell concert in London in December and will give a series of provincial farewells in the autumn of 1907.

A minor actress at one of the Oakland theatres has been telling a reporter how much she prefers dwelling amid the ruins across the street to living in Oakland," remarks the Oakland Tribune, and it resents the reflection in the following: "She gets her bread and butter in this city, which she derides, but makes a virtue of begging them in San Francisco. She appears to think she is doing something heroic in refusing to eat and sleep among the people who give her employment and afford her a means of livelihood. Nobody will dispute her right to spend her money where and with whom she chooses, but she advertises her ingratitude and bad taste by 'knocking' the city which has given her a profitable welcome and the opportunity to profit by pursuing her profession. This actress belongs to a type with which Oaklanders have become so familiar since the great fire in San Francisco. They are gaining their livelihood in Oakland, but heap unstinted abuse on this city and its inhabitants. It is a singular fact that many of the persons who do this were mere rounders or hangers-on in San Francisco, and are doing better in Oakland than they ever did across the bay, and their lamentations are largely in the nature of boasts of a prosperity which they never enjoyed. The only things they carry in their memory regarding San Francisco are the gash features and flash life that characterized it before the fire. They resent order, quiet and society, and hence mock Oakland and the people who constitute its stable population. Like the silly actress, they are carried away with the notion that abusing the people who have given them welcome, shelter and employment is a fine thing to engage in. Down in Los Angeles persons who abuse the city and its inhabitants are driven away as public enemies. Their presence is not tolerated by a public opinion which is aggressive in resenting vulgar and false imputations on the community. Public opinion in Oakland should apply the same sort of discipline here. Members of the theatrical profession who gratuitously indulge in the kicking habit while drawing their salaries in Oakland can easily be made to feel that they have outraged the laws of hospitality and affronted their audiences by disparaging this city and its inhabitants. An expression of rebuke would have a wholesome effect."

The Bohemian Club Concert.

After the "jinks of the owl" in the redwoods of Bohemian Grove, the Bohemian Club members have been accustomed to prepare for a club concert. There will be no deviation this year from the club's set plans. The club is making ready to give its annual concert in the Greek Theatre, Berkeley, October 2d, in the afternoon. All the selections are to be from music written at various times for club jinks, and the composers are personally to direct the rendering of the notes. This year for the first time in the annals of the club the concert will be given with the idea of allowing a much greater audience than has been accustomed to attend. Musical director H. J. Stewart says that the great theatre is marvelous for its acoustic excellence, and that no better place for the rendering of the splendid programme could have been chosen. J. C. Wilson is chairman of the committee of management, which committee is composed of the chairman and Messrs. T. S. Wilson and Rudolph Tausig.

The Orpheum.

Clifton Crawford, author of the favorite song, "Nancy Brown," will make his first appearance in San Francisco at the Orpheum this Sunday afternoon, and tell clever stories. Eleanor Borel will present a dainty song cycle "The Quarrel." Nat LeRoy and Minnie Woodford are rapid-fire talkers with a package of fun. Tom Fortune and Josephine Davis will make their initial appearance here in their original sketch, "My Sweetheart." R. G. Knowles, for his second and last week, will make a complete change of songs and stories. McMahon's Minstrel Maids and Watermelon Girls will also offer a new act. The Aribos, European strong men, and the Orpheum motion pictures, showing the latest novelties, will complete a varied program. On the grounds of the Chutes, where the Orpheum is located, are to be found all kinds of attractions. There is a matinee at the Orpheum every day except Monday.

University Boat Club Show.

Boating enthusiasts of the University of California expect to make the show in the Greek Theatre Tuesday evening, September 25th, the social affair of the season. To raise funds for the purpose of equipping the Amador, the clubhouse of the Association, the show has been arranged. "The Wreck of the Amador" is the name of the piece to be presented. The scene is laid on Robinson Crusoe's lonely isle. Needless to say the victims of the well-fated Amador are in the list of entertainers familiar to the college public and include Henry Morse Stephens and Emil Kruschke. A quartet from the DeKoven Club will render selections. In addition, there will be a number of other members of the crew, all of whom will add to the program.

That telephone and charcoal paper are the simple means used by "The Marvelous Fays" to give a so-called occult performance that has been bewildering New Yorkers all summer at a popular theatre was alleged in the Supreme Court. Two former employees of the Fays quit and at a rival playhouse started to expose the Fays performance. An injunction suit by the Fays brought all concerned into court. The defendants declared pads were distributed for the audience to use in writing queries. When the sheet was written on it was torn off by the questioner and the pad handed back to the attendant. The paper was of such a sort that by rubbing charcoal on the next sheet lines of writing would appear. These slips were sent down to a confederate in the basement. He telephoned them to Mrs. Fay, who sat upon the stage.

During the first four or five days after the San Francisco fire when many people could get no money from the banks, a great number went to the railroad officials for tickets to points North, East, South and West, and both in and out of the State. They insisted upon paying eventually, but had nothing to give at that time but their written promises to pay as soon as they could reach their destination. The officials took these promises to pay to an amount aggregating $60,000 from nearly 1,000 persons. It is remarkable that within five months of the disaster no less than $53,000, or nine-tenths of the full amount, has been paid by remittances from the refugees to whom credit had been extended. Much of this came from grateful sufferers who had not even been asked to sign a promise to pay.

"The Pastoral Symphony" by Beethoven will be the chief feature of the second symphony concert of this year's series by the University Orchestra in the Greek Theatre at Berkeley at 3:30 o'clock next Thursday afternoon, September 27. An audience of 2223 people assembled in the Greek Theatre to hear Dr. J. Fred. Wollé, Professor of Music in the University, and the sixty professional musicians who make up the orchestra, in the opening concert of the series on September 13th.

Dr. Jordan on the Lesson of the Disaster.

The long delayed 1906 senior commencement exercises of Stanford University were held September 15th. President Jordan bade his official farewell to the graduating class, taking as his theme, "Life's Enthusiasm." In closing, Dr. Jordan said:

"This I was prepared to say to you on the twenty-third day of last May. But many things have happened since then and many words have been left unsaid. The time for action has come and swept it all away. These last paragraphs I wrote on a spring morning within a huge hotel of steel and stone in the heart of a bustling city in the most gracious of lands and under the bluest of skies. A great commercial city it was, a wondrous city, full of all manner of men—eager, impulsive, loving, enthusiastic men; men cunning and grasping, given over to all 'hard fierce lust and cruel greed,' the most cosmopolitan of all American towns, the one fullest of the joy of living, the one less fearful of future disaster, 'serene, indifferent to fate,' thus her own poets have styled her, and on no other city since the world began has fate, unmalicious, mechanical and elemental, wrought such a terrible havoc.

"In a day this city has vanished; the shock of a mighty earthquake, forgotten in an hour in the hopeless horror of fire; homes, hotels, hospitals, hovels, libraries, museums, sky-scrapers, factories, shops, banks and gambling dens, all blotted out of existence almost in a twinkling of an eye; millionaires, beggars, dancers and workers, men great and small, foolish and courageous, with their women and children of like natures; with the fleeing together by the thousands and hundreds of thousands to the hills and sand dunes, and on the grass and the shifting sands they all slept or were awake together in the old primeval equality of life. Never since men began to plan to create has there been such a destruction of the results of human effort."

Mr. Takahashi, Vice Governor of the Bank of Japan, landed at Victoria last week on his way to New York and London to negotiate another foreign loan for the Japanese Government, which owes already in domestic and foreign debts one billion and eleven and a half millions of dollars, the total foreign debt being over

LITERARY NOTES.

Empires and Emperors.

"Empires and Emperors of Russia, China, Korea and Japan," by Count Vay de Vaya, is a notable contribution to the literature on the Far East. Additional interest attaches to this narrative of travel from St. Petersburg to Tokio by the fact that it was written in 1902, many months before the Japanese-Russian War. Count Vay de Vaya's position gave him exceptional opportunities of describing the rulers and people and institutions of the mysterious East. He met and interviewed the emperors and leading statesmen, but was no less interested with Oriental life in its everyday occupations. The book might have been written by a Chinese author, so sympathetic is it in its impressions of the Dowager Empress's land and people. He says the Chinaman is more industrious and more temperate than the European, and there is scarcely an instance on record in which a Chinese tradesman has broken his word; and who shall say that Chinese art, music and general culture, centuries old, are inferior, because differing from the European? Although a prelate of the Roman Catholic Church, Count Vay de Vaya frankly says that there is no enthusiasm in the Orient for the Christian religion, and that adult conversions very seldom occur. The author notes the gradual advancement of Western ideas, some of them of dubious utility. Poor Korea, by way of compliment to the West, has a new palace that is furnished like "housekeeping apartments." Many artistic photographs and drawings from water-colors by the author illustrate the volume.

Published by E. P. Dutton & Co., New York; $4.00 net.

An Idyl of Arcady.

Meditations under the serene light of sunrises and sunsets, day-long strolls over breezy moors, the sweet, wholesome loves of a newly-wedded pair of idealists, the tried and trusted companionship of a leal old servitor who is a philosopher, and of an affectionate young puppy who is a worshipper—these are the pleasant elements in the life of Halliwell Sutcliffe's "Bachelor in Arcady" that make the book redolent with woodland fragrance.

The only bit of bleak weather in the book is the pessimism of the cook, and that is so pithily expressed as to be enjoyable. It may be remarked, by the by, that the benedict and 's bride are in receipt of a comfortable income; otherwise, we fancy, they would not have a freehold in Arcady.

Published by E. P. Dutton & Co.; price, $1.50.

New Publications.

Devotees of the "great American game" will enjoy "Stand Pat, Poker Stories of the Mississippi," by David A. Curtis. Mr. Curtis is the poker expert of the New York Sun, and most of these cleverly told short stories originally appeared in the Sunday Sun. Published by L. C. Page & Co., Boston; $1.50.

"The Treasure Trail," by Frank L. Pollock, is one of the best of the host of novels that depend for their interest on adventures in search of lost treasures. The hidden gold, in this story, was originally stolen from the Boer government, and stored in a steamer sunk somewhere in the Mozambique Channel. The tale is well-planned, realistic and incidental. Published by L. C. Page & Co., Boston; $1.25.

"Wayside Talks," by Charles Wagner, author of "The Simple Life," is a series of sympathetic little tales for children. Were it not for President Roosevelt's strong endorsement of Dr. Wagner's books, however, this volume would receive scant attention from either publisher or reader. Published by McClure, Phillips & Co., New York; price, $1.00 net.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

Miriam Michelson, author of the San Francisco newspaper story, "Anthony Overman," has been invited to deliver a course of lectures on journalism at the University of Missouri. She has been a journalist in San Francisco and Philadelphia for several years.

The autumn announcements include novels by Jack London, Marion Crawford, Charles Egbert Craddock, Pierre Loti, E. V. Lucas, and R. Lawrence Donne. They also include the first volume of "A History of Rome in the Middle Ages," by F. Marion Crawford and Prof. Giuseppe Tomassetti.

A party of Washington correspondents have been viewing San Francisco during the past week. They will syndicate letters to about 100 Eastern newspapers on the situation. The party consists of Gilson Gardner, Newspaper Enterprise Association; H. B. Nesbitt, Pittsburg Press and Kansas City Star; R. W. Pullman, Washington Post; J. Hay, Jr., Washington Times; Charles S. Smith, Associated Press; H. J. Brown, Portland Oregonian; H. W. Schulz, Little Rock Gazette; M. H. Thorpe, Forestry and Irrigation, and Ira E. Bennett, San Francisco Chronicle.

"Edinburgh Under Walter Scott" is the title of a new book by W. T. Fyfe, which pictures the remarkable social life of Edinburgh of that time.

Mrs. Ballentine, wife of Captain Arthur T. Ballentine, and only daughter of the late Speaker Thomas B. Reed, has decided to publish a monthly paper called the Yellow Ribbon, devoted to woman's suffrage. She will publish her journal in Monterey.

Alexander Belford, who for many years was a prominent book and magazine publisher of Chicago, died in Los Angeles September 7. He had been ill for several months. He married a daughter of Andrew McNally, of the Rand-McNally Publishing Company of Chicago.

Of a recent "Life of Oscar Wilde" a reviewer remarks: "What can be told about the man, is already pretty well known, and there is little enough of it at best; whereas what is generally unknown, cannot be told at all," and, continuing, says of the biographer's difficulty: "As an apologist he is always in a frightful dilemma. He has to save his author's wits at the expense of his character, or his character at the expense of his wits."

The new management of the American Magazine will not lack force and methods of the times. It includes Miss Tarbell, David Graham Phillips, Lincoln Steffens, William Allen White, and Finley Peter Dunne.

In a recent issue of the Springfield (Mass.) Republican appears this kindly note of San Francisco's progress: "The San Francisco publishers are fast finding their feet. The newspapers, as all the world was told, made amid the smoke a record for quick recovery, and now the monthly magazines are reappearing. The first issue of the Sunset Magazine after the fire was a combined June-July number. The theme, handled by a number of representative Pacific coast writers, was San Francisco. It is announced that Massachusetts, Maine and Connecticut are three of the States from which the Sunset subscribers are asked to send their receipts or part of a mailing wrapper in the interests of a new mailing list to replace the one partially burned."

"That exceptionally able and original weekly, the Argonaut, has found itself whole, and has resumed its old form and measure, while the keen and strong utterances of its editorial page have lost nothing of that peculiar pungency due to Jerome Hart, one of the newspaper geniuses of the country, without regard to degree of longitude."

A French journalist recently complained to Tolstoi, that the American people were devoid of ideals and devoted only to the passion of money-getting. Professor Brander Matthews, in an address given before two colleges, set himself to answer these and other sweeping charges made by foreign critics. His address is now being brought out in permanent form under the title of "American Character."

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A New York wine agent is compiling volume of anecdotes of the famous wine dealers of the past.

Of the late Baron Roederer he said one day:

"Roederer once received a letter that said:

"Sir: I have not a centime to my name, but I adore champagne. Be good enough to send me a case of delicious betar. With its help I hope to forget my wretched poverty."

"Roederer replied by return mail:

"Sir: The means wherewith you propose to forget your poverty will not fail. The incessant and persistent representation of my account would remind you every moment of your sad condition."

A well-known member of the New York bar, a man of most patronizing manner, one day met John G. Carlisle, whom he observed loftily:

"I see, Carlisle, that the Supreme Court has overruled you in the case of Julius vs. Jenkinson. But," he added, "his grand way, 'you, Carlisle, need el no concern about your reputation.'" Carlisle chuckled. "Quite so," he agreed. "I'm only concerned for the reputation of the Supreme Court."

A Frenchman challenged an American fight. The American, a husky six-footer from Yale, who had pitched on a baseball team and stroked the crew, as loth to accept, and took the matter something of a joke. The count pressed his desire for satisfaction, and last the son of "Old Eli" consented meet him, stipulating that he should choose his own weapons. Seconds were read upon, and the mode of combat chosen by the American was baseballs twenty paces. It was dangerously close range for a man who has spent three years twirling inshoots and out-pitches over a twelve-inch plate and bely to be a pretty accurate shot with baseball; but the Frenchman was game, and they met on the outskirts of the city at daybreak.

Each was to have three shots, and the first won the toss and thereby the privilege of leading off. Perhaps he had never seen a baseball before, and at any rate the man from Yale had no difficulty dodging the adamant spheres which the son of Belle France sent scaling in his direction.

Then the American opened fire. The first ball grazed the Frenchman's shoulder; the second lodged in the pit of his stomach, and the third, an in-sport, caught him full on the point of the chin. He went down and out, and never challenged another American again.

A poor lady whose husband had just died was bemoaning the fact.

"At any rate," she said, as she wiped tears from her eyes, "the Brown Hure was worse than ours."

"How so?" said one who knew that the husband's smash-up had been terrible.

"Why," she said, "we only failed five cents on the dollar, whereas Brown failed for fifty-five."

Upton Sinclair, author of "The Jungle," told at a dinner in New York, a propos of the pure-food laws, a story of four flies.

"Four flies, four brother flies," he said, "set out into the world, one summer day, to seek their fortunes.

"Up and down they flew, and finally, a window being open, they found themselves in a large, delightful room. There was a great white table in the middle of the room, and on it many tempting viands were spread.

"The first fly, with a huzz of delight, settled upon a dish of lovely, amber-colored jam. He ate his fill. Then, with a low cry of agony, he expired.

"The jam, alas, was adulterated with oparas.

"The second fly saw in his comrade's death a moral. Luxuries, he reasoned, are deadly. He would stick, therefore to the plainest, simplest things. And so he fell to upon a crust of bread, and in another moment breathed his last. The bread was adulterated with alum.

"The third fly was so grieved over the fate of his two comrades that he resolved to drown his sorrows in drink. There was a glass of heer bandy. He settled into it greedily. But the beer was adulterated with cocculus indicus, and in less than a minute the fly, quite dead, floated with limp wings on the surface of the amber fluid.

"In despair the fourth fly hid himself in a corner. Sorrow overpowered him. Large tears rolled from his compound eyes. And unfortunately, in this mood, his glance fell upon a large dish of fly poison.

"What is life," he muttered, "without my three dear brothers? I'll kill myself."

"And he sipped a little of the poison. It was palatable, even appetizing. Resolved to make a good job of it, he drank greedily, and, still drinking awaited the end.

"But the end did not come. The fly poison, like everything else in the room, was adulterated. The little insect found it harmless. Indeed, it cheered, exhilarated, strengthened him, so that he no longer desired death."

The weary tramp with the red beak halted in front of the wayside cottage.

"I called, mum," he announced, "because I found dis sample package of dyspepsia tablets down the road."

"Dyspepsia tablets?" snapped the woman with the broom. "What have I to do with dyspepsia tablets?" "Why, er—I thought maybe you might give me something to eat dat would gib me de dyspepsia so I could test dem."

PERSONAL.

Notes and Gossip.

A chronicle of the social happenings during the past week in the cities on and around the Bay of San Francisco will be found in the following department:

The engagement is announced of Miss Inez Strauch to Mr. James H. Graham. Their wedding will be an event of the near future.

The marriage of Miss Evelyn Clifford, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James B. Clifford, to Mr. Sylvanus Cobb Farnham took place on Wednesday evening, September 19th, at Trinity Church. The ceremony was performed at 8:30 o'clock by Bishop Nichols, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Clappett and the Rev. Burr M. Wreden. Miss Elsie Clifford, the bride's sister, was the maid of honor and Mr. Eugene M. Farnham, the groom's brother, was the best man. The ushers were: Mr. William T. Goldsborough, Mr. John de Peyster Teller, Mr. Robert McMullen and Mr. Paul McMullen. A reception was held in the guild room after the ceremony. Mr. and Mrs. Farnham have gone on their wedding journey and on their return they will live in Oakland.

Last Sunday in the presence of a few relatives and friends Dr. Arthur L. Fisher and Miss Eugenia Samuels were united in marriage at the residence of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. D. Samuels, on Octavia Street. Dr. Fisher is a recent graduate of Johns Hopkins Medical School, while his bride is known through her philanthropic work in San Francisco. After a short trip Dr. and Mrs. Fisher will take up their residence at 3034 Jackson Street.

Dr. and Mrs. Alfred Hunter Voorhies entertained at a dinner and reception at their California street home on Thursday evening of last week in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Patrick Calhoun. Those present at the dinner were, besides the host and hostess and guests of honor: President and Mrs. Benjamin Ide Wheeler, Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Foster, Mr. and Mrs. E. Morey Winship, Captain and Mrs. Charles Plummer Perkins, Mrs. Malcolm Henry, Mrs. Eleanor Martin, Mrs. W. W. Dixon of Butte, Montana, Thorne Mullally, Charles M. Holbrook and Mr. Shingle of Honolulu.

Miss Laura Doe was the hostess at a dinner on last Wednesday evening in honor of Miss Martha Calhoun. Those present besides the guest of honor were Mrs. Doe, Captain and Mrs. Charles Plummer Perkins, Mrs. Malcolm Henry, Miss Bessie Bates, Lieutenant Barnes, U. S. N., Dr. Smith, U. S. N., Dr. James Pressley, Mr. George Sessions and Mr. Robert Shingle.

Miss Mabelle Toy was the hostess at a bridge party at her home in Alameda last week. Among the guests were Mrs. Harvey Toy, Mrs. Paul Bancroft, Mrs. Ernest Stent, Mrs. Harry Bates, Mrs. William Penn Humphreys, Miss Georgia Spicker and Miss Lalla Wenzelburger.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Annexed will be found a resume of movements to and from this city and Coast and of the whereabouts of absent Californians.

Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Sharon are domiciled in the Mountford Wilson house, 2324 Pacific avenue and will there spend the winter.

Miss Jennie Crocker left on Thursday of this week for New York, where she will spend some weeks, returning later to California for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. William G. Irwin are again in Paris after a stay of several weeks at Carlsbad.

Mrs. A. S. Lilley has returned to her home in San Rafael, from San Mateo, where she was the guest of her sister, Mrs. Walter Hobart.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Chesebrough, Miss Edith Chesebrough, Miss Helen Chesebrough and Miss Kate Dillon have returned to their home on Clay street after a stay of several months in San Rafael.

Mr. and Mrs. William Peyton have taken apartments at the Lafayette on Sacramento street for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Athearn Folger will go to their new house near Redwood next month and will there spend the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Willard Drown, who have been at the Preston home at Woodside during the summer, have come to town and are living on Clay street for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Philip Lansdale are spending the month of September at Pacific Grove.

Mr. and Mrs. William M. Given left for the East last week on account of the serious illness of their son, Mr. Stanford Given, who had appendicitis, but is now recovering.

Mrs. John B. Casserly, with her children, is at present staying at the summer home of her father, Mr. Michael Cudahy, at Lake Mackinac, Michigan.

Mrs. Pelham Ames and Miss Elizabeth Ames will leave in October for Baltimore where they will spend the winter.

Mrs. C. Frederick Kohl returned to her summer home at Tahoe last week after a stay of several days in the city.

Mr. and Mrs. Willis Polk have taken a house at San Mateo for the winter.

Miss Laura McKinstry has returned from a visit to Mr. and Mrs. C. G. Hooker at Del Monte.

Miss Margaret Hyde-Smith has returned to San Mateo after a week's stay in town as the guest of Miss Maizie Langhorne.

Miss Carrie Given and Miss Eva Maynard have returned from a fortnight's stay at Tahoe.

Mrs. Casserly and Miss Margaret Casserly, who have spent the summer at San Mateo, will return to their home on Buchanan and Sacramento streets very shortly.

Mrs. James Carolan and her daughter, Mrs. Timlow, who are spending the summer here, have returned to Burlingame from a visit to Del Monte.

Mrs. Henry C. Campbell and Miss Frances Reed, who have been at Soda Springs, near Shasta, since earlier in the summer, have returned to their home in Sausalito.

Mr. Raphael Weill has been spending a few days at Del Monte after having returned from a visit in Southern California.

Mr. James W. Byrne, who has been stopping at the Hotel Ritz in London, left there last week for Scotland, for a season of golf before sailing for home the end of September.

Mr. Hallock Wright, who has been visiting Mr. and Mrs. Francis Lynde Stetson, has sailed on the steamer Minnetonka for an extended tour of Europe.

Mr. and Mrs. George C. Boardman have returned from a visit to Monterey and are domiciled in the William Alvord house for the winter.

Mrs. William Young and Miss Edith Young, who have been living in Berkeley since the fire, will return to town on October 1st and stay at the Hotel Jefferson.

Mrs. H. Sebree, wife of Captain Sebree, U. S. A., of Washington, D. C., well known in San Francisco, is making a visit to her father, Colonel F. Bridgman, who now makes his home at the Hotel del Coronado.

Mrs. M. P. Huntington and her daughter, Mrs. Gilbert Brooke Perkins, who have been abroad for several weeks, were, when last heard from, at Franzenbad.

Mrs. de Noon, Mrs. Emma de Noon Lewis and Miss Mabel de Noon, who are at present in Sausalito, will leave next month for an indefinite stay in Europe.

Mrs. Antoine Borel and the Misses Borel, who have been staying in Paris, have returned to their home in Switzerland.

Registered at the Hotel del Coronado for the current week is John E. Bennett, formerly on the staff of the San Francisco Chronicle, now their Washington correspondent.

Among the arrivals at Byron Hot Springs for the past week are State Printer W. W. Shannon and Mrs. Shannon, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur G. Fisk, Mr. and Mrs. R. J. Hancock, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Williams and Mr. M. Bird, from Honolulu.

Among the arrivals at Hotel Del Coronado for the past week are: Mr. John R. Aitkens, Mr. J. C. Cullen, Mr. W. H. Morrison, Mr. E. H. Fowle, Mr. J. J. Pfister, Mr. W. D. K. Gibson, Mr. Wm. H. Seaver, Mr. Toney Prior, Mr. E. L. Schultz, Mrs. R. B. Cornwall, Mr. Norman H. Bennett, Mr. and Mrs. David Neustadter and Mr. and Mrs. D. J. Guggenheim.

A benefit concert will be given by Mrs. Benjamin G. Lathrop, soprano, and Miss Elizabeth Ames, cellist, assisted by Mr. Edgar Mills, tenor, with Mrs. Huldah Andersen Maxwell as accompanist, on the evening of October 28th at Christian Science Hall, Sacramento and Scott streets. A number of the leading society women of the city will act as patronesses.

Mr. and Mrs. John Howell (formerly Miss Rebecca Richardson) of Berkeley, are rejoicing in the recent advent of a little son.

The many friends of Dr. H. J. Stewart will be glad to note that he has opened a studio at 2117 California street. The popular maestro is organist of St. Dominics and the Temple Sherith Israel, and takes pupils in piano, organ, harp and composition at his new studio.

In an order issued by Judge Seawell the Board of Public Works is temporarily restrained from proceeding with the work of erecting a temporary city hall on the site recently purchased by the Board of Library Trustees for a public library and reading room. The Trustees filed a suit against the Board of Public Works, praying for an injunction against that body which will prevent the library site being used for any purpose except that which was originally contemplated, and on Monday, September 24th, the Board of Public Works must show cause why the injunction should not be made permanent.

The Master Builders and the Builders' Exchange of Los Angeles, whose membership comprise practically all of the prominent contractors and builders, have signed an agreement to maintain an open shop throughout the city; that a week's work shall consist of six days of eight hours each, and that the same wages for carpenters be paid as heretofore. This is the climax of the recent strike of carpenters and plumbers. Only a few hundred union men went out, and no contract was at any time delayed. Most of the strikers have since returned to work.

The San Francisco Odd Fellows have decided to rebuild on the southwest corner of Market and Seventh streets, and erect at once a steel, brick and terra cotta structure covering the entire site, fronting 150 feet on Market street and 165 feet on Seventh street, through to Stevenson. Several offers have been made to purchase the site, but the directors would not sell for less than $800,000. The order has nearly 40,000 members in California, of whom fully 6,000 reside in the city's ruins.

The Jolly Tars, three hundred men prominent in San Francisco shipping business circles, who have maintained a private club on the steamer H. J. Corcoran, tied up at the Clay street wharf since May 10th, have received sailing orders, and are anxiously scanning the charts for new and convenient anchorage. The arrival of the salmon fleet and the unusual crush of foreign shipping makes every berth along the water front valuable, and the Clay street wharf can no longer be spared.

The steamer Oregon, on the Seattle-Alaska run, went on the rocks fifty feet from shore, where the bank is perpendicular, on Hinchinbrook Island, at the entrance to Prince William Sound, at midnight, September 15th. She was trying to find the entrance in the darkness when the headland loomed up. The wreck occurred seventy miles from Valdez and thirty-five miles from Nuchek. The passengers were saved by the lighthouse tender. The vessel will be a total loss.

Mrs. Blanche L. Boardman, the young wife of an aged millionaire, Joseph Boardman, has brought suit against Mrs. Emma Shafter Howard, one of Oakland's society leaders, to compel the latter to sell her the Howard home. Furthermore, Mrs. Boardman asks $30,000 damages from Mrs. Howard for having failed to live up to her agreement to sell the property. The Howard home is in the fashionable Lakeside district of Oakland.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Barry Watson (formerly Miss Maylita Pease) are enjoying the advent of a little son in their home a fortnight since.

Army and Navy.

The latest personal notes relative to army and navy people who are or have been stationed at Pacific Coast points:

Major-General Arthur MacArthur, U. S. A., commander of the Pacific Division, has received commission from the President as Lieutenant-General of the Army, succeeding Major-General Henry C. Corbin, who was retired on September 15th. General MacArthur will remain in command of the Pacific Division and will continue to make his home at Fort Mason.

Rear-Admiral Bowman H. McCalla, U. S. N., retired, and Mrs. McCalla spent several days last week in San Francisco, returning then to their home in Santa Barbara.

Brigadier-General Frederick Funston, commander of the department of California, received orders on Friday of last week to proceed once from Camp Tacoma to Washington, D. C. General Funston was accompanied by his wife, Lieutenant Burton J. Mitchell, U. S. A. Colonel John L. Clem, U. S. A., Chief Quartermaster of the department of California, arrived at the Presidio of San Francisco a week ago from Camp Tacoma where he has been. Colonel Clem was ordered home in advance of the breaking up of the camp, as his services were considered more necessary here than there.

Colonel Sedgwick Pratt, U. S. A., retired, and Mrs. Pratt, who have been in Ross Valley for several weeks, have come to town and are at El Cerrito for the winter.

Colonel John P. Wisser, Artillery Corps U. S. A., commanding officer of Fort Baker, returned last week from Camp Tacoma and went at once to his post. He will be relieved shortly and will go to Berlin as military attache.

Colonel Enoch H. Crowder, General Staff U. S. A., who was ordered here some months since as Chief of Staff of the Pacific Division, but has never reported here, having been on duty as acting judge advocate general, is ordered to report to the commanding general of the Atlantic Division for duty as Chief of Staff of that Division.

Major Adam Slaker, Artillery Corps U. S. A., is relieved of the command of Fort Morgan, Mobile, Alabama, and ordered to Fort Baker as commanding officer of that post.

Major George L. Anderson, U. S. A., is ordered here to succeed Colonel John A. Lunden, U. S. A., Inspector-General of the Pacific Division, who will go East on October 1st.

Major Joseph A. A. Gaston, First Cavalry U. S. A., and Mrs. Gaston will leave on October 1st for Fort Brown, Texas, where Major Gaston's regiment is stationed, he having resigned from his position in connection with the relief committee here.

Major William Lassiter, Fifteenth Infantry U. S. A., is by order of the President detailed for service in the military secretary's department and will report to the commanding general of the Philippine Division for duty.

Major William W. Harts, U. S. A., Chief Engineer officer Pacific Division, was promoted to his present rank last week.

Captain William C. Wrenn, Quartermaster, U. S. A., has been relieved from duty as assistant to the Chief Quartermaster of the department of California and has assumed charge of construction work in and about San Francisco with station here.

Captain Eugene T. Wilson, Artillery Corps U. S. A., is detailed as assistant to the Chief of Artillery and will be stationed in Washington, D. C.

Captain Ira A. Haynes, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., has been ordered to proceed to Vancouver Barracks, Washington, to assume command of the Eleventh Battalion of Field Artillery (Mountain).

Captain J. C. Cantwell, U. S. R. C. S., commanding the revenue cutter McCulloch, has been ordered to convey Governor Hoggatt of Alaska aboard on official business.

Lieutenant J. J. Raby, U. S. N., has been ordered to the Union Iron Works, San Francisco, for duty in connection with the South Dakota, in a view to being ordered to duty as senior engineer officer of that vessel when placed in commission.

Lieutenant Clarence H. Connor, Assistant Surgeon, U. S. A., has been assigned to duty at the Army General Hospital, Presidio of San Francisco.

Lieutenant Douglas C. McDougal, U. S. M. C., has been ordered detached from duty in Washington, D. C., and is ordered to the Colorado.

Lieutenant J. W. McClaskey, U. S. M. C., has been ordered to close the recruiting offices in the district of California and to report to Mare Island barracks.

Lieutenant Arthur Stokes, U. S. M. C., is ordered from Mare Island for duty on the Raleigh.

Surgeon C. P. Kindleberger, U. S. N., has been detached from the naval station at Olongapo, P. I., and ordered to the U. S. S. Baltimore.

Lieutenant Matthew H. Thomlinson, Twenty-second Infantry, U. S. A., having been appointed quartermaster and commissary of the Second battalion of that regiment, has been ordered to proceed to Alcatraz Island for duty. He will, in addition to his other duties, assume charge of construction work at Alcatraz, relieving Lieutenant Gilbert A. McElroy, Thirteenth Infantry, U. S. A.

Passed Assistant Surgeon A. J. Geiger, U. S. N., is assigned to the United States Naval Hospital at Mare Island.

Assistant Surgeon A. E. Lee, U. S. N., is ordered detached from the Naval Hospital at Mare Island and to proceed to the United States Medical School at Washington, D. C.

Veterinarian Robert C. Musser, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., has been ordered to proceed on October 1st to the Presidio of San Francisco for duty.

The offices of the Pacific Division will be moved in a few days from the barracks in the Infantry Cantonment, near the Filbert street entrance to the Presidio, where they have been since the fire, to the I. B. Owens house on Pacific avenue and Steiner street, which is leased for a year.

From Printers' Ink, July 11, 1906.
A CHALLENGE.
Broad Exchange Building,
New York, July 3, 1906.

Editor of Printers' Ink: Comparatively few private business concerns consider it wise to take the public into their confidence as to the volume of their business, but when one does—as a prominent Chicago advertising agency has done recently—and intimates that no other agency has ever shown more than a third the number of accounts that it carries upon its books, it seems proper that this erroneous statement should not go unchallenged. In your issue of April 18, 1906, you state that the firm referred to "now claims the distinction of being the largest general advertising agency in the United States" and that "they claim leadership, not only in the gross amount of advertising cleared through their organization, but also in the number of individual accounts on their books, these numbering 685 in February. It is said that no other agency has ever shown more than 200." We believe that a number of agencies have as large a number of accounts as the one you mention, and with the view of enlightening advertisers, who possibly are impressed by the volume of business transacted by various agencies, others may see fit to give the number of accounts they handle. We certainly have no objection to doing so; and, at the same time, call your attention to the fact that this agency is the second oldest in the United States, having been established in 1872.

At the present time we have 649 active accounts on our books and in addition 250 clients who favor us with their business occasionally—that is, whenever they have any. Over 50 per cent of the active accounts have been handled for a period of ten years or longer, while a considerable number of corporations and concerns with world-wide reputations have entrusted their business to us for periods of more than twenty-five years.

As to the volume of our business in dollars, we do not care to speak; at the same time, we may be pardoned for expressing surprise that the volume placed by our Chicago friends is not larger than they claim. Yours very truly,
Albert Frank & Company.
By C. Armstrong, Treasurer.

The troops which have been at the maneuvers at Camp Tacoma, Washington, for the past six weeks, have all returned this week to their proper stations, orders having been issued bringing the maneuvers to a close just one month sooner than was anticipated. All troops returned by train, the Twenty-second Infantry and four troops of the Fourteenth Cavalry being the first to depart, and reaching here on Monday. Troop I remained at the Presidio of San Francisco, and Troops E, G and H proceeded to the Presidio of Monterey.

Rev. Hobart Chetwood, formerly rector of Trinity Church, San Francisco, died September 11th, in Pacific Grove. He was widely known in the State, having held charges at San Diego, Santa Barbara, San Bernardino, and Pacific Grove. He was actively engaged in the work of the Episcopal Church for fifty-two years.

The War Department recently ordered the troops at American Lake, Wash., to close their maneuvers and leave for the Presidio, San Francisco.

The Campaign in Maine.

Last week we gave a careful resume of the facts leading up to the organized labor union fight in Maine. It began with the insolent address of the American Federation of Labor when their Executive Counsel personally greeted President Roosevelt, President Frye of the Senate and Speaker Cannon of the House with discipline, the hands of the labor unions. We told of the demands made by these organized labor unionists, and of the replies of the President, the Speaker, and President of the Senate. We also told of the insulting letters written by Gompers to Congressmen demanding that they explain their votes to him and apologize therefor. President Roosevelt replied frankly and boldly; he refused to be his stubborn American knees to "labor." As a result of these happenings, Gompers and his labor union declared war on certain Congressmen, among them Speaker Cannon, threatening to defeat them at the polls. As Charles E. Littlefield, of the second Maine district, came up first for election, he was selected for the slaughter.

The election took place on September 10th. The Republicans won by a plurality of less than 9000. Representative Littlefield, who was elected by 5419 votes in 1904, was elected this year by 1259 votes. But the other candidates for Congress, against whom Gompers and his gang made no fight, were also elected by largely reduced pluralities. It was therefore evident that the Republican loss in votes was due to other causes than the labor union opposition. The principal one of these causes was what is known as the Sturgis Enforcement Act. Maine is a prohibition State, but the people had demanded that the prohibition constitutional amendment be resubmitted to them for vote. This the Republican leaders refused to do. Instead they passed an enforcement act which rendered it possible for the State authorities to enforce prohibition over the heads of the local authorities, even if the people in certain towns had voted for local option. The same attempt to ram prohibition down the people's throats nearly cost the Vermont Republicans the State. As it was, their majority there fell from over 30,000 to about three, and they made haste to give the Vermonters a little more freedom. But in Maine the Republicans remained obdurate and they have had their lesson. Governor Cobb, who polled nearly 30,000 votes two years ago, received only 9000 this year. The Republicans carried only four out of twenty cities, and these the smallest. Two years ago 18 out of the 20 went Republican. All of these divergences from preceding elections did not follow the lines of the labor unions in the mill and factory districts, but rather followed the cities as against the rural districts. In short, the cities and the large towns are against prohibition, for the "closed shop," and for a "wide open" town. The villages and rural districts are for a "dry town" and the "open shop." This is the case in Maine and it is very largely the case—bar prohibition—in other States. It is certainly the case in California as regards the strength of the labor union element—it is strong in the towns and weak in the agricultural districts. Gompers and his following failed to defeat Littlefield at the polls. We are convinced that Gompers and his crowd here in California will fail to defeat Gillett.

The Missing "r" in Temblor.

An Eastern reader of the Argonaut asks the following question: "I have observed that you, in common with other Pacific Coast papers, use the word 'temblor' for earthquake. You will kindly tell me whether the 'r' in temblor is left out by mistake, or is the word correctly printed so? If it is correctly printed, will you let your readers know the derivation? I have been unable to find it."

The word "temblor" is not English, but Spanish. It comes from the verb "temblar," meaning "to tremble, to shake with fear, to move with violent agitation, to quake." Specifically, the Spanish phrase for earthquake is "temblor de tierra," but people are in the habit of using the word "temblor" for short. When a "temblor de tierra" comes, there is rarely time to pronounce the whole of the phrase, so they content themselves with the first word. The Spanish language, which is extremely rich in augmentatives and diminutives, possesses many such phrases for earthquakes. For example, the Spanish have an augmented verb "temblequear," which means "to tremble violently, to shake with fear, to move with violent agitation." Thus when you experience a "temblor de tierra," you skip at once without time to use the latter part of the phrase. Then, when you get outside, instead of using the ordinary verb "temblar," to tremble, you use the augmented verb, "temblequear," and tremble with violent agitation, and shake with fear.

Contrariwise, the Spanish-speaking peoples have numerous diminutives. Their earthquake diminutive is "temblochillo," which means "a slight shivering."

"Terremoto" might be called the generic Spanish term for our word, "earthquake," and included within this generic term are numbers of specialized quakes, beginning with the "temblor" and running through the "vibracion," the "tremor," the "golpe," and the "rasago" to the "rasgada." There are, of course, additional and paroxysmal earthquakes, such as the "golpe de fuera;" this is a shock which comes "from over yonder," or "from the next county," or "from the other side of the mountains." Such was the shock which Los Angeles and San Diego experienced, and which they described as coming from the "awful cataclysmic earthquake zone of San Francisco." Then there is the "golpe traversal," which is a shock running crossways instead of cornerways, as when you live in a narrow valley and the earthquake shock cuts across lots, so to speak, or transversely to your own particular line of fracture or line of fault. That is to say, when you are living over a north-and-south fault line, and a previously unsuspected east-and-west fault line lies underneath it, and slips, this in Spanish would be called a "golpe traversal."

The foregoing facts regarding earthquakes and their names are submitted to our Eastern friend apologetically, for we in California have had comparatively little experience in earthquakes. We have only had two "golpes" in forty years.

Gillett and Pardee.

The Democrats, Labor Unionists, and Independence Leaguers are all chortling with glee that "Pardee will knife Gillett." The rumor is ridiculous. No doubt the Governor feels sore that he did not get the renomination. The way the anti-Pardee men in Alameda County and elsewhere have been ghost-dancing since the convention is also not soothing. But he is too frank and honest a man to vote the ticket and repudiate his obligations. He went into the convention prepared to accept its support if he were nominated. Likewise he went into the convention prepared to support its nominee if he were not nominated. This we are convinced he will do. He is a good Republican and a straight, square man. As for the talk of Spear and the rest of the Governor's close friends who are in office "sulking in their tents," that is also unadulterated nonsense. Even putting their conduct on the lowest possible plane, what would they have to gain by open or concealed treachery to Gillett? Nothing at all. On the other hand every motive, including that of self interest, impels them to support the ticket, and that is what they will do.

A New Cure for Sleeplessness.

One of our readers writes enclosing a clipping from a recent number of the Argonaut, and adds:

Dear Argonaut:—In your department of "Individualities" last week you printed a paragraph stating that Mrs. John W. Mackay was "about to go to Germany for a new cure for sleeplessness." Do you know anything about this new cure? If so, pray publish it in your invaluable paper for the sake of suffering humanity.

No, we know nothing of this "cure" for sleeplessness. If Mrs. Mackay is suffering from insomnia, we hope that she has found a new cure in Germany, but we very much doubt it. We do not think there is any new cure for this old malady.

Why should the woman of wealth, the woman of fashion, the "society woman," suffer from insomnia? They are the favored ones of the world; they have everything that money can give. Such is the popular belief. Yet it is erroneous. The woman of great wealth, the woman of fashion, the society woman, lead a strenuous life. The life of the great cities like New York, Paris, and London, is wearing. Those who live in them feel the strain. Probably there are many who desire to essay the "new German cure."

But can there be a cure? We do not think so. There is no cure. Drugs? They are poisons. Trional? Sulphonal? The new alkaloids of opium? Take none of them. The best is merely the least poisonous. If your doctor gives them to you, beg him to do so "unknownst" to you, as the Irishman asked his wife to give him whiskey, for if you get in the way of taking these deadly poisons from your doctor, you will ultimately get in the way of taking them by yourself. And that way madness lies.

For insomnia there is no cure. Insomnia is not an illness, but a condition, and a condition can not be "cured." Still, it can be modified or changed.

The victims of insomnia are legion. The overworked business man is the most common type. Perhaps his ambitious young clerk works as hard as "the old man," but the clerk's work stops when he leaves the office, while the old man's brain keeps working.

The society woman, apparently so idle, is often in reality overworked. Neurasthenia and insomnia are common among the weary women who are devotees of society life in the great cities. They are most commonly the ones who take the rest cure. But women are not the only sufferers. Doctors suffer from insomnia. So do lawyers. So do officers of ships. So do mechanics.

Once in Italy the writer was looking around a book shop; to his surprise, he saw a window piled high with a book entitled "Neurasthenia in the Army." It was written by an army surgeon. Glancing over the contents it was seen that one of the first symptoms was chronic insomnia. Yet on looking out of the windows of the book shop, one noted gorgeous warriors in pot-metal helmets, in high jackboots, in glittering epaulettes, twirling glossy mustaches, casting killing glances at the passing feminines. They looked as if the last thing in the world that could afflict them would be neurasthenia. Some were loafing on corners, some were loafing at cafes, but all of them were loafing. In short, they were the very apotheosis of idleness. Yet it seemed that there was enough insomnia and neurasthenia in the Italian army for an army surgeon to write a book about it.

Not only people in the cities suffer. Sleeplessness also attacks women other than society women—farmer's wives—women who dwell in dull country places. Much insanity develops among farmers' wives. This probably comes from monotony as well as overwork.

Yet even rich people in the country suffer. The writer once knew a young woman of large wealth, who spent her days flying from Paris to London, from London to Paris, back to New York, and thence to her home, which was on an enormous stock ranch in the far West. When at home she spent her days in the saddle, galloping over this enormous ranch. Yet she was a martyr to insomnia.

A sufferer from insomnia may work hard at physical and mental labor, yet the night cometh when no man can work. The insomniac, utterly fatigued, falls into a slumber—not a sound, refreshing, dreamless slumber, but a coma, a lethargy, a torpor, born of fatigue. In a few hours the demon says "Awake!" and the insomniac starts instantly into waking, with bright, staring, winkless, sleepless eyes.

Is there no cure? None. Insomnia comes with age. You cannot cure your years. You used to sleep yesterday, when you were young. "Not poppy, nor mandragora, nor all the drowsy syrups of the world, can medicine thee to that sweet sleep which yesterday thou hadst."

Children are rarely or never insomniacs. Very young people rarely are (unless they have some latent malady of which insomnia is the effect, not the cause). By the way, we do not mean that insomnia is found only in the aged, but it generally comes with increasing years—and cares.

And there is the crux—care. Care is the demon who sits behind the saddle of the young girl galloping over the lofty Nevada table lands. Ride she never so recklessly, care still sits at her saddle bow. Care follows the doctor on his rounds. Care sits at the mechanic's bench, and mocks and grins as he whispers that men nearing fifty lose their jobs. Care goes home with the merchant from his office, and babbles to him of large invoices to be met. Care drops poison into the manufacturer's ear as he sleeps, murmuring of unpaid insurance policies. Care plucks at the rich woman's gown and tells her that she is losing her figure; that white hairs are coming; that her husband is absorbed in business and neglects her; that he leads a double life; that her son is a drunkard; that her daughter has fallen in love with the stable boy. Care cries into the startled ear of the steamship captain that his vessel's prow points for the jagged rocks, and he starts out of his troubled slumber and goes back to the lofty bridge which he left an hour before.

Is it then really true that for insomnia there is no cure? No, but there may be palliatives. One palliative is to give up your pet poisons—wine, or brandy, or whiskey, or tobacco, or tea, or coffee. At first you will suffer more than ever, but when the poison works out of your tissues and your nerves become semi-normal you may sleep soundly again—that is, if you have no other factors playing havoc with your nerves.

Another thing—perhaps you think too much about yourself. Think more about other people. Help the people that are hard up; there are lots of them who are not beggars. You need not go to ladies' relief societies and the like to carry out this suggestion. There is no need of invoking "scientific charity" to help you. Right within the circle of your own knowledge there are plenty of people who need assistance and who are too proud to ask for it. Suppose you try and think more about other people, if you are thinking too much about yourself.

This is not moral advice, and it is not recommending sweet charity for charity's sake, or that charity which droppeth like the gentle dew from Heaven upon the place beneath. Make no mistake—this is pure, cold, calm advice about insomnia. This advice about thinking of others is purely intended as a palliative for sleeplessness. Use human suffering as a mental alternative, as the doctors do liver pills as a chologogue.

On the other hand, if you are well-to-do, doubtless you have continual drains upon your purse. Perhaps you have pensioners and other poor people whom you are helping all the time. In that case, stop giving. Pay no heed to any demand. Abuse the petitioners. Be as brutal with them as you can. Reflect how useless most people are, particularly poor ones. If they are crippled or decrepit or ill, consider how much better it would be if they were dead. In this way you will save a lot of money. Thus you will tone yourself up wonderfully. This course may bring about a palliation or alteration in your condition which will cause you to sleep better.

But is it really true that there is no remedy? Yes, there is, but it is so difficult as to be almost impossible of attainment. The remedy is to kill care. Stop worrying. We are all of us here so short a time that this earthly life is really not worth worrying about so much. Besides you do not know what is going to happen to you. So why worry about it? It is useless to worry about the things that have happened—you cannot help them. It is more useless to worry about the things that will happen—you don't know what they are.

Suppose we all had known a year ago that San Francisco was to be destroyed at thirteen minutes past five o'clock on the morning of the 18th of April, 1906. How we all would have worried! Worry, care, and insomnia would have driven thousands to insanity and suicide. Yet now it is all over. Thousands of us are ruined; other thousands are half-ruined; other thousands have lost heavily. Not one has escaped scot free. Is it not better so than if we had all known in advance what was going to happen to us on that fatal morning?

Don't worry, by daylight or dark.
Let your brain work in the day time.
Don't think in bed.
Then you will sleep well.

Fireman's Fund First Payments.

A plan has been formulated by which the Fire Fund and Home Fire and Marine Insurance Companies are to begin paying off their fire losses by a conflagration of last April. This plan went into last week. In brief, it involves assessing the holders of both companies $300 per share; liquidating such securities as could be turned into cash without great loss; paying the policy-holders 50 per cent of the remaining 50 per cent to be paid in stock of the Fireman's Fund Insurance Company at a valuation of $500 for every $100 share issued. This stock is to be delivered to the policy-holders fully paid up without liability for the San Francisco conflagration losses. The proposed assessment applies only to the present share-holders, and has no reference to the holders who become future share-holders.

This plan was approved by the Policy-Holders' League. On September 18th payments began with the first installment to the policy-holders of 20 per cent of their losses. On the first day there was quite a commotion. Thereafter, strangely enough, it fell off, and on the third day only a corporal's guard of policy-holders appeared. In fact, the officers were somewhat embarrassed, for they had raised nearly two millions of dollars to meet these claims. But out of five millions of policy-holders to whom they sent notices, only one-third called for their money during the first three days.

About one-half of the creditors of the Fire Fund and kindred companies have signed an agreement pledging themselves to accept 50 per cent in cash and the remainder in stock. But the officers of these corporations say that apparently an impression exists that sufficient signatures have been obtained, a mere majority being enough. They add that this is a false impression, as practically all of the policy-holders must sign in order to make the plan a success.

It is to be hoped that the remaining policy-holders will sign this agreement. If it be not signed, it is inevitable that these companies will be forced into insolvency. The legal expenses will then be so great as to swallow up much of the money that otherwise would go to the policy-holders. Furthermore, the policy-holders sign promptly and if the stockholders pay their assessments promptly, the new corporation will start in with so much strength from its new shareholders and so much prestige from having surmounted difficulties which seemed practically irresistible, that it will look forward to writing as much, if not more, business than any fire insurance company on the Pacific coast.

The Union Labor Vote.

It is a very difficult matter to get at the strength of the Union Labor men. On Labor Day when the parade—into which, by the way, the members are whipped by a heavy fine—they make the strongest showing they possibly can. In San Francisco it is impossible ever to get any truthful account of a Labor parade, a labor strike, or any labor manifestation whatever from the dailies. These journals are so cowardly when it comes to criticising labor unions that they dare not call their souls their own. Therefore, figures which they give as to the number in line in a Labor Day parade vary by tens of thousands. One could imagine that they would agree on some lie—any lie—and not differ so much, but they all lie and lie differently.

Los Angeles does not cringe before the Labor Union whip. In that town on Labor Day the estimates do not vary so widely. On last Labor Day the Los Angeles Examiner gave the number of men in line at 100,000, but most of the other papers gave it at somewhere between 3,000 and 3,500, which was probably the

Let us make a slight calculation. Say the population of Los Angeles was 150,000 yesterday. (We do not know what it is to-day, for we have not yet received the Los Angeles daily papers.) But we will let it go at that. (Even say that it is 160,000, giving Los Angeles 1,000. To be correspondingly generous, let us add 50 to the labor parade number, and say they had 400 men in line. Thus the ratio between the Labor Ly parade and the Los Angeles population would be 1 to 40. Taking the population of the United States as 80,000,000, with the same ratio of 1 to 40, the labor union men in this country would total up 2,000,000. But they claim 4,000,000; therefore let us be generous and say they have a total of 2,500,000. Have the swelled-head gentry the presumption to think that a half million men can dictate to eighty millions? That they can order the President of the United States to carry out their behests?—that they can give orders to State and House? Well, if they think so they are going to get kicked so hard they will know they are mistaken.

Here in California a couple of score thousand of them are presuming to dictate to nearly two millions of people; to arrogate to themselves the right to say that the nominee of the stalwart old Republican party shall not be elected because he refused to obey the commands of a foreign labor leader, one Samuel Gompers. The local foreign labor leaders seem to think that because they have had control of San Francisco for a few years they are going to control the whole State of California. Are they? Well, we rather think not. That it is a genuine workingman, a son of the soil, who showed his way up from the logging-camp—a plain American with the bark on. If these windy foreign labor leaders can defeat him, then we hope the next earthquake will so shake up California that the Pacific Ocean will wipe it off the map.

San Francisco Property Owners.

The Downtown Property Owners' Association of San Francisco held a meeting on September 20th, to discuss the high prices for labor and materials. It is some weeks since the association met. At its last meeting it discussed rentals, and endeavored to bring about a lowering with no apparent success.

The recent meeting was addressed by Patrick Calhoun, President of the United Railroads, who, as reported, said: "Try and have hearty co-operation between union labor and property-owners. Endeavor to have such a sentiment that any workingman can come and find employment."

That is eminently sound advice. Property-owners now have no time for fighting labor unions. They had better devote their energies to erecting buildings on their vacant lots. The second sentence quoted above is particularly good advice. If property-owners make it possible for mechanics and other laboring men to come to San Francisco in large numbers, the price of labor will adjust itself.

Another gentleman who addressed the meeting was W. Bartlett, Chief Counsel of the Western Pacific Railroad. He, as reported, said: "Since the fire you downtown property-owners and merchants have done nothing; but appoint committees and adopt resolutions. Do you want to create fire barriers, widening streets? Find out the cost and raise the money. Do you want a salt-water system for fire protection? Find out the cost and raise the money. Let us stop talking and spend money for actual improvement."

That is also excellent advice. Among the many instances of the arguments advanced by the crooked companies is that San Francisco was "deprived of water," and hence of all fire protection, when the Valley water-mains broke. This is not only false, but ridiculous. As a matter of fact, San Francisco has water cisterns, some of which were full. The fact that the cisterns were empty was not due to "an act of God," but to the earthquake, but because somebody was lazy. Of course the creation of ignorant, stupid, or inefficient men is an "act of God," but their acts are too common for them to be called "acts of God." Therefore we must hold the Fire Underwriters, the Fire Commissioners, and other municipal authorities responsible for the empty water cisterns.

But how about the crooked companies' claim that San Francisco was left "destitute of all fire protection?" San Francisco lies on a peninsula washed by the waters of the Pacific Ocean and one of the largest bays in the world. The United States Navy succeeded in saving most of the property on the water-front belonging to the City of San Francisco, to the State of California, and to numerous private citizens, by taking water out of the bay and using it on the flames. True, the Navy had no legal right to do this—it is not one of the obligations set down for it in the Articles of War. Furthermore, the United States Government or its minions has no right to use water belonging to the municipality of San Francisco, or to run hose across the water-front strip of land belonging to the State of California, title to which is temporarily vested in the Board of Harbor Commissioners. None the less, the Navy used this water and did these unlawful acts and thereby put out much fire. This suggests that the city of San Francisco could also profitably have used the waters of the bay; if the bay waters were all used up, they could have had resort to the Pacific Ocean, and thereby put out the fire. That the city did not do this does not prove that it was "destitute of all fire protection." Hence the absurdity of this contention of the crooked insurance companies.

But we digress. As Mr. Burnett says, if we want a salt-water system for fire protection, the way to get it is to stop talking, find out what it costs, and raise the money.

Another gentleman who addressed the Association was Thomas Magee, capitalist and real estate agent. Mr. Magee, as reported, said: "You downtown property-owners do not act together. You are all at loggerheads. You have resolutions calling on dealers in building materials and labor unions to reduce prices and wages. It is futile to ask for such reductions. You can not get the unions to reduce their wages, and ought not to ask them. I think these high wages are the biggest advertisement San Francisco has over the world to-day."

In this also there is sound sense. The Argonaut is not in sympathy with the very general condemnation of the workmen for getting all the wages they can. We have said or printed nothing whatever against them in that regard and shall not do so. We object strenuously, however, to their keeping other workmen away. Every man is entitled to get for his services, whether with hand or brain, whatever they are worth. This means what they will bring in the open market. So with commodities. So with ground rent and house rent. If one hundred men want a house and there is only one house, the owner may charge a high rental. If one hundred landlords want to let one hundred houses and there is only one tenant, he will get the house at a low rental. To ask a carpenter, plasterer, or bricklayer to accept lower wages than many men are willing to pay him is preposterous. To expect a landlord to accept lower rental than hundreds of men stand ready to pay him is nonsense. Passing resolutions asking men—whether mechanics, laborers, or landlords—to do such things is childish. If there is any man among the downtown property-owners who will lease his land for fifty per cent below going rates, his family would get out a writ "de lunatico inquiring" and put him in the asylum.

None the less, after all these addresses we observe that the Downtown Property Owners' Association duly passed in good set form a resolution requesting the Building Trades labor-unions to agree to "the normal wage rate existing before the fire." They also asked the building material tradesmen to "agree to an assurance of some fixed price for building material during the coming year." If any dealer in building materials agrees to sell anything for a fixed price during the coming year in San Francisco, his relatives need not get out any writ for him. They can have him shut up in the asylum at once.

We assure the Downtown Property Owners' Association that the only remedy for their dilemma is to readjust economic and social conditions. There are now too many landlords and too many vacant lots. There are not enough laborers and not enough building material. If they decrease the number of vacant lots and landlords, or if they increase the number of laborers and the amount of building material, their difficulties will all disappear like snow before a summer sun.

But resolutions will not do it.

Direct Primaries and Bosses.

In urging the passage of a direct primary law the Argonaut has stated that it would take away the selection of nominees from the bosses and give it to the people. A striking instance of this developed in the recent election in Wisconsin. Senator La Follette began to climb as an anti-boss statesman. He fought hard against Senator Spooner and the machine. He found the task of defeating Spooner and smashing the machine so great that he began educating the people in favor of a direct primary law. It took some years before he succeeded with this measure. It had to run the gauntlet of several indifferent legislatures and finally, after some years of struggle, La Follette turned it over to the people of Wisconsin as a law in 1905.

In the meantime La Follette had been Governor and wanted to be United States Senator. His wish was granted, and the State of Wisconsin sent him to the Federal Senate. But while he was away his political fences kept getting out of repair, so in the recent election he put up his man Lenroot as candidate for the Republican nomination for Governor. To his surprise and horror, he found a vigorous opposition to Lenroot. So Senator La Follette took off his coat and began stumping the State for Lenroot. But Lenroot was beaten out of sight at the direct primary. So Senator La Follette mourns and refuses to be comforted.

Perhaps the solution is that the Senator had got to be a good deal of a boss himself.

Dissatisfaction in the Militia.

Continual statements appear in the daily press to the effect that great dissatisfaction exists in the California National Guard. So pronounced is this feeling that it is feared the entire Second Brigade will disintegrate. All of the officers in the First Coast Artillery have petitioned their commander, asking that the battalion be mustered out. The dissatisfaction has been accentuated by the testimony of Mayor Schmitz in the Transatlantic Insurance Company law suit. On the stand the Mayor, as reported, said that he "did not call out the militia, and did not know the militia was in the city until four or five days after the fire." Some of the militia officers speak bitterly of the "calumnious assertions and scandalous charges made against the National Guard by the citizens of San Francisco." Concerning these, Major Francis Keesling, N. G. C., says: "I have come to the conclusion, as a result of the criticism during the recent calamity, that there must be some foundation in fact for the aspersions cast on the National Guard. The undesirable element certainly must be blamed for any criticism which has fallen on good and bad without discrimination during the last few months."

Why would it not be a good idea for Major Keesling to ask for a court of inquiry? If it were said that the community would not heed the judgment of such a court, if made up of the officers of the organization to be investigated, why not ask retired officers of the United States Army to constitute such a tribunal? There is General Shafter for one. He was an excellent soldier and a rigid disciplinarian. He is now a citizen of California and has the good of the State at heart. Why not ask him to preside over a court of inquiry to be made up of retired army officers, their duty being to investigate the charges made against the California National Guard? If, as Major Keesling hints, there are some black sheep in an organization otherwise made up overwhelmingly of white ones, why not demonstrate that fact, and muster out the black sheep?

The Traders Insurance Company.

The Chicago attorneys for the Traders Policy-Holders' Company were notified lately by the attorney representing the receiver of the Traders Insurance Company that the "Receiver is dissatisfied because of the small number of adjustments." If the receiver would make his adjusters act decently perhaps there would be a larger number of adjustments. It is bad enough to hold policies in a company which is insolvent, and which most of its policy-holders believe to be fraudulently insolvent. But when, in addition, the unfortunate policy-holder finds that the receiver's adjuster is trying to bulldoze him into submitting to a horizontal cut of 25 to 30 per cent, he loses interest in adjustment. He is tolerably certain, he believes, to receive only a moiety of his just claim by reason of the welching of the crooked stock-holders in Chicago; why, then, he asks, should he hasten to have his claim partially cut by a crooked adjuster, before it is completely cut by the crooked company's bankruptcy?

Unreasonable, perhaps, but natural.

The Chances of Nominee Bell.

The Democratic and Labor Union leaders are now trying to make voters believe that Theodore A. Bell is going to be elected Governor of California. One of the moves in the game was to "endorse" Mr. Bell in the so-called Labor Union State Convention. It may be remarked in the first place that there never was any Union Labor State Ticket filed in the office of the Secretary of State of California. As a party which has no State ticket is not a State party, it may be considered that there is no Union Labor State Party. As such a party has no existence under the laws of California, it could scarcely have held a State convention. Therefore the gathering which "endorsed" Mr. Bell was not a convention. The persons present may call it what they choose. When two or three girls get together they sometimes send a paragraph to the Society Editors saying they have "held a tea." Correspondingly, the persons at this recent talk-feast may have sent word to the political editors that they "held a convention," but we assure them that they were mistaken. They only thought they did.

At all events they held something, and as soon as it convened it adjourned. Immediately after the adjournment, a Swedish gentleman with a queer name called himself together, while a few of the bystanders gathered round in a circle and looked at him. The Swedish gentleman then called himself to order, and proceeded to elect himself Chairman and Sergeant-at-Arms. After this, he put the question to himself, seconded it himself, declared his vote carried, and endorsed Mr. Bell unanimously as a candidate for Governor of the Union Labor State Party. Thereupon the gentleman with the queer Swedish name adjourned himself.

What is Mr. Bell going to do? Is he going to accept the nomination of this convention, if it was a convention that passed it, and if what they passed was a nomination? If he accepts it, will the Democrats support him? Now that the labor leaders, the Examiner, and the Independence League have split the party into fragments, about all that is left of the straight Democracy is the Bourbon Southern element and the Northern conservative element. Both of them hate the labor union element as the devil hates holy water. If, then, Mr. Bell accepts the Union Labor nomination and platform, the old-line Democrats will refuse to vote for him, and many of them will vote for Gillett. If, on the other hand, in his letter of acceptance he endorses the Democratic platform, most of the Union Labor men will repudiate him. The Union Labor men are more bitter against the Democratic leaders than they are against the Republican bosses. If Mr. Bell should succeed in coping with the difficulties of his two platforms, what will he do about the nominees? With the exception of Governor, the two tickets will be entirely different. Will he support the other nominees on the Democratic ticket? Then the other Union Labor nominees will knife him. Will he, on the other hand, support the other nominees on the Union Labor ticket? Then, not only the nominees of the Democratic ticket, but the entire Democratic party will knife him. Mr. Bell seems to be in a dilemma.

San Francisco's Registered Voters.

What figure is San Francisco going to cut in this campaign? Is she going to be an appreciable factor? Up to date the registration has been so light as to cause surprise. When President Roosevelt was elected 98,000 voters were on the register. The day we are writing only 30,000 have registered. And even of these 30,000 many will fail to vote and others may not be permitted to do so.

The status of the San Francisco voters is very uncertain. Chief Justice Beatty entertains different views from those expressed of late in the press and by the politicians. The general belief has been that a man who lived in the burned district could register from the place where he had lived, for the reason that he had been deprived of his residence by no act of his; that it was temporarily impossible for him to live where his house had been; therefore, that he was theoretically a resident and still a voter because he had the intention to return to his old domicile. It has therefore been the belief of most San Francisco voters that they could vote there at the coming election, wherever they were domiciled. Such has been the belief also of the election officials. This belief has been entertained by the thousands of San Francisco voters who are scattered in the cities all around the bay. Many such have registered in San Francisco.

But Chief Justice Beatty—not speaking on the bench, but in an interview—stated that in his opinion the law was plain. In substance the Chief Justice, as reported, said: "A man's residence is where he lives. The law requires that a man shall vote in the district where he lives. If, by circumstances entirely beyond his control, he is forced to leave the district where he has formerly lived, I do not think that he can register and vote there. It is my opinion that he should register in the district where he is living, and that he should vote in that district."

This would deprive many thousands of voters of the right to register and the right to vote. Therefore, the already pitifully small registration in San Francisco will probably be still further reduced at the polls by the election officers refusing to receive the votes of men who are living away from the districts where they registered.

This fact can not fail to have a marked influence on the coming election. San Francisco has always cast a heavy workingman's vote, and of recent years has cast an overwhelming labor union vote. But, as the working men have nearly all of them been forced to move around as much as the rest of us, and as there are many thousands of workmen attracted to the city by the high wages who have as yet gained no residence there, it would seem as if the vote of San Francisco in the coming election would be comparatively negligible. And as the State is and nearly always has been a Republican State—even when San Francisco was a Democratic sore in her side—may it not be believed that the State is distinctly and unqualifiedly Republican, now that the city has been temporarily cauterized by fire?

New Lines of the New San Francisco.

Immediately after the disaster of last April the Argonaut pointed out that one of the results would be marked changes in the business districts of San Francisco. We said at once that the retail business would go where it could most quickly be provided for; we added that the wholesale business, being less mobile, would also seek for the most readily available quarters, but would not find them so soon; and we closed by saying that the permanent uptown and the permanent downtown districts might differ radically from those which existed prior to the disaster.

Scarcely had we printed these lines when the forecast began to come true. In an entirely unsuspected quarter of the city—in Fillmore street, far to the west, in the heart of the residence quarter—there sprang up like magic a retail business district which has since remained there. But so speedily was this short and unwise street crowded, and to such a height did rents there soar, that the merchants and business men seeking quarters there found themselves forced to go elsewhere. A concerted movement, therefore, resulted in the establishment of a handsome retail quarter on Van Ness avenue from Market to Washington streets, and there that quarter has also since remained.

For a time the wholesalers wavered. Many of them went to Oakland. Others established themselves at the Southern Pacific Railway yards and tracks in southern part of the city.

Although these facts followed so closely the Argonaut's forecasts, it was peculiar to see how bitter these forecasts were resented. Many property owners in the old burned districts seemed to resent these remarks as if they were personal attacks. No city landlord is to see business going away from where his own lies. But when great disasters bring about great sweeping movements denunciation accomplishes little, and in this case it accomplished nothing.

Are the changes which have already taken place in San Francisco's business boundaries all the changes that we may expect? Are there not other and greater changes that may follow? There is a vast stretch of territory in the city which is still a desolate waste. Hundreds of blocks are still covered with ruins; miles of streets still encumbered with debris. The downtown business district has been cleared away but little. In those parts of the city where the buildings were combustible, little remains save standing chimneys. In the solid business district, where the buildings constructed of brick and stone, veritable mountain ruins still remain.

Every day one may read in the official records figures of contracts for removing debris—figures which run far up in the thousands. Only last week there was recorded a contract for removing the debris from the Ede lot on Market street, where the Majestic Theatre stood; the contract price for this was nearly $12,000. Think of all the lots there are in 400 burned blocks. Think how many millions must be spent merely in removing debris before the work can begin of excavating and preparing for new buildings.

Within the legal limits of San Francisco there is a large extent of territory which was not built upon and which therefore bears no superincumbent ruins. This land lies to the north, to the west, and to the south of the burned district. Will the new buildings of the New San Francisco build on land which is covered with mountains of ruins and debris? Or will they build on land which is open and ready to the hand of the workman? If this question were left to be answered solely by the old citizens of San Francisco, sentiment would impel them to build where they had built before. But is this question going to be answered by them? Is the new San Francisco going to be built by the old San Franciscans? Or is it going to be built by other men—by strangers—by men who come from other cities—men from distant lands—by corporations?

Great railway corporations will soon be contending for the control of San Francisco. Some are already established here; others are on the way. They have no sentiment whatever. They have no emotional loyalty to the old San Francisco. They are intent only on building up a new one. Where will they strive to build? Will they try to have it build where it was most difficult? Or where it is easiest? Will they build on the level lands that lie on tide-water to the north? Or will they build on the lands that lie on tide-water to the south? Or will they wait before they build—wait and clear away the heaps of debris and mountains of ruins on the level lands that lie to the east, and then once more cover them with the buildings of the old San Francisco?

It is going to be a gigantic gamble. He will be a lucky gambler who calls the turn. The stake is millions.

Labor Union Vote in the State.

We in California are apt to be over-impressed by the strength of the Labor Union vote here. All we read the daily papers, and the daily papers are in the fear of the labor unions. Yet these associations are only strong politically in the cities and large towns. In the agricultural districts they are practically non-existent. California is distinctly a State with few large cities. When San Francisco, Oakland and Los Angeles are mentioned, the list is closed. Of these three, the labor unions are admittedly strong in the first two. Los Angeles

Andes they decidedly are not strong. It is an "open town. In places like Sacramento, San Jose, Stockton, Fresno, and San Diego, the labor unions are, of course, stronger than they are in the sparsely settled rural districts, but not nearly so strong as in the large cities we have mentioned. Outside of them, with the exception of some organized miners' unions in the mountain districts, it might be said that the labor unions have no power in the rest of the State. Thus we have a population of something like 600,000 in which labor unionism is freely or strongly represented out of a total population in the State of nearly two millions. Thus there is only one-third of the population in which this element is represented at all. Out of this third of the population only an insignificant fraction represents the actual tale of the labor union men. How can we then attribute to such an insignificant numerical element of the population so great a political power.

Inside History of Gillett's Nomination.

It is strange truly that in a State notable for the number and the almost fierce competition of its journals devoted to the gathering and printing of current news, we have yet given us a truthful account of the circumstances leading up to the nomination of James N. Gillett for Governorship of California. It is a story full of interest—even of that "human interest" which is so cultivated by sensational newspapers. Mr. Gillett's name, so far as we can learn, was not mentioned or even thought of in connection with the Governorship until about the beginning of the current year. He has not been a man to rush into political or social limelight, and therefore not likely to be called a conspicuous State figure, although his public service in State and even in National affairs has been notable and long sustained. His home is removed from the center of political interests, and he has, when not engaged in his public duties, distinctly a retiring man. His character is as far removed as possible from that of the political self-seeker, and thoughts of ambition, in his mind, appear to have been subordinated to thoughts of service. A more characteristic and interesting "story"—to use a reporter's phrase—of the politics could not be conceived than that which will describe in detail how Mr. Gillett was drawn from his partly fixed relationships to which he has been devoted, and brought into his present position for the people of California.

The beginning of this story lies back in the political history of 1902, when the Republican State Convention of California met at the State Capital. In that Convention then governor, Henry T. Gage, was the "prominent man"—that is to say, he was slated by the "organization" for renomination, and was backed up by all the forces that the "organization" could command. Thomas J. Ryan of San Benito County, was the anti-organization candidate, and had behind him a very considerable body of devoted friends. Dr. George Pardee of Alameda County and J. O. Hayes of Santa Clara were what may be called the minor candidates, each with a firmly organized support from the county in which he lived. It did not take very long to determine that the nomination of Gage was an impossibility. Then it became a question as to which of the other three candidates, Flint, Pardee or Hayes, should get the votes of the baffled supporters of Gage. Pardee and Hayes especially sought to obtain an understanding by negotiation and treaty, and after a few strenuous efforts the votes went to Pardee, thus giving him the nomination.

The campaign that followed was one of hard fighting along the line. Dr. Pardee was not a popular candidate. He lacked the magnetic quality that made Gage, with all his faults of temperament, an effective party man, and there had been developed somewhere back in his political history a fixed antagonism between him and organized labor. In the end he was elected, scratchingly, by a plurality of 2459 votes, nearly 3000 less than the votes for the Lieutenant Governor (Hon. J. D. Anderson, then of Solano County and now of Contra Costa County), whose larger plurality may be taken as representing the normal party strength as developed in the election of 1902. San Francisco, nominally a Republican stronghold, left Pardee 9556 votes behind

Lane; and in Sacramento County, which time out of mind has been reckoned as dependably Republican, he was beaten by 493 votes. In his own county of Alameda his vote was 13,915, while that of Congressman Metcalf was 15,122. His failure in the northern and middle sections of the State was all but disastrous, for in the final count with a majority of 14,218 for the seven Republican counties south of Tehachapi, he got in by a bare plurality, as already stated, of 2549.

At all the larger points of public responsibility Governor Pardee's administration has been highly satisfactory. In many years California has not had an administration of her executive office which has so commended itself to the judgment of the people. Upon taking office Governor Pardee abandoned his professional work at San Francisco and Oakland, and established his home at the State Capital, and since the day of his inauguration he has given himself devotedly to his public duties. His immediate executive assistants were judiciously selected, and the routine business of his office has at all times been kept well in hand. There has been no scandal in connection with affairs under Governor Pardee. His conduct of public affairs has won for Governor Pardee a wide popular approval, and it is probable that a majority of the citizens of California would have been glad to see him nominated by his party for a second term. But he was not so named; in truth his candidacy made rather a sorry showing in the recent convention at Santa Cruz.

How came it so? Not only has Governor Pardee been an effective manager of the business interests of the State, but he has, on the whole, been a distinctly gracious personality. The door of his private office stands wide open at all times. Any man, woman, or child, high or humble, can easily gain access to him. He has taken upon himself an immensely irksome labor in traveling about the State, in visiting local communities upon their invitation, and in lending the dignities of his official character to popular and ceremonial occasions. And yet when it came to name his successor only a lean minority of the Republicans of the party stood for him. By overwhelming voice the nomination was not given to Pardee but to Gillett.

The theories of different observers and writers upon this outcome are, as readers of the Argonaut know, many and diverse. If we may judge from the expressions of the newspapers—particularly of Democratic newspapers—the "railroad influence" is in many quarters thought to have been paramount. There appears indeed to be a studied effort to discredit Mr. Gillett as a candidate on the theory that he was selected and groomed by these same "railroad influences" to defeat the man in whose selection four years ago it was presumed to have joined as against Flint and Hayes.

By way of examining this theory perhaps we cannot do better than consider the adverse side of Pardee's career in the governorship. Governor Pardee's home is in Alameda County, where he has long been the leader of a faction in the Republican party more or less bitterly opposed to another faction headed by Secretary Metcalf of President Roosevelt's cabinet. It has been no small part of Governor Pardee's personal policy to sustain his individual power in his own county, and to this end he has appointed to public positions disposable at the hands of the Governor an undue proportion of Alameda County men. Early in Governor Pardee's official career his partiality for Alameda County men—and for members of his own faction—became a popular joke, and like many popular political jokes it has had a serious basis. Aspiring persons all over the State who have failed to receive certain gubernatorial appointments they desired have believed themselves unfairly dealt with, and have charged it up against Pardee as a private use of his public powers in the interest of his own friends and political supporters of Alameda County. The number of persons having some reasonable pretension to party preferment thus brought into individual antagonism to Governor Pardee has been very considerable, and they have tended to create local centers of adverse feeling in every county.

Again, Governor Pardee, while in the main working with the State "organization" and at all times willing to have its support, has not been kindly disposed to party organizations in the several counties. He has co-operated with them sufficiently to give them hopes of his friendship, and has at the same time sufficiently disregarded them to excite their resentment. As a native of California, educated at our State University, and having a wide acquaintance throughout the State, he has had in nearly every county some personal friend whose judgment has been with him of greater weight and authority than the recommendations of the political and official county leaders. There is probably not a county in the State in which he has not in one way or another given offence by making appointments to office outside the lines and over the protest of those most active in local political affairs. It is largely due to this perhaps conscientious but certainly indiscreet political practice that there came into existence throughout the State many groups of disappointed and disgruntled persons.

Again, while in most respects an effective administrator, Governor Pardee has been curiously dilatory in the disposal of important public offices which are filled by executive appointment. Today there is scarcely one of the many commissions which make so important a feature in our executive system that is not largely filled with "hold-over" members—with men whose specific terms have expired but whose successors have not been named and who therefore hold their places under sufferance. This dilatory practice, regarded politically, has been an unfortunate one all round. It has tended to encourage a multitude of aspirants the greater number of whom have necessarily to be disappointed, and at the same time it has not given to the man finally appointed the full and natural measure of satisfaction, since political vanities easily wither under a policy of delay.

Take for instance the case of the appointments to the Appellate Bench last year in the San Francisco district. When the law creating this court was enacted it was understood that two men of the highest professional standing and of ideal qualifications for the post to be filled would gladly have accepted the appointments if they had been made properly. After a few weeks' delay neither was willing that his name should be considered. What under prompt practice would have been a gracious and acceptable compliment was felt to be almost an affront when tendered after many weeks of consideration. Here in the matter of official dilatoriness as related to appointments Governor Pardee made a fatal political mistake.

Still again Governor Pardee has not been happy in his attitude toward the members of his party in the State legislature, and particularly with the members of the Senate, who, whether rightly or wrongly, regard themselves as entitled to special consideration when appointments are to be made in their several districts. He has not been disposed to regard this claim seriously, and has commonly gone about the business of making appointments upon his own information and with small heed to the recommendations of members of the legislature.

Whoever has been, even in a casual way, an observer of practical politics can not fail to understand how these matters—however petty and trivial they may seem—have tended in political circles to create a feeling adverse to Governor Pardee. While no one has ever questioned the integrity of his administration or its general efficiency, there have been many to assert their dissatisfaction and dislike upon the basis of personal and other forms of neglect, and all this has made a situation exceedingly favorable to the prospects of some other candidate for the Governorship.

Finally, in reckoning up the influences adverse to Governor Pardee, we must recall events connected with the recent special legislative session. The purpose of that session, it will be remembered, was so to readjust certain laws as to facilitate the rehabilitation of San Francisco. But under the call issued by the Governor there was left the possibility of other legislation. After the session was under way there came up from Southern California a series of demands for legislation in promotion of the Owens River water project. Los Angeles City wished to take in certain neighboring communities in order to create a financial basis for this great project. Sentiment in the South was intense on both sides, and appeals pro and con were made to the Governor. In the end he declined to permit consideration of the question as one not properly belonging to the purposes of the session; but in doing so it was his misfortune to create bitter anger and resentment on the part of many people in Southern California, and particularly of those political forces which dominate Los Angeles City and County.

When the Convention met at Santa Cruz, early this month, there was found in attendance there, and hostile to Governor Pardee's hopes of renomination, an extraordinary assemblage of political forces. It was plainly to be seen that the "organization" was not for him, and it was quite as plainly to be seen that the greater number of those who have hitherto formed the backbone of the anti-organization forces were likewise against him. There was Dr. Rowell of Fresno; there were those who represented ex-Senator Bard of Ventura; there were, in addition to the official representatives of Los Angeles County, those who personally represented General Otis of the Los Angeles Times; there was Congressman Needham, whose attachment for Mr. Gillett is the product of their mutual services at Washington; actively in the forefront of the Gillett movement stood the united representation of the counties forming his congressional district under the highly effective leadership of George Knight. The only organized party group of votes not attached either to one candidate or the other was the Ruef element of San Francisco, which went to Gillett when voting time came, although a sufficient strength had been developed to win the nomination without them.

Now there is no question as to where the "organization" stood—it was against Pardee and it was for Gillett; but it is presumptuous to say, as many have said, that it was the dominating force in Gillett's convention campaign. It has long been one of the commonplaces of political philosophy that those who apparently lead political parties are quite as likely to be party servants as party masters. Leadership under democratic systems is not so often won by antagonism as by concession. Party leadership in American States is commonly the prize, if it be a prize, of him who brings into operation the several county or local organizations. In these considerations are to be found the secret of Gillett's success. His "discovery" was undoubtedly at the hands of his personal friend George Knight, whose activity was stimulated by resentment against Pardee, this feeling originating in the Senatorial contest of 1905.

When Gillett was first suggested for the Governorship he was only one among many receptive candidates; but the movement in his favor—backed by the personal urgency of Mr. Knight and supported by his enthusiastically devoted congressional district—gained momentum more rapidly than any other, and as a growing force soon attracted to itself all the elements of opposition to Pardee save that alone of San Francisco and Santa Clara Counties. The "organization," if the truth be told, found its own course prescribed for it by the strength of a movement which it had no serious reason to protest against, but which it probably could not have beaten if it had tried. Possibly the "organization" might have joined with Alameda and Sacramento and a few other counties in forcing the nomination of Pardee, but it could only have been done, if at all, under the whip and spur of an "organization" programme, with the certainty of meeting at the polls a solid opposition from organized labor.

Roosevelt and Gompers.

The week after the Republican State Convention, when the Union Labor leaders began threatening to defeat James Gillett because he had refused to obey the orders of Samuel Gompers, the Argonaut remarked: "Those of us who are Republicans and free American citizens, and who will not take orders from a naturalized foreign labor leader, will vote for Gillett." The Sacramento Bee replies: "Samuel Gompers is standing for those principles to which all Americans can subscribe—be they labor union men or not." Gompers is standing for the principle of the boycott. He menaces with his labor union boycott those American Congressmen who do not vote the way he wants them to. This man Gompers even had the insolence to threaten President Roosevelt with the revenge of the labor unions if he disobeyed the Gompers mandates. The Gompers delegation said this to his face. The President replied in a ringing American speech, in which he said that all men in this country are equal before the law. Gompers wants to make them unequal before the law. He wants to make one kind of law for the union labor man, another kind of law for the farmer or merchant. The President will not stand for that, and so he told Gompers and his henchmen. Thus there is one American who does not "subscribe to the Gompers principles," and his name is Roosevelt. When it comes to choosing Americans, the Argonaut will choose Theodore Roosevelt and the Bee can choose Samuel Gompers.

Recent examinations at the Paris Conservatory of Music show that good tenors are steadily getting scarcer and that hardly any of the applicants has been able to reach the high C or even the B flat of the scale. Physicians think the deficiency of tenors is due to violent exercises young men indulge in under the guise of sport, which ruins the vocal chords.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Good Wishes from New York.

New York, August 30, 1906.—Please extend my affection to the Argonaut. I enclose my cheque. Permit me to mention you in the admirable manner in which you continue publication of your paper in spite of the dire catastrophe which overwhelmed your region in the spring. A hiatus in its appearance, under such trying conditions, would have been excusable. Believe me,
Truly yours,
Wm. King F.

A Five Years' Subscription.

Butte, Montana, Sept. 6, 1906.—Enclosed find my check $20.00 in payment for five additional years' subscription valuable paper.

I have just returned home, and take my first opportunity sending you this as a token of sympathy with you in the grief you have sustained in the terrible catastrophe in your city.

I have been a reader of your publication for over a quarter of a century. It has afforded me great pleasure and instruction. I reiterate I consider it the best periodical published in the I wish you continued success.

Yours truly,

The Argonaut in Yucatan.

San Francisco, Aug. 30, '06.—Your article in last week relative to the world-wide circulation of the Argonaut, back to my mind a little episode of my last winter's trip to Yucatan.

One scorching Sunday afternoon I was sitting in the yard of the Gran Hotel in far-away Merida, trying to get of air by manipulating a rocking-chair, on the principle Dutchman who nearly killed his horse one hot day trying to "vindi." Presently a stranger took the remaining rocker, he looked like one of us we soon entered into a conversational learning that I was from California, he inquired with a gleam of animation if I knew a paper called the Argonaut published in San Francisco. Being informed that everybody in California was proud of the Argonaut, he said that he had never before, but had been a subscriber to the Argonaut for five years and would not be without it. He stated further that he was read by everybody in the mahogany camps of California who could read English, and when all had read it he would take it to his folks in New York State. He was so enthusiastic about the Argonaut that soon I began to expand with just pride in a "paisano," as it were, of the Argonaut.

Sincerely yours,

J. B. H.

Conditions in Northern Mexico.

Monterey, Mexico, Aug. 31, 1906.—The Argonaut is a truth, fair play and honor in journalism, as I know from acquaintance of twenty-two years, so I ask that you turn to Harper's Weekly of Aug. 25th, and read the wild yarn printed about conditions in Northern Mexico; then I want to state a few facts.

A little over a month ago the people of this city, particularly the Americans resident here, were astounded in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of July 21st that for the city of Monterey had been a seething hot-bed of revolutionary spiracy and the bitterest open hostility to foreigners, particularly Americans. This was the first news we had of a pitiable condition of helpless terror. After this, one by one came under our astonished gaze papers from Chicago, New York, telling us all about it—how the wicked and General Reyes was conspiring against the Government President and how we were all to be run out of the country September 16th.

Now, all this, while outrageous and exasperating, is only with the ordinary methods of the saffron brotherhood, fortunately, Harper's Weekly, once so cautious, so reserved and so conservative, is still taken seriously by an immense number of readers. The article I have referred to is sly, mendacious, most vicious in its innuendo. It is a carefully misleading unwarranted attack, not alone upon two great men—President Diaz and General Bernardo Reyes—but upon the people as a whole.

Although I have lived and had my headquarters in San Francisco for many years, I have lived also in Mexico and on, for the last sixteen. I have dealt with the people of the country in business, have directed the labors of hundreds in mining and construction work, speak their language, recognize their virtues. I have resided in Monterey since the beginning of the year, and the nature of my business here has brought me into contact with all classes, and I have yet to see an indication of political unrest, industrial disturbance, or animosity to Americans. And I mention industrial disturbance advisedly during the recent strike of the railway employees here I saw of it, even when I went to the freight yards or stations. The strike, as you probably know now, is over, having occasioned but inconvenience and absolutely no violence of even the most trivial character.

I have the honor to be well acquainted personally with Reyes, and knowing him as I do, feel strongly the wanton injury he has suffered through the vicious article I have alluded to. General Reyes is a man of the greatest personal strength of character, courteous, keen of intellect, quick of decision and full of much for his rugged honesty as for his frank love of war, soldier, born, as he has said, to the sounds of battle, has been in policy, uniformly friendly to Americans and tireless in his efforts for industrial development in Mexico. So that we who know Mexico and its people, feel the proper fair-minded men who see a wanton and cowardly injustice and I for one hope the Argonaut will, for the sake of our credit, and ordinary fair play, do what it can to counteract the injury already done. We are doing our modest best under the present circumstances the Argonaut's pen will be more effective than ours, or even the sword of the general Reyes himself.

Yours very truly
Geo. S. Bider

POLITICO-PERSONAL.

Fletcher D. Proctor, of Proctor, son of United States Senator Redfield Proctor, was elected Governor of Vermont last week by about two-thirds the usual Republican majority.

The Illinois newspaper which comes out with a title that Speaker 'Joe' Cannon is famous for his 'fat' knows how to make a subtle attack on a man, is the New York Evening Mail.

Senator Morgan G. Bulkeley, of Connecticut, was defeated in his effort to carry the primaries for candidates before the State convention. His successor in leadership was Samuel Fessenden, whom Bulkeley defeated for his present place.

President Roosevelt has extended the eight-hour law to all public work under the supervision of any department of the government. This order affects more than 100,000 men working on river and harbor improvements. It is said that contractors have decided to respect scrupulously the new order.

Congressman E. A. Hayes, of San Jose, representing the Fourth California District, has been nominated for re-election by the Republicans, and endorsed by the Unionists. His opponent will be H. S. Davis, member of the San Francisco Iroquois Club, who has been nominated by the Democrats and endorsed by the Independence League.

The Fourth California District, which is wholly within the limits of the city of San Francisco, Congressman Julius Kahn has been nominated for re-election by the Republicans, and endorsed by the Labor Unionists. Hirschberg has been nominated by the Democrats and will make prominent in his campaign his pledge to do duty-free rebuilding materials for the city.

Colorado Republicans were impolitic enough to nominate for re-election to the Supreme Court of the State William Gabbert, who was and may still be a Democrat. As a consequence, Philip B. Stewart, nominated for Governor, now declines to run on the ticket with Gabbert, and the latter refuses to withdraw. Other candidates are uneasy, and another convention is being predicted.

It is predicted that the next change in the Cabinet will be the retirement of Victor H. Metcalf, Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and that R. Garfield will succeed Metcalf, giving up his present place as Commissioner of Corporations. President Roosevelt gives Mr. Garfield credit for furnishing Secretary-General Moody with valuable aid in the suits against the packers and the Standard Oil Company.

Now, an overwhelmingly Republican State, a United States Senator is making a school house campaign in some county in order to assure himself that his district for the Legislature may be elected. So bitter the Cummins and anti-Cummins fight become that Dolliver's friends are fearful of the Legislature not to be elected in November, and before which he is a candidate for re-election in January. In his county it was only by the utmost exertion that his district was nominated for the Legislature.

Senator Foraker's declaration in favor of the nomination of United States senators by popular vote at the primaries is of large importance, says the Springfield (Mass.) Republican. Foraker has been a conservative of the strictest sect. His present position therefore is a recognition of the growing strength of the demand for the direct election of senators by the people, and a possible surrender on the part of other senators whose long service, like Foraker's, has tended to make them jealous of any change in the present system.

The Nevada State Republican Convention nominated for Governor; for Congressman, Oscar Mitchell; for Lieutenant Governor, George T. Mills; for Judge, E. R. Dodge; for Secretary of State, William Douglass; for Treasurer, Edward Cutts; for Attorney General, Jacob Eggers; for Superintendent of Schools, Orvis S. Smyer; for Printer, J. G. McCarthy; for Regents of the University, long terms, H. S. Sterret, H. C. Cutts, and short terms, Dr. Homer J. Hanson, J. W. Phillips.

President Fairbanks at Columbus, O., last week was to be interviewed on politics or about Mr. Bryan. But he spoke freely. "The President alone decides when it is time for the United States to intervene in the Cuban trouble, if that time arrives," he said. On the negro question: "The settlement of the so-called race question or race problem rests with colored people themselves. I believe these people make up 10 per cent of our population, have improved wonderfully, and they are taking advantage of opportunities placed at their disposal."

The result of the New York primary elections was a mixture of good and bad. The influence of President
